In view of Presidential Adviser Henry Kissinger's propensity for making headlines all over the world, it is indeed passing strange that the American people were told nothing of the meeting. In addition to Mr. Kissinger, one

U.S. Senator and four Representatives admitted they attended the conference. Some of the world figures involved included Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau of Canada, Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands, Baron Edmond de Rothschild of France, and many others.

I leave to this committee's discretion whether this news blackout represented "suppression of the news."

Let us turn now to the four specific areas outlined in the chairman's letter to me of Jan. 13, 1972:

1. What is the effect of governmental subpoenaing of newsmen on their ability to gather, analyze, and report the news?
2. What is our analysis of the publication of the notorious "Pentagon Papers" and the government's efforts to enjoin such publication?
3. What special concerns exist in connection with the issuance of press credentials by local, state, and national government offices to members of the press and their employers?
4. Our comments on other matters pertaining to freedom of the press.

GOVERNMENT SUBPOENA POWER OVER NEWSMEN

First, let me point out that LIBERTY LOBBY is in favor of S. 1311. LIBERTY LOBBY also opposes government subpoena power of newsmen. If government experiences damages, let government sue in the courts, and before the people illustrate these damages. If the issue involves loss of human life, espionage, or foreign aggression, as set forth in S. 1311, legal precedent can be quickly established pursuant to guidelines established by that measure.

PUBLICATION OF "SECRET" PAPERS

The publication of these "secret" papers demonstrates specifically why newsmen should have freedom of the press. It was painfully obvious the government knew one thing and told the American people another thing. While the release of this information may have been in technical violation of the security laws relating to classified information, the case proves that those laws need drastic revision. It would seem far too much is classified as "top secret" in an effort to deceive the American people. The fact that the release of the Pentagon Papers vindicated LIBERTY LOBBY's time-honored stand against intervention in Southeast Asia is beside the point.

ISSUANCE OF PRESS CREDENTIALS

Basically, we believe no governmental authority should issue press credentials, for obvious reasons. In fact, we believe the media has been derelict in its duty to police its own profession adequately. LIBERTY LOBBY recommends that the Fourth Estate publish a procedure similar to that of the Bar Association, requiring that professional standards be met, subject to the exigencies of the profession itself, in order to determine that only responsible and truthful representations of interviews of news conferences be published. The press must, inevitably, answer to the people. So must government. If either is to survive as a viable entity of the free enterprise system, it must be firmly rooted in the philosophy of operating in the "common interest." To do otherwise is to invite disaster as a nation dedicated to the preservation of the individual.

RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Chairman, government makes news. Professional journalists are responsible for giving the public this news. Under a representative form of government, if the people are informed, the government will be informed. This is the essence of truly republican journalism.

Responsibility must be coextensive with freedom. Without responsibility we have license, which in turn degenerates (in the case of the media) to sheer propaganda. While the areas of responsibility are as numerous as the scope of freedom, we single out here three areas for special comment: 1. Fairness; 2. Non-partisanship; and, 3. Selectivity.

By fairness, we mean the obligation of the press to report all sides of a question fairly. All too often we see a monolithic expression of the news which tends to treat one side or the other unfairly. Coverage of the recent trial of Rep. John Dowdy (D-Tex.) is a good example of unfairness. Too much of the press led the people to believe Mr. Dowdy was guilty either before or during the trial. The not-so-subtle presentation of the news is graphically reflected in a juror's comment on TV after the trial that "Mr. Dowdy had not proved his innocence."

Selectivity means the ability of the press to select the news stories which it deems worthy of telling the public. Errors of selectivity come about by inclusion and exclusion. The entire story recited above about the Bilderbergers is a classic example of selectivity by exclusion. One Washington Post newman explained when the facts were set before him that the Woodstock convention was not "newsworthy." With this power to exclude, people will never become informed. In a like manner, the ceaseless, yea monotonous repetition of crime by teenagers leads one to the belief that the younger generation is a hopeless cause. One 16-year-old gets caught selling drugs in school and makes headlines; yet the story of a boy who has labored hard and long to become part of the free enterprise system is relegated to the want-ad section if he is included at all. We submit, however, that the world would be better off to hear more about the latter than the former. It is this abuse of selectivity which must be reformed.

How do we bring about needed reform in the news reporting by the press? Certainly direct government intervention is not the way! Since the internal reform of the Fourth Estate is not the topic of this Senatorial inquiry, we shall pass on the collateral effort this body can make to help with the reform.

Traditionally, people who have been defamed by the press have had recourse to the courts of law through libel action. In recent years, however, the Supreme Court has so emasculated the legal right that the press is little restrained in this direction. The ancient right of a litigant to redress for defamatory remarks could be restored by statutory enactment. This would act as a deterrent on the free-wheeling press, which abuses its freedom by an injudicious consideration of its responsibilities.

SUMMARY

Until our government divests itself of the power to coerce enterprise, there is little hope any segment of our economy, including the media, will ever be totally free. This problem calls for statesmen and scholars. To the lawmakers, we offer this quote from Alfred E. Smith, from a speech delivered at Harvard University in 1933: "Keep your eye on the Constitution. This is the guarantee, that is the safe-guard, that is the night watchman of democratic representative government—freedom of speech, freedom of the press—the right of public assembly and the right to petition the government. Save all these things in the Constitution and let the Supreme Court stand behind it, and then you can get off all the hot air in Congress and in the Senate that you want to."

To the media we offer this sage warning from Benjamin Franklin, taken from his apology for printers in 1731: "It is unreasonable what some assert, that printers ought not to print anything but what they approve, since if all of that business should make such a resolution, and abide by it, an end would thereby be put to free writing, and the world would afterwards have nothing to read but what happen'd to be the opinions of the printers." In other words, Mr. Chairman, like Franklin LIBERTY LOBBY believes that "designed news" is the antithesis of freedom—regardless of source, government or press.

Thank you again for this opportunity to present our views.

Secret World Summit Conference

Liberty Lowdown has penetrated the outer hard shell of secrecy around the mysterious Bilderbergers—the most secretive coterie of super-rich, leftist internationalists in the world. This story was first broken by Rep. John Rarick (D–La.), in the May 5 Congressional Record, with information supplied to him by LIBERTY LOBBY on May 3. Other than this and the article in the May 15 Washington Observer, this tremendous story has been totally suppressed in all of the national news media.

What makes the following so vital is not only the meeting itself but the fact that the allegedly "free press" of America has cooperated in a great conspiracy to keep it secret.

The "permanent" chairman or front man of the Bilderberg group is H.R.H. Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands, royal consort of Queen Juliana. He is the only official designated as "permanent" in the Bilderberg clique—all others are "honorary" or "temporary." But lurking ominously in the shadows behind him are the Rothschilds, Warburgs, Wallenbergs, Rockefellers, and other great international banking dynasties. For inexplicable reasons, they are highly elusive about the whole thing.

You did not read about it in the "free press" but the latest Bilderberg meeting was held Apr. 23–25, 1971, at Woodstock, Vt. Liberty Lowdown dispatched a reporter to the scene despite the tight security and secrecy maintained by about 150 state and local policemen working under a task force of FBI agents. Never before had there been such an array of law enforcement officers in the village of Woodstock (population 1600). The Woodstock Inn is owned by Laurance Rockefeller, who lives in a spacious home on a hillside; everyone was barred from the inn except the Bilderbergers.

THE DIGNITARIES ARRIVE

When Prince Bernhard arrived in his private jet in Boston, a terse 2-page statement was released to about 30 waiting newsmen. No further information was given out about the meeting and no interviews were granted by the distinguished personages attending. As the foreign VIP's arrived in New York and Boston, three private Rockefeller planes ferried them to West Lebanon, N.H., where chauffeured limousines whisked them away to the Rockefeller estate or the Woodstock Inn.

Several foreign ministers of cabinet level rank attended. No Nixon cabinet officer was there, but Dr. Henry A. Kissinger, assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, participated in the meeting. He arrived in a White House plane, accompanied by four U.S. Secret Service bodyguards, and Lt. Gen. John W. Vogt, director of the Joint Staff, Organization of the Joint Chiefs. (NOTE: The secret guest list of the participants has been obtained as this issue goes to press, and will be sent free to any member of LIBERTY LOBBY upon request, accompanied by a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Be sure to give Board of Policy number.)

Back in 1937, Prince Bernhard, an impoverished German princeling, was working in the Paris office of I. G. Farben, when a telegram from his mother summoned him to Switzerland, where he met and wooed Princess Juliana of Holland. During World War II, Bernhard was Dutch liaison officer with the British Royal Air Force in London. After the war, he was public relations promoter of the NATO alliance and the European Common Market, and helped promote the sale of Dutch products to South America. Prince Bernhard was approached by the Polish liberal writer and political philosopher Retinger, with his scheme for a united Europe and eventually one-world government.

Bernhard thought Retinger had a good idea, but the Dutch ministers feared that the scheme might embarrass Holland. Bernhard took off for Washington, D.C., where he got support for the Retinger plan from Gen. Walter Bedell Smith, then director of the Central Intelligence Agency, and C. D. Jackson, a White House aide also closely connected with the CIA. "Beedle" Smith had been American ambassador to Moscow, where he had been thoroughly brainwashed. His first act as CIA director was to assemble all his top officials and announce, "We can't lick world communism—no counter-insurgency plans will work. We must compromise and co-exist with communism." The CIA officials were shocked.

In 1953, President Eisenhower appointed Smith Under Secretary of State, and named Allen Dulles to head CIA. The first Bilderberg meeting occurred in the Bilderberg Hotel, Osterbeek, Holland, with funds from the Ford and Rockefeller Foundations, and covert support of the CIA.

Since 1955, the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace has administered funds for the Bilderberg organization, provided by the Ford Foundation and other sources. And Joseph E. Johnson, head of the Carnegie Endowment, has been the Bilderberg honorary secretary general for the U.S. When Prince Bernhard departed at noon on the second day of the recent Woodstock meeting, Johnson presided over the remainder of the conference.

ENIGMATIC WOODSTOCK FESTIVAL

The Bilderbergers have held 17 meetings. The recent 3-day Woodstock session was the third in the U.S. (St. Simons Island, Ga., 1957, and Williamsburg, Va., 1964—all three on Rockefeller-owned properties).

Bilderberg spokesmen say that Bilderberg is strictly a one-man thing, operated by Prince Bernhard without any permanent membership or even any permanent organizational structure. This is simply not true. The permanent Bilderberg secretariat is at 1 Smidswater, The Hague, The Netherlands. The secretary general for Europe is Ernst H. van der Beugel, professor of International Relations, Leiden University. And as previously stated, Joseph E. Johnson is secretary general for the U.S. In addition, a permanent international steering committee nominates the "participants" for each conference to Prince Bernhard, who issues invitations. And the "participants" (not delegates) are picked because of their involvement in the programs on the agenda of the meeting. The 10 U.S. members on the international steering committee picked the 30 American participants in the recent Woodstock session.

When Mrs. Dori Parker, assistant to American Secretary General Johnson, was asked the names of the American members of the steering committee, she replied, "I am not supposed to give out that information." Not only are meetings held under heavier security than the U.S. National Security Council, but even the identity of the members of the international steering committee is secret. However, Liberty Lowdown was able to ferret out the names of the following members of the international Bilderberg committee: David Rockefeller, chairman, Chase Manhattan Bank; George W. Ball, managing director, Lehman Brothers, Inc.; Arthur H. Dean, senior partner, Sullivan & Cromwell; Gabriel Hauge, chairman, Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co.; Henry J. Heinz, chairman, H. J. Heinz Co.; Thomas L. Hughes, president, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace; Howard Stein, president, Dreyfus Corp.; Emilio G. Collado, executive vice president, Standard Oil Co. (N.J.); Robert O. Anderson, chairman, Atlantic Richfield Co. and chairman, Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies; and Ian K. MacGregor, chairman, American Metal Climax.

The Bilderberg steering committee members generally nominate each other as conference participants—but not always. How the original members of this autocracy are chosen is not only a secret but how they are replaced is a secret. And even the total membership of the international steering committee is also a secret. Why do great international financiers and noted educators want to conceal the fact that they are Bilderberg committeemen? The Bilderberger operations appear more like the clandestine meetings of the dreaded Mafia or the murderous Zionist Stern Gang than the harmless get-together of world leaders for a frank discussion of international affairs. Phyllis Schlafly, in A Choice Not an Echo, called the group an example of a "little clique of powerful men who meet secretly and plan events that appear to 'just happen.'"

The noted British authority on internationalist groups, A. K. Chesterton, in The New Unhappy Lords, asserts, "If the facts concerning the Royal Institute of International Affairs and the Council on Foreign Relations be accepted, it will be seen that the proper study of political mankind is the study of power elites, without which nothing that happens can be understood. These elites, preferring to work in private, are rarely found posed for photographers, and their influence upon events has therefore to be deduced from what is known of the agencies they employ. There are dozens of such agencies. Financial support received from one or the other or all three Big American foundations—Rockefeller, Carnegie, and Ford—provides an infallible means of recognizing them. One of the most blatant of these agencies, despite its adoption of a secret society technique, is the Bilderberg group. Strange, is it not, that Prince Bernhard should be the 'front' man for a powerful left-wing secret society? . . ."

IT'S OFFICIAL—THE AMERICAN ROLE 'CHANGES'

Only two topics were on the Woodstock agenda: (1) The contribution of business in dealing with current problems of social instability (2) The possibility of a change of the American role in the world and its consequences. The first subject was scheduled for only the first day, and Dr. Kissinger apparently did not consider it very important, because he skipped it. The next morning he presented his "working paper." Discussion on his proposals lasted all day, continuing to a cocktail party hosted by David Rockefeller. This "working paper" was the most significant presentation at the closed-door parley, according to informed sources. In fact, it was a briefing of U.S. estimates and intentions regarding its "changing global role."

Ironically, only one U.S. Senator participated, Adlai Stevenson III (D–Ill.), and four Congressmen: Donald Fraser (D.F.L.-Minn.), Peter H. B. Frelinghuysen (R–N.J.), Henry S. Reuss (D–Wis.), and Donald W. Riegle (R–Mich.). Frelinghuysen and Reuss belong to the CFR.

Gabriel Hauge also presented a working paper. Incidentally, when he was a White House aide, he was known as the "man who tells Ike what to think," according to the Wall Street Journal. A forerunner of Bundy, Rostow, and Kissinger, he held the status of American foreign policy arbiter. Now he is in a strategic spot in the power elite as chairman of Manufacturers Hanover Trust, a bank with close ties with the Zionist international banking firm of Dillon, Read & Co. Manufacturers Hanover has long been controlled by Horace Flanigan, father of Pete Flanigan, vice president of Dillon Read, now on leave while serving as a top Nixon aide. The Flanigans and Dillons have joint oil investments tied to Union Oil and Standard Oil of California; the Dillon Read firm also has close tie-ins with the Rockefeller and Standard Oil of New Jersey.

PEACE CARNEGIE STYLE

The notorious Alger Hiss left his high State Department post to become president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. A few years ago, the group prepared a plan for a U.N.-sponsored military operation against South Africa. The U.S. and Soviet air forces were to cover the invasion of the republic by national forces from a number of countries. When the plan leaked prematurely before the liberals could "condition" public sentiment, a furor arose.

Three years ago Henry Kissinger and Charles W. Yost, then Nixon's ambassador to the U.N., helped prepare the Future of the Strategic Arms Race: Options for the Seventies. The report, published by the Carnegie Endowment, advocated nuclear power "sufficiency" rather than "superiority."

In a campaign speech on Oct. 24, 1968, Nixon declared his intention to "restore our objective of clear-cut military" superiority over the Soviet Union. This strong pro-American statement doubtless helped Nixon get votes. But a week after taking office, the Carnegie Report was issued, and Nixon has since advocated nuclear "sufficiency."

Perhaps it is more than coincidental that only a few days after the Bilderbergers met at Woodstock to make it official that the U.S. was about to experience a "change in the American role" in the world, billions of dollars were rushed to Germany to profit from American dollar devaluation, one aspect of this Nation's waning power and prestige under internationalistic leadership.

Americans aware of the sinister group that met at Woodstock in April will have no difficulty in identifying those responsible for their national troubles.

[From the Union Leader Corp., Nov. 12, 1971]

FREEZE WAS "LEAKED" AT VERMONT TALKS: THOSE IN KNOW MADE BILLIONS, SOURCE ASSERTS

(Editor's Note—The following exclusive article is the result of a six-month investigation by reporter Egan.)

(By Arthur C. Egan, Jr.)

WASHINGTON.—At a top-secret conference held last April in Woodstock, Vt., a presidential advisor leaked information on the proposed economic freeze to a select group of national and international figures enabling them, according to a Washington source, to profit to the tune of $15 to $20 billion.

The same presidential advisor also revealed President Nixon's plans to visit Red China, which further enabled these figures to make future commercial plans for Mainland China.

Herbert Klein, White House communications director, however, not only denies there was a "leak" but says he "never found evidence such a meeting took place."

From a source within the conference itself, it was learned by the Union Leader that the main topic of discussion of the secret conference was "the radical change of the American role in world affairs and the subsequent consequences."

The informant said the proposed visit to China was discussed but said it was done "very discreetly" with a favored few of those invited to attend the conference.

In the past two weeks, one U.S. senator and four members of the House of Representatives not only confirmed that such a meeting took place, but admitted they participated in the top secret conference.

Also, the U. S. Department of State confirmed that it worked in conjunction with the Vermont State Police, in making security arrangements for "at least 90 foreign and domestic figures."

The conference in question was held April 22–25 at the Woodstock Inn, owned by the Rockefeller family. The guest list is reported by a very reliable source as reading like a summit conference of national and international bankers and business leaders.

Some of those attending the four-day conference were presidential advisor Henry Kissinger, Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau of Canada; Robert Bourassa, prime minister of Quebec; Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands; Baron Edmond de Rothschild of France; U.S. Sen. Adlai Stevenson 3rd, and Lt. Gen. John W. Vogt, director of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The secret sessions were hosted by David Rockweller, chairman of the board of the Chase Manhattan Bank and Joseph E. Johnson, president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Johnson is known for his close friendship with Alger Hiss, convicted of perjury for denying he passed secret U.S. government information to the Communists.

During a meeting with executives and editors of the Manchester Union Leader last July, Klein was asked if Dr. Kissinger attended the Woodstock meeting as "an official representative of the U.S. government."

Klein denied at that time of knowing about Dr. Kissinger's involvement in the secret conference but promised he would "check very thoroughly into the matter" and relay his findings to the Manchester publication. His comments last week were in reply to repeated inquiries from this newspaper.

The White House aide expressed amazement when informed that a top security agent of the State Department was instructed by his Washington superiors to answer questions concerning the department's role in the unpublicized conference.

John W. Richardson, special agent for the State Department said he conferred with local and Vermont State Police and government agencies in connection with the security arrangements for the visiting dignitaries.

Richardson said although the State Department did not sponsor the highly secret four-day session "they were concerned with security because of the distinguished national and world leaders involved."

The State Department agent commented, "Naturally our department wished to insure the safety and privacy of those taking part in the conference."

Richardson said it was his understanding that both the Ford and Rockefeller Foundations underwrote the expenses for all those participating in the conference.

Maj. Glenn Davis of the Vermont State Police confirmed he met with Richardson and planned part of the security. "It was a hairy scene," said Davis, who explained, "No one seemed to know just who was in charge of what."

Davis said his department supplied 30 men, all in plain clothes and in unmarked police vehicles. "We were instructed we were to have 'no physical contact' with anyone attending the conference," recalled Davis.

The State Police head said he was "advised there were numbers of Secret Service agents in the area as well as FBI agents. I heard there was a private, armed, security force drawn in tight around the inn," said Davis.

It was admitted by the State Department that 12 foreign countries and the United States had representatives at the top secret sessions and that all expenses, including air travel fare, was picked up by the two tax-exempt foundations.

At the conference were representatives of the United States, England, France, Italy, Turkey, Switzerland, Germany, Belgium, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Finland and the Netherlands.

Besides U.S. Sen. Stevenson, the four members of Congress who were present, by their own admission were Henry S. Reuss (D) of Wisconsin; Donald W. Reigle, Jr. (R) of Michigan; Donald Frazer (D) of Minnesota and Peter H. B. Frelinghuysen.

Neither Sen. Stevenson nor the four congressmen would talk personally with this reporter but answered questions through their administrative assistants.

Harold Levy, spokesman for Sen. Stevenson, said the Illinois senator arrived at the conference Thursday night, April 22, and remained for the entire conference. Stevenson reached the area by commercial aircraft to Boston and commuter plane to Woodstock. On the return trip the senator rented a car in Woodstock and drove to Boston.

Levy was very evasive about the object of the four-day meeting. However he did admit "international policies" were among the topics of discussion and said the senator was an "invited guest."

Although Levy promised to return a call with additional information he has failed, over a two-week period, to reveal any more than in his first conversation.

William T. Kendall, assistant to Rep. Frelinghuysen, said this was an "off-the-record" conference and said any agreement reached at the Woodstock sessions could not be binding on the government.

Kendall would only admit that "international and monetary policies" were discussed. He cut off all questions by saying it was a "top secret meeting" and was not to be discussed generally.

Mrs. Arvonne Frazer, wife of Rep. Frazer, refused to discuss the nature of the conference, saying, "It was a highly secret affair and no one was to reveal what transpired at Woodstock."

However, Mrs. Frazer said her husband paid his own way to and from the conference, but disclosed that Rep. Frelinghuysen had returned to Washington "with a high general from the Pentagon." Mrs. Frazer refused to reveal the general's name, saying, "Get it from the New Jersey congressman."

A second call last week to Frelinghuysen's office drew from the congressman's assistant that Lt. Gen. John W. Vogt was the Pentagon officer involved. The member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff flew his personal plane into the Lebanon, N.H., airport and motored to the Woodstock meeting.

Spokesmen for Reuss and Reigle refused to discuss the nature of the Woodstock conference saying "it was a private affair only for invited guests."

Both administrative assistants stressed the fact that the "theme" of the conference was "absolute secrecy" and by their acceptance of the invitation to attend, the two congressmen adhered to that element.

It was learned, however, that two top American newspaper executives were among those present; Osborn Elliott, editor-in-chief of Newsweek, and Bill Moyers, formerly of Newsday.

A month-long check of these publications revealed that not one word was ever printed concerning the Woodstock conference.

Because of the extreme secrecy connected with the Woodstock conference, the Manchester Union Leader was unable, after six months, to obtain a complete guest list.

However, from the source within the conference, and from other sources in Washington, a partial list of those attending the conference is printed below. These are in addition to the other important leaders already named earlier.

From the United States:

—Robert Anderson, chairman of the board. Atlantic Richfield Corp.
—Cyrus Vance, former undersecretary of defense.
—Howard Stein, president, Dreyfus Investment Corp.
—Gabriel Hauge, board chairman, Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co.
—Henry J. Heinz, chairman of the Board, H. J. Heinz Co.
—George W. Bell, an officer of Lehman Brothers, Inc.
—John D. Rockefeller 4th, secretary of state of West Virginia.
—Karl Bendelsen, board chairman, U.S. Plywood Corp. and Champion Papers, Inc.

The Canadian representatives were Paul H. Leman, president of the Aluminum Company of Canada; Donald MacDonald, minister of defense; and Anthony Griffin, president of the Triarch Corp.

From Belgium came Baron Lambert, board chairman of the Banque Lambert; and Henri Simonet, a member of the Belgian Parliament.

Three representatives from Germany were present along with a number of other high German officials. Those known to be at the conference were Gerhard

Schroeder, former minister of foreign affairs; Egon Bahr, state secretary of the Federal Chancellery; and Hans Merkle, board chairman of the Robert Bosch Co.

Svend O. Sorenson, general manager of the Bank of Denmark, was the only known representative from his country.

From Italy came two known visitors. Guiseppe Bordogna, treasurer of the Federation of Italian Industries; and Guiseppe Glisenti, chairman of the Confederation of State-Owned Industries.

From Norway came two ship owners and industrialists, Leif Heogh and Greig Tidemand.

Also attending from France was Wilfred Baumgartner, honorary governor of the Bank of France.

From England came two members of Parliament, Sir Frederic Bennet and George Thomson. Also from England were Ronald Grierson, board chairman of the Orion Bank, Ltd.; Reginald Maulding, secretary of home affairs, and Sir Eric Roll, a director in the S. G. Warburg Co.

The Turkish representative's name was unknown but he was said to be one of that country's delegates to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO).

Mr. BASKIR. Thank you.

Your statement discusses at least two examples of what I suppose could be called press bias, or press censorship itself. One is the conference in Vermont which you mentioned, and the other was with respect to the trial of congressman Dowdy. I wonder if you are in general agreement with the statement of Miss Efron with respect to television broadcasting, that it is not entirely objective, it does not give all points of view or fair representation on the public air waves?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Bartell would have been a much better witness on this subject, but essentially, we are in agreement with her conclusions. I noticed with a great deal of care the colloquy between you and the first witness today as to whether it was adequate, whether her methods were right and so forth. I do not know and I must admit that the extent of my personal knowledge of her testimony is confined to the testimony and not to the book. But if her testimony reflects what is in the book, I would say that we are in general agreement that her conclusions are correct. Our personal experience confirms her conclusions.

Mr. BASKIR. Your personal experience is that the press and broadcasting is biased?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is biased.

Mr. BASKIR. Whether or not you agree with or even care to comment on her methodology?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Right, and I would add for those members of the press that are still here, if any, we would still defend their right to be biased.

Mr. BASKIR. That is the point I wanted to get to, because the criticism from both ends of the political spectrum, the very conservative and the very liberal——

Mr. RICHARDSON. We are in the middle.

Mr. BASKIR. From other points of view at both ends of the spectrum, let me say, that the fourth estate tends to give exposure to a very narrow segment of that spectrum. If you look at what is popularly called liberal or conservative or radical comments in the press, and I mean both newspapers and broadcasting, the exposure seems to be more to the middle ground and the points of view on either end of the spectrum, widely differing from the middle ground.

are not found very often. I wonder if it is your experience that the kinds of points of view that the Liberty Lobby expresses are given, first, as much exposure as you like, and I can anticipate your answer to that question may be no, or as much special exposure as you think they ought to to be fair?

Mr. Richardson. Preliminarily, let me answer that question by saying that 2 years ago, in testifying before this same subcommittee, and I believe you were also sitting in the approximate position relative to the chairman, we testified on quite a controversial subject involving the Extension of Voting Rights Act. I believe that after our testimony, even Senator Bayh, who is not known for sharing views similar to Liberty Lobby's, was impressed by the fact that our views are not that far away from his. I think that the misrepresentation, if there is such—and I think there is—of our position, our Liberty Lobby position—lies in the fact that it is not understood, rather than that they do not give it. What is given in the papers are the peripheral fringes or things that do not exist. I think if you were to take a look at the testimony we present here and to other committees, you will find that we are definitely within the mainstream of what is normally reported but is not. And I attribute this phenomenon to the fact that the organizational institution of Liberty Lobby has been characterized by the press in a certain way and that automatically turns them off. They do not ever reach the substance of the testimony or of the position stated, as far as I can see.

I do not want to be unduly critical, but I believe that to be the truth.

Mr. Baskir. Despite your criticisms of press coverage, nonetheless, you seem to agree with Miss Efron and with Monroe that the solution to improving the press does not lie in Government helping the press to be better?

Mr. Richardson. That is correct.

Mr. Baskir. But quite the opposite?

Mr. Richardson. Every time the Government tries to help, it gets worse, in our opinion.

Mr. Baskir. There have been witnesses before and there will be some more tomorrow who view television as one of the most important, if not the most important, means by which ideas are communicated. They feel that broadcasting has a public responsibility as well as a public right to make sure that all points of view are given an opportunity to be presented. This is generally called the right of access, which the Court has already expressed itself on. Their feeling and some of their positions are to the effect that there ought to be an enforceable right, either through the FCC or through the courts, or perhaps some other mechanism, to insure that persons with different points of view, be allowed access to broadcasting time, because in their opinion, unpopular new ideas are just not given access.

In the early days, before it was generally thought that cigarettes were dangerous, people with that point of view could not get on. Now, of course, it looks like it has turned full circle, and if you think cigarettes are not so bad, you cannot get on.

In other words, as a solution to this problem in all areas of public interest, they feel there ought to be an enforceable right to get on television to get their view across to the public. I wonder what you feel about that position?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; I would oppose an enforceable right if it is enforced by the Government. I think that Miss Efron's solution, which is our solution, is far better: Make the establishment of new stations, open it up to a greater degree of freedom of enterprise and allow more people to air their views on different stations by creating more competition. I think a great deal of her testimony was to the effect that you have a near monopoly with your television media, and it is her view, and I think we share the view, that if this monopoly could be, in a sense, broken up and greater competition allowed. the problem you pose would solve itself. I feel definitely that for a Government to give, for example, Liberty Lobby, a right to be on a particular show simply because an opposing point is there does not solve the problem.

Mr. BASKIR. Let me give you a hypothetical case. Baring that solution of opening up full competition, consider a situation in which the use of large automobiles, new highways, and high powered gasoline. are constantly being pushed on television through advertising. There is a loud but perhaps small—it could even be large—point of view in the country that we ought to either do away with gasoline powered engines because of the dangers to the atmosphere or go to electric automobiles or even ban automobiles throughout most parts of the country. Because of the economic power of the petroleum industry and the automobile companies, so the argument goes, you cannot make any money—you could not make it economically feasible, you would lose all your advertising—if you gave vent to these other opinions. So as a practical matter, it would be impossible to air points of view which attack the source of revenue—that is to say, advertising—of television stations. How could you guarantee that you would get all points of view across if you are faced with this economic reality which squeezes out the second point of view?

Mr. Richardson. Do we have now in your hypothetical case the absence of Governmental coercion?

Mr. BASKIR. Well, the solution imposed is to enforce that right of access by making sure that opposing points are on view.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We oppose the idea that the Government should enforce the right or to grant a right which the disadvantaged could then enforce. We rely more upon the concept that your free enterprise system will solve the problem on its own.

For example, in your automobile case that you just mentioned, it is true that the advertising tends to be overwhelmingly in favor of larger cars and more horsepower, greater consumption of gasoline. But I also note that the importation of small foreign cars steadily increases every year to the point now that Detroit motor manufacturers are forced to build competitive automobiles. In other words, the population at large either have not been listening or watching those TV commercials or else they are voting with their pocketbook. Whatever it is, they have indicated a contrary view.

Another good example of the same point. I do not see very much on TV or read, until very recently, much in the papers regarding the busing situation of school children. Even Senator Proxmire found and published in one of his newsletters that some 80-odd percent of the people polled by him in his State were opposed to forced busing. The media, however, would indicate up until recently that the opposition to forced busing was reasonably negligible. However, every poll that comes through these days shows somewhere near 80 percent opposed to it.

By force of numbers—I do not know where people come up with the opinion, but by sheer force of numbers, the media is now forced to present evidence to the contrary. This morning in the newspaper, we have two or three pages filled with mostly commentators and news stories, but we are beginning finally to see opposing points of view. This was done without, in effect, Government coercion. And we would prefer it that way.

Mr. Baskir. You would rather rely on the free play of political and economic and social forces to take care of bias, inevitable or otherwise, rather than have the Government stand as a traffic cop on ideas as well as on frequency?

Mr. Richardson. Right. I think this traffic cop concept is one that does a great deal of damage to the First Amendment by the Government.

Mr. Baskir. A traffic cop could say that two cars could not occupy the same place at the same time, but could not tell you in this particular case how fast you can drive or how recklessly you can drive?

Mr. Richardson. Right.

Mr. Ebner. You have made it plain that the Liberty Lobby is against any Government intervention in the exercise of the free press. Do you feel that criticism of the press expressed by a public official such as the Vice President amounts to Government intervention of the type that you disapprove of?

Mr. Richardson. I assume in giving my answer that you have reference to Vice President Agnew's remarks, among others.

Mr. Ebner. Among others, that is correct.

Mr. Richardson. It is my understanding, and I do not have the data at hand, but it is my understanding that prior to his initial criticism, there had been self-criticism by the TV network people on their own in TV Guide to the effect that there was a great deal of bias on the behalf of the press. Not 2 or 3 months subsequent to that time, the Vice President made his initial charge, and miraculously, the press took a different viewpoint.

I do not feel, although there is no Liberty Lobby mandate on it, but answering this personally, I do not feel that his views represent Government interference. He is entitled to personal opinions. I think that there is probably room, from some of the remarks, but not the bulk of them—there may be—I notice today there were two or three instances picked where if you were a newsman, you would feel that you had been coerced by the Government. I would not argue the point in those one or two cases. Let's give them that as a debating point. But on the bulk of his remarks, I do not believe that even the news media would consider them to be a form of coercion by the Government.

Mr. Ebner. I appreciate that answer, because the subcommittee has heard testimony on several occasions which implies, if it does not state, that there is a form of Government conspiracy that now exists on the part of this administration to manage the news or to stifle the free expression guaranteed by the First Amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That may be. We quoted in here management of the news by the Kennedy administration and we will not pick any favorites politically. It can just as easily be managed by the Nixon administration. But the instance of the Vice President's criticism is not an example of such management, in our opinion.

Mr. EBNER. Well, that is what makes your answer interesting, because the Vice President has been used as an example, an overt example of that sort of conspiracy.

Thank you.

Mr. BASKIR. One might, from the two examples discussed here from the Kennedy administration and the Nixon administration, or at least the charges, perhaps come to the general conclusion that Government's efforts to make sure the news is all favorable to it and not all disfavorable transcends party lines and administrations and is an inherent part of Government; and that indeed, perhaps the First Amendment, recognizing that fact, may be wiser than we are by making sure that we keep Government out of it as much as possible.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would certainly concur with your injection, because I worked for the Government for 5 years as an attorney, and I think administrations come and go but the policy of the Government never changes.

Mr. BASKIR. And the desire of bureaucrats not to be criticized is—

Mr. RICHARDSON. Constant.

Mr. BASKIR. Constant and never changing.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Never changing.

Mr. BASKER. We appreciate your coming, Mr. Richardson. Again let me apologize on behalf of the Senator for his not being here.

We will recess until tomorrow at 10 o'clock and tomorrow we will meet in room 318 in the Old Senate Office Building.

(Whereupon, at 12:15 p.m., the subcommittee was recessed until Thursday, February 17, 1972, at 10 a.m.)

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1972

U.S. Senate,
Subcommitte on Constitutional Rights of the Committee on the Judiciary,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 9:50 a.m., in room S-407, the Capitol Office Building, Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (chairman), presiding.

Present: Senator Ervin, (presiding).

Also present: Lawrence M. Baskir, Chief Counsel and Staff Director, and William Pursley, Counsel; and Stanley Ebner, Minority Counsel.

Senator Ervin. The subcommittee will come to order.

Counsel will call the first witness.

Mr. Baskir. Mr. Chairman, our first witness this morning was to have been Prof. James Q. Wilson of Harvard University and a member of the Sloan Commission on Cable Television. Professor Wilson can't come today because of the death of a close friend, but he will submit a statement for the record.

Senator Ervin. I am sorry he cannot be here and for the circumstances that keep him from being here, but we will receive his statement and include it in the appendix.

Mr. Baskir. Our first witness this morning is the Reverend Everett C. Parker of the United Church of Christ.

Senator Ervin. Reverend Parker, I am delighted to welcome you to the subcommittee and I want to express to you our appreciation for your willingness to come and give us the benefit of your views on what I consider one of the most important parts of our Constitution.

STATEMENT OF REV. EVERETT PARKER, DIRECTOR OF THE OFFICE OF COMMUNICATION, UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST

Reverend Parker. Thank you, sir.

Mr. Chairman, my name, as you have heard, is Everett C. Parker and I am director of the Office of Communication of the United Church of Christ. I have a rather lengthy testimony here which I would like to have in the record, but I will only deal with the highlights in it for about 15 minutes.

My qualifications are on the first page of my testimony. I would like to say that the Office of Communication for many years has conducted programs to encourage freedom of speech in the United States and particularly for those minorities whose ideas and cultures have not received adequate access to the mass media.

We initiated the landmark court proceedings which established the right of citizens to participate in license renewal proceedings before the Federal Communications Commission, and we have been called upon by citizen coalitions in more than 100 cities to assist them in evaluating and improving broadcasting services and especially in gaining access to the air.

Few aspects of American life are as universally revered as the guarantees of freedom of religion, speech, and the press that are expressed in the First Amendment. The United States was founded on these guarantees and virtually all its democratic processes are based on their existence.

Few Americans are willing to tamper with the First Amendment. It has, in a manner of speaking, become sacred to us. But like so many other sacred symbols, we tend to accept it unthinkingly and without trying to understand its origins or its basic concepts as they pertain to our own time.

The First Amendment, of course, was conceived and adopted in an era when the technology of mass communication was undreamed of. Interestingly, Prof. Erik Barnouw has pointed out in Mass Communication, that the American people in the 1790's got their news largely by word of mouth. Few could read. The profession of reporting was unknown. The total subscription of the entire national output of the 35 so-called newspapers has been estimated at well under 20,000. Even half a century later, with the huge advance of the industrial revolution and the introduction of steam power, the biggest newspaper press could turn out only 200 copies an hour—one side at a time. Any one-man printshop could start a newspaper; with one assistant, the printer moved into the big-time.

Clearly, there are major differences in the media today when it is not unusual to reach 50 million persons instantaneously, and such vast investments are required that monopoly ranks equally with regulation as a threat to our basic freedoms. Suppression of news by our economic masters, by giant corporate communication conglomerates, looms as a menace to our freedom equal to suppression by a governmental Big Brother.

Lest I be suspected of some gross heresy, I want hastily to get into the record the fact that there already is substantial support for this view in opinions of the U.S. Supreme Court. Religious groups in this country have been expressing the view for some time that the guarantee of the First Amendment, especially for broadcasting, is primarily directed toward assuring the public of right of access to information, rather than toward the protection of the media. Most often, of course, the rights of both are intertwined; but when they conflict, it is the right of the public which is paramount.

This was our own argument, as amicus curiae in the Red Lion case, and Mr. Justice White, speaking for a unanimous Supreme Court, agreed: "The people as a whole retain their interest in free speech by radio, and their collective right to have the medium function consistently with the ends and purposes of the First Amendment. It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount."

Admittedly and obviously, there are differences between the electronic media and the printed word. Equally obvious under some monopolistic conditions there are parallels.

What we are interested in, Mr. Chairman, is not any cutting down of freedom of expression, either by government or anybody else, but in administering our present laws to afford much wider freedom of expression. In this brief presentation, I shall limit myself to four aspects of the First Amendment application: The right of access. The Fairness Doctrine. The regulation of broadcasting by the Federal Communications Commission. Finally, and very briefly, newspapers.

Access—The Supreme Court in conducting the Red Lion decision upholding the Fairness Doctrine stated:

> In view of the prevalence of scarcity of broadcast frequencies, the Government's role in allocating those frequencies, and the legitimate claims of those unable without governmental assistance to gain access to those frequencies for expression of their views, we hold that the regulations and ruling at issue here are both authorized by statute and constitutional.

The Court thus recognized what we believe is the most urgent need in broadcasting today—government protection of the right of holders of minority views to have access to present them.

As a practical matter, the freedom to disseminate and receive information is empty indeed unless it takes place in the media of mass communication. The soapbox orator in Grant Park is no match for the Chicago Tribune. All too often, publishers and broadcasters concern themselves only with their own rights to publish or broadcast without giving adequate recognition to the limitations which are imposed upon those who, in a modern technological and economic era, have no practical means of disseminating their own views widely and adequately to a mass audience. There must be a balance.

The mass media pay little attention to the concern, for example, of the underprivileged until their needs are expressed in forceful protests. Persons holding minority views are finding it necessary to make their demonstrations ever more forceful and more illegal to sustain media interest. No one should have to break the law to be heard.

There is no doubt in my mind that some of this inattention is simply an unwitting injury to the underprivileged without malice on the part of the media. Without members of the underprivileged among the directors, or officers, or editors, or, often, of staff, how are they to know or understand the problems of the dispossessed?

Our interpretation of access is that the media themselves have an obligation to seek out and give voice to all significant viewpoints reflected in the area of service. These opinions cannot simply be summarized by journalists; to be understood they must be presented by the partisans themselves. A means should be found to allow significant groups in the community to participate in selecting issues for decision. This approach does not involve the government in evaluating program content—always a difficult First Amendment matter—but only in multiplying the voices and ideas which may be heard. The media should also employ minority newsmen and take advantage of their insights to help identify issues of importance to minority groups and develop lines of communication with spokesmen for them.

And Senator, since I know this issue will be raised about newsmen, I also mean newswomen. They are a minority in the news field.

Now, the Fairness Doctrine. It is difficult to separate the question of access from a consideration of the Fairness Doctrine because, in many ways, they are intertwined. Perhaps the major reason for the current distinction is the FCC's failure to enforce the doctrine's positive requirement that broadcasters deal with all significant issues and viewpoints.

The FCC's Fairness Doctrine refers to television and radio as a medium of freedom of speech and freedom of expression for the people of the Nation as a whole. It calls upon broadcasters to make sufficient time available for full discussion and states that this duty extends to all subjects of substantial importance to the community coming within the scope of free discussion under the First Amendment . . .

Yet, even today, The FCC routinely refuses to enforce this affirmative obligation to cover all significant issues and viewpoints. Enforcement is limited to insuring that all sides are covered on those selected issues which the station chooses to raise.

The Office of Communication finds nothing wrong with the fairness doctrine and sees no need for any changes in it. Stricter enforcement rather than watering down is needed.

Networks, for instance, long have recognized their special responsibility for fairness. For the most part, however, they have approached this responsibility by attempting to maintain high standards of objectivity rather than by presenting a diversity of viewpoints.

Networks endorse no candidates, take few editorial positions and generally avoid commentary. Many broadcast editorials deal with subjects which already enjoy broad acceptance and rarely concern heated controversy. There are probably more controversial issues and viewpoints presented each day in the Lancaster, Pa., Intelligencer Journal, North Carolina's Greensboro News, the Los Angeles Times, and the New York Times than the three networks present in a year.

The daily editorial positions of these newspapers are more blunt and forthright than the occasional broadcast documentary like "The Selling of the Pentagon" or "Hunger in America." Such documentaries probably seem more startling to the public because it is so unaccustomed to their presentation. Although viewpoints are often balanced in television documentaries, they represent a narrow range of opinion and many views are unrepresented. Worse yet, the search for objectivity often results in blandness. Small wonder that such programs have low ratings. Audiences want to hear the arguments of the partisans and these spokesmen would like to make their own cases.

We are not impressed with the cry of some broadcasters that criticism of their programs "chills" their freedom of speech. Broadcast licensees are public trustees and it is appropriate that they be held accountable by the American people. We deem it healthy that citizens —even public officials—speak out when they regard the performance of broadcasters as something less than perfect. We see nothing wrong with political parties or public officials filing fairness complaints.

Broadcast licensees stand astride our most important channels of communication. They control an indispensable instrument of our democratic society. They must be subject to the checks and balances provided by law. A broadcasting station should not be regarded solely as a vehicle of expression for its owner. It is an outlet of expression for the people it is licensed to serve. The responsibility for an accounting is inherent in the licensee's acceptance of his license. He must not "chill" the freedom of expression of the people he has agreed to serve.

When one reads Broadcasting Magazine or listens to broadcasting industry lobbyists, one gets the impression that broadcasters are overwhelmed by fairness inquiries.

This view is irrelevant and misleading. Assuredly, the FCC receives thousands of letters from the general public complaining about one thing or another. But the overwhelming majority of these writers receive a form reply and there the matter ends. The station or network is not even asked to comment. Apparently, the FCC makes no effort even to make a statistical evaluation of these letters to ascertain if the complaints fall into patterns which point to important lapses in broadcast services.

Only in rare instances is a complaint specific and presents such a case that the station may be asked to respond to the allegations made in the complaint. Even in these cases the matter usually ends with the station's reply. It is the most infrequent exception when a fairness complaint is decided in favor of a public complainant.

When one compares the dozen or so successful fairness complaints with the over 8,000 licensed stations, the burden on the broadcasting industry is seen in more meaningful perspective.

Before leaving the subject of the Fairness Doctrine, I should like to touch briefly on four points:

1. Among suggestions made recently by persons close to the broadcasting industry is one that the resolution of all fairness complaints be deferred to the end of the license term as part of the review of the overall station performance. This proposal overlooks the fact that most fairness complaints involve the timely discussion of urgent public questions. Fairness after the election is over and the votes are counted is meaningless. Administrative due process requires swift resolution of complaints to protect the complainant, the broadcaster and the public's right to be informed.

2. Regulation of programming is properly directed at increasing diversity of program content, not at censoring or inhibiting it. No one could or should be penalized for broadcasting any idea or opinion. The remedy for unfair utterances is the right to present opposing viewpoints, not the avoidance of debate by prior restraint of the initial statement, either by the broadcaster or the Government. No subject matter is "too controversial."

3. Editorial judgment is inevitable when deciding what issues will be discussed. An editor, like a judge, brings subjective value to decisionmaking. We should not tolerate tampering with the philosophy or subjective judgment of either the editor or the judge, but neither should we curb efforts to analyze, criticize or even correct these judgments.

Such evaluation, however, must be open and on the record. Subtle efforts to intimidate through grand jury subpenas, threats against commercial interests, demands for outtakes, fishing expeditions into confidential records and news sources are not to be tolerated.

4. The FCC must simplify the system for filing fairness complaints and must afford the public access to program records of material already broadcast by television and radio stations.

One of the reasons why it is so difficult for a public complaint to be sustained is the total secrecy of broadcast records. Program logs should be open to the inspection of the public.

Now, regulation by the FCC—All discussions of freedom of speech and press, access and fairness eventually lead to the question: Who is to decide?

The broadcaster is convinced that he alone must determine what the public will hear or see. The partisan is equally convinced that he alone can speak for his cause and demands access to do so.

Obviously, someone must decide and, in broadcasting, the task goes to the Federal Communications Commission. If the agency acts arbitrarily, its decisions may be reviewed by the courts. The FCC is an instrument of the Congress and directly responsible to it. We seem to forget that in modern times. The Congress, therefore, can deal with patterns of tyrannical judgment (if they should occur) either by abolishing the agency or changing the laws under which it functions. Similarly, the President, by his appointments, and the Congress by reviewing those appointments, have a further check on the Commission's possible abuse of power.

As the United States Supreme Court has held, protection of the public right to know must come before safeguarding the absolute power of media owners. The real question before this Senate committee is not who shall make the decisions to insure freedom of speech on the air but what to do about a supine agency which refuses to take the actions with which it has been charged by the Congress.

For more than 40 years, the Federal Communications Commission has resolutely refused to exercise its powers to decide whether or not a broadcast licensee has been acting in the public interest, convenience or necessity sufficiently well to warrant a renewal of its license. Time and again it has refused to regulate on the extraordinary grounds that it has not the facilities, the energy, or the staff to do so. Time and again, the courts have returned cases to the Commission with acerbic instructions to take action.

The Commission has both the staff and the legal authority to regulate the broadcasting industry to insure public access and fairness in broadcasting. What it lacks is the desire to regulate. Again I repeat, the FCC is an instrument of the United States Congress and is directly responsible to it. So I ask how long will Congress allow its own creation to ignore the mandate of the Communications Act?

I wish to touch briefly on the question of access, balance, and fairness in newspapers and the other print media. My view is that the protection of the rights of the public to express itself applies to the print as well as to the electronic media. Although neither ruled directly on this question, both Judge Burger, as he was at the time of the WLBT case and Justice White in Red Lion seem to support this position.

No matter what the origin of a monopoly, the result is the same. Whether it is from the physical limitations of the broadcast spectrum, or (as in the case of newspapers) from a combination of economic factors, a serious impediment to speech is created. There is danger to free expression when a single individual or corporate conglomerate owns every newspaper of general circulation in a particular city. This problem is a complicated one, I am not prepared to offer a solution today, but I am convinced that one can, and should, be found.

I call upon the Congress to initiate a comprehensive study of the evils caused by communication monopolies and to find remedies which protect and enhance the First Amendment rights of all the people. I do not know what the results of such a study would be, I ask only that the right of the public to know be placed on at least a par with the media to speak.

I thank you for this opportunity to testify.

(The prepared statement of Rev. Everett Parker follows:)

STATEMENT OF REV. DR. EVERETT C. PARKER, NEW YORK CITY, DIRECTOR OF THE OFFICE OF COMMUNICATION, UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST

My name is Everett C. Parker, I am Director of the Office of Communication of the United Church of Christ. I am also a member of the General Board of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., which is composed of 32 churches with more than 42 million members, and I am chairman of the Broadcasting and Film Commission of the Council, but I do not speak for the Council here.

The United Church of Christ has a membership of two million. The Church was formed in 1957 through union of two historic Protestant denominations, the Congressional Christian Churches and the Evangelical and Reformed Church. The Office of Communication is charged by the Constitution and bylaws of the United Church to conduct a ministry in mass communication in its own name.

PROGRAMS OF THE OFFICE OF COMMUNICATION

For many years the Office of Communication has conducted programs to encourage freedom of expression in the United States, particularly for those minorities whose ideas and cultures have not received adequate access to the mass media.

We initiated the landmark proceeding which established the right of citizens to participate in broadcasting hearings before the Federal Communications Commission, called Office of Communication of the United Church of Christ v. FCC. We also participated as an amicus in the Red-Lion cases and in United States v. Caldwell.

We have issued a number of publications on citizen rights in broadcasting and more recently on the public interest aspects of cable television development.

We have been called upon by citizen coalitions—primarily representing minorities—in more than 100 cities to assist them to evaluate and improve broadcasting services. We have aided them (1) to gain access to the air; (2) to obtain program service to fulfill their needs, tastes and desires, and (3) to persuade broadcasters to employ minority personnel at all levels of staffing. The Office of Communication initiated the FCC rule making that resulted in Commission regulations requiring nondiscrimination in employment.

Few aspects of American life are as universally revered as the guarantees of freedom of religion, speech and press expressed in the First Amendment. The United States was founded on these guarantees. Virtually all of its democratic processes are based on their existence.

Few Americans would be willing to tamper with the First Amendment. It has, in a manner of speaking, become sacred to us. But like so many other "sacred" symbols, we tend to accept it unthinkingly and without trying to understand its origins or its basic concepts as they pertain to our own time.

The First Amendment, of course, was conceived and adopted in an era when the technology of mass communication was undreamed of. Professor Erik Barnouw has pointed out in Mass Communication, that the American people in the 1780's got their news largely by word of mouth. Few could read. The profession of reporting was unknown. The total subscription of the entire national output of the 35 so-called newspapers has been estimated at well under 20,000. Even half a century later, with the huge advances of the Industrial Revolution and the introduction of steam power, the biggest newspaper press could turn out only 200 copies an hour—one side at a time. Any one-man printshop could start a newspaper; with one assistant, the printer moved into the big-time.

Clearly there are major differences in the media today when it is not unusual to reach 50 million persons instantaneously, and such vast investments are required that monopoly ranks equally with regulation as a threat to our basic freedoms. Suppression of news by our economic masters, by giant corporate communication conglomerates, looms as a menace to our freedom equal to suppression by a governmental Big Brother.

Lest I be suspected of some gross heresy, I want hastily to get into the record the fact that there already is substantial support for this view in opinions of the United States Supreme Court. Religious groups in this country have been expressing the view for some time that the guarantee of the First Amendment, especially for broadcasting, is primarily directed toward assuring the public of right of access to information, rather than toward the protection of the media. Most often, of course, the rights of both are intertwined; but when they conflict, it is the right of the public which is paramount.

This was our own argument, as amicus curiae in the Red Lion case, and Mr. Justice White, speaking for a unanimous Supreme Court, agreed:

> [T]he people as a whole retain their interest in free speech by radio and their collective right to have the medium function consistently with the ends and purposes of the First Amendment. It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount. It is the purpose of the First Amendment to preserve an uninhibited marketplace of ideas in which truth will ultimately prevail, rather than to countenance monopolization of that market, whether it be by Government itself or a private licensee.

Admittedly and obviously, there are differences between the electronic media and the printed word. Equally obviously, under some monopolistic conditions there are parallels. In this brief presentation, however, I shall limit myself to four aspects of First Amendment application: The right of access. The Fairness Doctrine. The regulation of broadcasting by the Federal Communications Commission. Finally, and very briefly, newspapers.

The Supreme Court in concluding the Red Lion decision upholding the Fairness Doctrine stated:

> In view of the prevalence of scarcity of broadcast frequencies, the Government's role in allocating those frequencies, and the legitimate claims of those unable without governmental assistance to gain access to those frequencies for expression of their views, we hold that the regulations and ruling at issue here are both authorized by statute and constitutional.

The Court thus recognized what we believe is the most urgent need in broadcasting today—government protection of the right of holders of minority views to have access to present them.

As a practical matter, the freedom to disseminate and receive information is empty indeed unless it takes place in the media of mass communication. The soapbox orator in Grant Park is no match for the Chicago Tribune. All too often, publishers and broadcasters concern themselves only with their own rights to publish or broadcast without giving adequate recognition to the limitations which are imposed upon those who, in a modern technological and economic era, have no practical means of disseminating their own views widely and adequately to a mass audience. There must be a balance.

Most of the work of the Office of Communication has been directed toward bringing about improvements in the area of access to the media for minority views. The mass media pay little attention to the concerns, for example, of the underprivileged until their needs are expressed in forceful protests. Persons holding minority views are finding it necessary to make their demonstrations ever more forceful and more illegal to sustain media interest. No one should have to break the law to be heard. And, as we all know, media coverage of these staged events does not guarantee communication of the underlying issues or problems which gave rise to the demonstrations.

There is no doubt in my mind that some of this inattention is simply an unwitting injury to the underprivileged without malice on the part of the media. Without members of the underprivileged among the directors, or officers, or editors, or, often, of staff, how are they to know or understand the problems of the dispossessed? Even when a broadcaster does cover the problems of the slums and the ghettos, he seldom allows the poor to speak for themselves.

Our interpretation of access is that the media themselves have an obligation to seek out and give voice to all significant viewpoints reflected in the areas of service. These opinions cannot simply be summarized by journalists; to be understood they must be presented by the partisans themselves. A means should be found to allow significant groups in the community to participate in selecting issues for decision. This approach does not involve the government in evaluating program content—always a difficult First Amendment matter—but only in multiplying the voices and ideas which may be heard. The media should also employ minority newsmen and take advantage of their insights to help identify issues of importance to minority groups and develop lines of communication with spokesmen for them.

News and Public Affairs programming represents only a small percentage of the broadcaster's output. National and international news coverage largely is limited to material produced by the three television networks. Even the most important stories are reported in a few sentences. Such cursory treatment lacks depth and diversity. Television's multi-sensory impact increases the influence of every story and, without social or educational distinction, it reaches into every neighborhood and home. These realities make it essential that some means be found for improving access on network as well as local television for minority viewpoints.

THE FAIRNESS DOCTRINE

It is difficult to separate the question of access from a consideration of the Fairness Doctrine because, in many ways, they are intertwined. Perhaps the major reason for the current distinction is the FCC's failure to enforce the Doctrine's positive requirement that broadcasters deal with all significant issues and viewpoints.

The FCC's Fairness Doctrine refers to television and radio as a "medium of freedom of speech and freedom of expression for the people of the Nation as a whole." It calls upon broadcasters to "make sufficient time available for full discussion" and states that "this duty extends to all subjects of substantial importance to the community coming within the scope of free discussion under the First Amendment . . ."

Yet, even today, the FCC routinely refuses to enforce this affirmative obligation to cover all significant issues and viewpoints. Enforcement is limited to insuring that all sides are covered on those selected issues which the station chooses to raise.

The Office of Communication finds nothing wrong with the Fairness Doctrine and sees no need for any changes in it. Stricter enforcement rather than watering down is needed.

Networks long have recognized their special responsibility for fairness. For the most part, however, they have approached this responsibility by attempting to maintain high standards of objectivity rather than by presenting a diversity of viewpoints.

Networks endorse no candidates, take few editorial positions and generally avoid commentary. Many broadcast editorials deal with subjects which already enjoy broad acceptance and rarely concern heated controversy. There are probably more controversial issues and viewpoints presented each day in the Lancaster, Pennsylvania, Intelligencer Journal, North Carolina's Greensboro News, the Los Angeles Times and the New York Times than the three networks present in a year. The daily editorial positions of these newspapers are more blunt and forthright than the occasional broadcast documentary like "The Selling of the Pentagon" or "Hunger in America." Such documentaries probably seem more startling to the public because it is so unaccustomed to their presentation. Although viewpoints are often balanced in television documentaries, they represent a narrow range of opinion and many views are unrepresented. Worse yet, the search for objectivity often results in blandness. Small wonder that such programs have low ratings! Audiences want to hear the arguments of the partisans and these spokesmen would like to make their own cases.

Such practices are the antithesis of the Fairness Doctrine, which clearly proclaims the public's "paramount right . . . to be informed and to have presented to it for acceptance or rejection the different attitudes and viewpoints concerning these vital and often controversial issues which are held by the various groups which make up the community."

We are not impressed with the cry of some broadcasters that criticism of their programs "chills" their freedom of speech. Broadcast licensees are public trustees and it is appropriate that they be held accountable by the American people. We deem it healthy that citizens—even public officials—speak out when they regard the performance of broadcasters as something less than perfect. We see nothing wrong with political parties or public officials filing fairness complaints.

Broadcast licensees stand astride our most important channels of communication. They control an indispensable instrument of our democratic society. They must be subject to the checks and balances provided by law. A broadcasting station should not be regarded solely as a vehicle of expression for its owner. It is an outlet of expression for the people it is licensed to serve. The responsibility for an accounting is inherent in the licensee's acceptance of his license. He must not "chill" the freedom of expression of the people he has agreed to serve.

When one reads Broadcasting Magazine or listens to broadcasting industry lobbyists, one gets the impression that broadcasters are overwhelmed by fairness inquiries. This impression is often "documented" by exaggerated figures of the volume of fairness complaints filed with the FCC.

These figures are irrelevant and misleading. Assuredly, the FCC receives thousands of letters from the general public complaining about one thing or another. But the overwhelming majority of these writers receive a form reply and there the matter ends. The station or network is not even asked to comment. Apparently, the FCC makes no effort even to make a statistical evaluation of these letters to ascertain if the complaints fall into patterns which point to important lapses in broadcast services.

In rare instances a complaint is specific and presents a prima facie case. In such cases the station may be asked to respond to the allegations made in the complaint. Even in these cases the matter usually ends with the station's reply. Is is the infrequent exception when a fairness complaint is decided in favor of a public complainant.

In 1966, Robert Lowe made a statistical study of fairness complaints for the Senate Communications Subcommittee. His analysis shows that network documentary, news and panel discussion programs combined accounted for less than three percent of the complaints filed with the FCC from July 1, 1965 to June 30, 1966. These program types ranked 12th, 13th and 14th among program types complained of. On the other hand, syndicated discussion programs such as financed by H. L. Hunt, the Rev. Carl McIntire and the like and open mike shows accounted for over 40 percent of the fairness complaints.[1]

When one compares the dozen or so successful fairness complaints with the over 8,000 licensed stations, the burden on the broadcasting industry is seen in more meaningful perspective.

Before leaving the subject of the Fairness Doctrine, I should like to touch briefly on four points:

1. Among suggestions made recently by persons close to the broadcasting industry is one that the resolution of all fairness complaints be deferred to the end of the license term as part of the review of the overall station performance. This proposal overlooks the fact that most fairness complaints involve the timely discussion of urgent public questions. Fairness after the election is over and the votes are counted is meaningless. Administrative due process requires swift resolution of complaints to protect the complainant, the broadcasters and the public's right to be informed.

2. Regulation of programming is properly directed at increasing diversity of program content, not at censoring or inhibiting it. No one could or should be penalized for broadcasting any idea or opinion. The remedy for unfair utterances is the right to present opposing viewpoints, not the avoidance of debates by prior restraint of the initial statement. No subject matter is "too controversial."

---

[1] U. S. Congress, Senate Committee on Commerce, Subcommittee on Communications, Fairness Doctrine, 90th Cong., 2nd Sess., 1968, pp. 64–74.

3. Editorial judgment is inevitable when deciding what issues will be discussed. An editor, like a judge, brings subjective values to decision making. We should not tolerate tampering with the philosophy or subjective judgment of either the editor or the judge, but neither should we curb efforts to analyze, criticize or even correct these judgments.

Such evaluation, however, must be open and on the record. Subtle efforts to intimidate through grand jury subpoenas, threats against commercial interests, demands for outtakes, fishing expeditions into confidential records and news sources are not to be tolerated.

4. The FCC must simplify the system for filing fairness complaints and must afford the public access to program records of material already broadcast by television and radio stations.

One of the reasons why it is so difficult for a public complaint to be sustained is the total secrecy of broadcast records. Every station is required to keep program logs for the inspection of the Commission. The logs simply list and classify the programming actually broadcast. Anyone with the time and energy and an accurate clock can himself observe a station and record most of the information in the program logs. With a tape recorder, he could record the actual content. This task is prohibitively expensive and, of course, it cannot be done for time periods which have already past. But the Commission regards the program logs as secret documents. If a member of the public thinks his local station has been one-sided or unfair, he is required by the Commission to meet a very severe burden of proof. He must show that the station presented one viewpoint and did not present the other. The Commission will accept from the licensee its own self-serving summary of its programming and will not ordinarily permit the complainant access even to the program logs much less tapes or transcripts of the program actually broadcast for the purpose of determining the facts. This means that as a practical matter a station can be as onesided as it wants provided it gives a very minimal mention of an opposing view. Making the record of programming already broadcast available for the resolution of complaints would aid greatly in strengthening the Fairness Doctrine.

REGULATION BY THE FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

All discussions of freedom of speech and press, access and fairness eventually lead to the question: Who is to decide?

The broadcaster is convinced that he alone must determine what the public will hear or see. The partisan is equally convinced that he alone can speak for his cause and demands access to do so.

Obviously, someone must decide and, in broadcasting, the task goes to the Federal Communications Commission. If the agency acts arbitrarily, its decisions may be reviewed by the courts. The FCC is an instrument of the Congress and directly responsible to it. The Congress, therefore, can deal with patterns of tyrannical judgment (if they should occur) either by abolishing the agency or changing the laws under which it functions. Similarly, the President, by his appointments, and the Congress, by reviewing those appointments, have a further check on the Commission's possible abuse of power.

As the United States Supreme Court has held, protection of the public right to know must come before safeguarding the absolute power of media owners. The real question before this Senate Committee is not who shall make the decisions to insure freedom of speech on the air but what to do about a supine agency which refuses to take the actions with which it has been charged by the Congress.

For more than forty years, the Federal Communications Commission has resolutely refused to exercise its powers to decide whether or not a broadcast licensee has been acting in the public interest, convenience or necessity sufficiently well to warrant a renewal of its license. Time and again it has refused to regulate on the extraordinary grounds that it has not the facilities, the energy or the staff to do so. Time and again, the courts have returned cases to the Commission with acerbic instructions to take action.

The Commission has both the staff and the legal authority to regulate the broadcasting industry to insure public access and fairness in broadcasting. What it lacks is the desire to regulate.

Members of the public and of Congress who are concerned with the Commission's regulation of broadcasting were hardly surprised to hear the Commission's recent (and subsequently rescinded) decision that AT&T is too powerful to be regulated. This same shrug of the shoulders attitude has exemplified the FCC's unwillingness to administer the broadcast spectrum.

In 1969, then Circuit Judge Warren Burger, utterly frustrated by the FCC's refusal to take appropriate action, ordered the Commission to vacate immediately the license of WLBT-TV. Rarely has a court felt the need to deal so summarily with a Federal agency or to order such a drastic remedy.

The FCC is in an instrument of the United States Congress and is directly responsible to it. How long will Congress allow its own creation to ignore the mandate of the Communications Act?

NEWSPAPERS

I wish to touch briefly on the question of access, balance and fairness in newspapers and the other print media. My view is that the protection of the rights of the public to express itself applies to the print as well as to the electronic media. Although neither ruled directly on this question, both Judge Burger in the WLBT case and Justice White in Red Lion seem to support this position.

No matter what the origin of a monopoly, the result is the same. Whether it is from the physical limitations of the broadcast spectrum, or (as in the case of newspapers) from a combination of economic factors, a serious impediment to speech is created. There is danger to free expression when a single individual or corporate conglomerate owns every newspaper of general circulation in a particular city. This problem is a complicated one. I am not prepared to offer a solution today, but I am convinced that one can, and should, be found.

I call upon the Congress to initiate a comprehensive study of the evils caused by communication monopolies and to find remedies which protect and enhance the First Amendment rights of all the people. I do not know what the results of such a study would be, I ask only that the right of the public to know be placed on at least a par with the media to speak.

Senator ERVIN. You raised some very interesting questions. I am fully cognizant of the problems which the mass media communication, both the printed word and the broadcast word, have.

You expressed the opinion that the printed press could be subjected to the same limitations or regulations which the broadcast media is subject to. I think that raises quite a First Amendment problem itself. Everyone is given the right to freedom of speech, freedom of print, but does that right embrace the right of a person to command that somebody furnish him a media through which to speak?

Reverend PARKER. This is certainly an important issue, which I recognize, and I would like to treat it in a couple of ways. First of all, both in broadcasting and in newspapers, we like to have voluntary recognition of the need of the public. We advise local groups to formulate policies, consult with broadcasters and with newspaper editors about their desire to have their needs covered. And we think that is the best way to do it. But we are very much concerned about the monopoly issue in the places where a single conglomerate will own the television stations, the radio station, and maybe two newspapers. I used to work on the Chicago Daily News and I do not think there was ever any better newspaper publisher than Frank Knight. But I do not think it would have been healthy for the Daily News, even under him, to own the Sun Times as the News does today. I understand the economics of it, but something ought to be done about that. I think the Congress needs to take a careful look at this problem. And when we realize that in the top 50 markets in the country, there is not a single locally owned television station—in most of those cases, the newspapers are also owned by conglomerates—you see what a great problem it is for the local neighborhood group that is trying to get something out of the city council and is not covered. So we need to find a way.

I am not an attorney, and I believe you had Jerry Barron here, who is the one, who is the leader in presenting legal issues in this field.

Senator Ervin. Yes; he made a very fine statement on the subject of what he claimed was the right of access even to the printed page.

Reverend Parker. Yes; I think the papers are recognizing this—the better ones. The New York Times with its Op-Ed page, and this is copied in many newspapers over the country, and some of the smaller papers like those that I mentioned are really careful about covering everything in their communities. But in the case of the Intelligencer Journal in Lancaster, its companion paper, the New Era, owned by the same people, does not give access in the way that the Intelligencer does.

It is just the editor that makes access possible. I do not think that is the way it ought to be.

Now, I do not go for any further legislation to limit the freedom of the press, but I think by enforcing the antitrust laws—you know, here we are a country that is concerned about a monopoly in the making of pencils or the making of typewriters and we are not concerned about a monopoly over the ideas and the facts that come to the people of the United States.

Senator Ervin. I appreciate these very serious problems, but I have to confess that thus far, I have not been able to devise any remedies for them. I think a very good argument has been made for the proposition that if, for example, I invest my money in a newspaper to compel me to give space to somebody by law would be limiting my right of freedom of speech, because I could not use the space I had to give to the other man.

Now, I have to agree with you, and the publishers claim that they do a pretty good job of regulating themselves by giving access to people with opposing views.

I will have to confess that ordinarily, for anybody who says anything about me, I adopt the theory that you should not explain: Your friends will not require it of you and your enemies will not believe your explanation anyway. But I have on several occasions taken my pen in hand and responded to what an editor has said. I have never had a newspaper refuse to print my reply to their editorial after requesting them to do so.

I wonder if this is not one of the areas concerning the printed word where it is better to leave the regulation to the newspapers? It has been left with them except for in one or two States—I think the State of Florida has a statute that requires a newspaper to publish a reply to one of its editorials or news items and I saw where the court ordered a paper to let the mayor in Daytona Beach reply to something the newspaper said about him.

Reverend Parker. I think that we are at a very important watershed in life in this country. The country is in flux. We have been able so far to handle things on a democratic basis and I think we can continue to. But we have never run up against the situation that we have in communication, because in other times when we have come to really serious problems our communication has been close enough to home that the home people could have something to say about it. But leaving out the minority groups like Chicanos and blacks, who claim and quite rightly that they are barred as far as their own thing is concerned—just take the fact of women. You will find all over the country that women can really prove that their views do not get into the newspapers. It really is a news vacuum, all they get is a women's page.

Senator Ervin. You can summon me as a witness. Since the Congress reconvened in January I have been trying to point out the legal inequities in a bill to expand the powers of the EEOC. The debate has occupied the entire time of the Senate for all practical intents and purposes since the 17th day of January, and during that time, I do not believe I have seen a news item about any point that has been made more than that long. [Indicating]

Reverend Parker. But you see, this is a major issue. You take religion. I am not here as an advocate of religion. But the television networks do not cover religion as hard news. Now, the majority of the people of the United States engage in religious practices in one way or another, the majority of the people still say that they are members of churches. But the television networks say, that is out. That is for the Sunday morning ghetto when we cannot sell time and we do not cover religion unless something big comes out of the Vatican or something of that sort, or there is a tremendous upheaval over a statement of the National Council of Churches.

Now, this is what I am talking about. The moguls that control our access to information have to be persuaded to give us the information. And it gets down to the same thing with the newspapers.

Like yourself, I am afraid of legislation, more than legislation, I am afraid of control. Certainly control before the act is impermissible. But somehow, the people have to have this opportunity to have their voices heard.

You know, you cannot go in and horse whip the editor, as you could in Galesburg, Ill., which happened when my grandfather and another man were running for office there. They did go down and take it out on the editor who ignored their point of view. But you cannot do that to Mr. Newhouse. You cannot find him. And this is important.

Senator Ervin. I certainly agree with you 100 percent on that proposition. Our country stakes its very existence as a free society on the First Amendment, and the theory of the First Amendment contemplates that the people shall be permitted to have a great diversity, an expression of all differences of opinions on public questions. And I think it is essential, if our political institutions are to work successfully, that the people do have an opportunity to hear the expressions of opinion by all segments of society as far as public questions are concerned. One of the difficult problems respecting the printed word is to find a remedy which will make that right of the people to have a diversity of voices secure by legal means.

Of course, the Supreme Court held in the Red Lion case that Congress acted within the limits of its power when it established the FCC and regulations for the broadcast industry. I take it your position is that as far as the broadcast industry is concerned, when it is giving the news and its own comments on the news, it should have the right to express it in its own way free from Government limitations.

Reverend PARKER. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. But you take the position that Congress was wise in establishing the Fairness Doctrine with a view to getting an expression of contrary opinion—that is, opinion contrary to that being expressed in the broadcast medium. Such a doctrine is essential to the people's right to know.

Reverend PARKER. Yes, sir. I think that is true.

I also think this, Senator, that the problem would probably go away rather quickly if two things would happen.

If the FCC would take minimal steps in investigate Fairness Doctrine complaints and to examine the record in the public interest, convenience and necessity of stations at the time of renewal. Now, you know, they have never even looked into the methods of the Internal Revenue Service, which manages to keep tens of millions of people pretty much in line by making spot investigations. The FCC does not bother to do that. You have only to fine three or four blatant cases of violations for everybody else to shape up and maybe a determined effort to follow the Fairness Doctrine to this letter.

I also think that if the Congress would take an interest in the problem of access to newspapers and conglomerate ownership which keeps the newspapers from being responsive to their readers, there would very quickly be a reaction to that and it would be a good reaction, it would be in response—it would be toward opening up the papers to views that do not get in there very easily. I think you will find if you took an interest that the papers would hire more women as reporters, they would hire more blacks, they would start listening to people who speak in Spanish, I do not think you would ever need legislation, because they know they are doing the wrong thing by not giving access.

Senator ERVIN. Of course, as far as the printed word is concerned, in my younger days virtually every small city in the United States had competing newspapers.

Reverend PARKER. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And they usually disagreed on a lot of public questions.

Reverend PARKER. Sure.

Senator ERVIN. And they debated pretty well the issues between themselves. But unfortunately, the situation which exists in some sections of the country is like that in my State now: In many places where we used to have two newspapers, now there is only one; or if they still have two papers, the same people own both.

Reverend PARKER. Yes; that is what I am objecting to.

Senator ERVIN. It is an unfortunate situation. From a constitutional standpoint, we say that anybody can go into the newspaper business. However, as a practical matter there is one big restriction—that is, providing that he has the ability to finance it, and today that requires tremendous finances.

Reverend PARKER. Virtually impossible. A group of professors at the college in Lancaster started a paper in competition with the New Era and they managed to stay with it for a year before they all went broke. But they just did not have the capital. You know, they had to go to somebody else's printing plant and so forth. It is almost impossible in an urban area to do it without the capital. So we have to work with what we have.

Senator ERVIN. And of course, at the time the First Amendment was written, I think that most people who wanted to could, like Thomas Paine, print the pamphlets very cheaply and circulate them. We have a different situation now, and as a result, we have some very serious problems in this field which you have pointed out in a very lucid manner. I thank you for a very fine statement.

Reverend PARKER. Thank you, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Mr. Baskir?

Mr. BASKIR. Reverend Parker, would it not be better all around, if we are faced with the twin evils of control by conglomerates, as you mentioned, which limit the channels of communication on the one hand, and the only other alternative being more guidance and regulations by Government, to apply the standard old-fashioned antitrust economic weapons to break this up as a monpoly, as you would if the businesses were pencils and typewriters instead of communications media?

Reverend PARKER. Oh, surely, that is what I am saying. You have the antitrust laws. This Nation is scared stiff of competition in restraint of trade—until we have restraint of ideas. Then we seem to say, well, that is all right, these fellows have a right to make as much money as they can make and they do not have to have a good product and they do not have to compete with each other.

Really, what we have in the regulations is protection of a monopoly instead of protection of the public. I think the antitrust laws should be applied and they should be applied vigorously.

I do not believe that there should be this ownership of a television station, a radio station, and a newspaper in a town. The FCC has said that.

But, it has never done anything. I do not believe the FCC should allow conglomerates to sell to other conglomerates. You know, that is the way conglomerates got going.

The law says when a station comes up for license renewal if somebody else wants to try for the license, there should be a hearing. That is really what the law was meant to do so that there could be competition every once in a while. Instead of that, what has happened? The FCC has okayed every sale of a station without any thought about who is getting it.

So, you have the big conglomerates like Annenberg, then Annenberg sells to Capital Cities, all the stations at one time. Nobody asked when Annenberg came into New Haven, Conn., for instance, where I was living at that time, nobody asked whether Annenberg would give the services to New Haven that were needed, and he did not. Nobody asked when Capital Cities came in.

Now you have Time-Life going to sell out all its stations to McGraw-Hill. If the Chicanos of the country had not gotten in and protested, that sale would have gone through without the FCC probably even reading the papers. But as it is, at least, they have to read the petitions to deny licenses that the Chicanos have filed in five cities.

These stations should have been examined when they were first sold. The conglomerates should not have been allowed to come into being.

Mr. Baskir. Recently, there has been one development which has begun to ease the situation with respect to monopoly newspapers—that is to say, single or only double channels of communications of print. It is the great development of underground newspapers, some of which are quite successful and have very wide distributions, and from some of our other testimony here, becoming better and better quality journals.

Reverend Parker. Yes.

Mr. Baskir. There may be—I am not sure, but there may be an equivalent development with respect to broadcasting in the area of cable television. I wonder if you would comment on the potentials of this, as you see them now, for cable television introducing the kind of diversity of access which might make the Fairness Doctrine and other kinds of rules, and probably more Government control, less important.

Reverend Parker. Well, we are very much interested in cable. Just the day before yesterday, the Office of Communication published a book by Monroe Price and John Wicklein called "Cable Television—A Guide to Citizen Action." And it is a manual for the public, because we think that cable has a very great potential for public interest.

Now, nobody knows, because no cable operator has really tried to serve the public interest rather than being just an entertainment medium. There is a little bit being done on some of the access channels. But we think the potential is there and it should be tried. We are proposing a cable system in Connecticut which will have 37 channels. We think that those channels can really be opened up for political discussions. For example, in the New York area, there is not anybody who runs for the State Legislature or local council that can have access to the mass media because he cannot afford to buy it. If you are going to run for the Senate, for instance, in New Jersey, which is probably the worst State in the country, you have to buy the whole New York metropolitan area and the whole Philadelphia metropolitan area to talk to New Jersey people. Now, cable will let you abstract out the people in a ward or the people in an assembly direct. We think that is terribly important.

We think that cable should be encouraged and not blocked in its development to protect another technology.

It is very important that cable, instead of just being a business enterprise to make money, be encouraged to be a public enterprise for the public good.

Mr. Baskir. Recently, there was an agreement between cable and a broadcaster sited here in Washington, I guess under the auspices of Mr. Whitehead, that some people have been regarding as the "Treaty of Washington." I wonder if you would comment on that agreement and whether you believe that it will help or hinder the development of cable television for the kind of purpose you have been discussing?

Reverend Parker. Well, in the first place, the FCC held extensive hearings and everybody had a chance to testify. I testified to the same panel with Jack Valenti, and Irving Kahn. McGeorge Bundy was on that panel, the head of Public Broadcasting Corp., Mr. Macy, so that everybody had a chance to have his views recorded by the FCC. The FCC has the job of regulation here, and to have a backstairs, closed room agreement brought about by anybody on an important public issue of this kind is unconscionable. The FCC had plenty of information from the people that were involved to make its own decision independently; this, sir, is why I remind you that the FCC is an arm of the Congress. It really was set up when Sam Rayburn and Senator Bone fought this out on the floor.

They set it up as an arm of Congress and it should be looked at by the Congress when it makes agreements like this outside the public forum.

So you can see, I am against this kind of agreement in anything. And of course, it will hold back the development of one technology, cable, to protect the other, television.

Now, we cannot throw broadcasting out the window to let cable get a foothold, because we need the broadcasting and we are going to need it for a long time. But there must be some better way to have cable development, and I think there is. At least, we think that we can demonstrate there is.

Senator Ervin. I would just like to ask a question. Am I correct in the conclusion that you do not advocate that the FCC refuse to renew a license to a broadcasting station because the FCC might disagree with the views expressed by that broadcasting station; but on the contrary, that the FCC should take into consideration merely the question of whether or not that broadcasting station is giving an opportunity for the expression of contrary views and otherwise rendering services to the community?

Reverend Parker. Yes, sir, there are two things. I believe that complaints from the public should be handled promptly, because where there is smoke, there is fire, and the amount of complaining against the broadcasting industry is so great that even the broadcasting industry should start to listen to it. The FCC should have listened to it long ago.

The second thing is the FCC should examine in a judicial manner, the operation of a station at the end of each 3 years. If there was no complaint against a station, I would not say the FCC had to open up a hearing file. But if there are persistent reports from the community that this station is not serving the public interest, then the FCC should look into them and the FCC on its own should look into a sampling of stations to see how they operate, just so the FCC can find out how television and radio are operating. Because they sit here in Washington in a very artificial atmosphere as far as broadcasting is concerned. We sit in New York in a very artificial atmosphere. But when you get out to Cedar Rapids, Iowa, or to Paradise, Calif. or Bakersfield, Calif. you have a very different thing going, and the FCC should go out and find out, make an investigation and make a judicial judgment. That judgment can always be appealed to our courts by either side. So there is constitutional protection. That is my view.

Senator Ervin. Nevertheless, the courts would have the power to reverse the decisions of the FCC if they found they were arbitrary?

Reverend Parker. Yes, sir, and the courts do. They certainly did in the WLBT case where Justice Burger got so upset at the FCC that he revoked the license in his decision.

Senator Ervin. Mr. Ebner?

Mr. Ebner. Reverend Parker, as I am sure you know, the Federal Trade Commission recently recommended to the Federal Communications Commission that they utilize the Fairness Doctrine to require counter-advertising. I would be interested in knowing whether you see any problems in that, First Amendment or otherwise?

Reverend Parker. Yes, there are a lot of problems in it, not the least of which, as we all know, is the problems of clutter. There is enough clutter with the ads without having any more clutter than is necessary. But it is a fact that if there is a substantial viewpoint on the other side, people should not be blocked from presenting it.

For example, I do not think that a man should be blocked from buying an ad simply because it deals with ideas or is counter to other ads. I do not think that people who want to come in and present a viewpoint that is counter to the general run of views in the culture should be prevented from coming on and taking ads. You see, this again is a matter of freedom of access to the media.

Now, when you come down to things where there is a real controversy—the controversy over production at the present time is certainly very acute—you again have to use good judgment, and I would hope that the FCC would. I think they have to follow it on a case law basis. But that is what they are set up for. I am not worried about their overwork load.

You know, you have to make a judgment when you get an ad that says a gasoline is cleaning out the motor and therefore, there is no pollution coming out of the car and somebody who is a scientist says, "Hey, it is the same gasoline as any other."

Now, there are two ways you can look at it. There is the rule of truth in advertising. Advertising is certainly restricted by that, you do have to tell the truth. If you do false advertising, the First Amendment does not apply. Maybe that is the point where you look at it, because I think that is the main thing.

I do not think people really get very much upset about puffery in advertising. I think it is very important that we enforce truthful advertising, just as we want to enforce truth in other things. In fact, the broadcaster is supposed to see that the stuff that goes on the air is truthful.

Does that answer your question?

Mr. Ebner. Well, yes, partially at least.

Reverend Parker. I would go further on this, but I think it has to be looked at by the FCC and I think there has to be a policy established that people can understand.

Mr. Ebner. So you believe that the Fairness Doctrine would be a good device through which to enforce truthful advertising?

Reverend Parker. No, sir. No, sir, I do not say that. I think truth in advertising is a yes or no fact and there are laws to enforce it. I mean the furniture store that comes along and says, we will give you double the value and you do not have to put any money down and our rates are the lowest in the city, which is done on some stations, especially stations that cater to a black audience—that is in and out truth or falsehood and that is covered by the law and you cannot do it. It is these cases where they are grey, you know, where people are coming along and saying, look, this is pollution, this is a poison. They have a right to state their views as long as the views are substantial.

Now, you know, you cannot just give each person who comes along the opportunity, but you do have to pay attention to substantial groups. And I think that Chief Justice Burger really laid it down in the WLBT decision. That is why the Harvard Law Review called it one of the most important in communications law. He defined it as the kind of substantial backing that there had to be for a complainant to be entertained by the FCC. And he really got the FCC off the hook in dealing with people who are making insubstantial complaints.

Senator Ervin. The question about a government agency determining what the truth is, though, is a pretty dangerous thing. The Bible tells us that Pontius Pilate asked the question, what is truth, but he did not pause for an answer. If you are going to have an answer by the FCC in a controversial matter, I would consider that a gross violation of the First Amendment.

Reverend Parker. Well, sir, I would counter that by reminding you that Saint Paul said we all sin and fall short of the glory of God. I have a feeling that the people who control television licenses and certain monopoly newspaper ownerships sin a little more quickly than some of the others of us when there is a lot of money involved.

All I want for the FCC to do is not that they decide what is truth but that they say to me when I come in and I say I have an opposing view and my view is valid, they say, "Yes, sir, you have a right to be heard." That is all I want of them. I do not want them to decide whether my view is valid, just as I do not want the Internal Revenue Service deciding what the practice of religion is. I think we have to keep the Government out of that sort of thing, but we do have to have the Government as a protection for those of us who have no protection against great power.

Senator Ervin. The example I was thinking about involves my home State, which grows tobacco and has a great many manufacturers of tobacco. The FCC has said, we have the complete truth on the matter of smoking and those who disagree with us have none. And a lot of very respectable people disagree with them on it and they cannot be heard.

Reverend Parker. Two things about that. I am troubled by the constitutional implications of the banning of the cigarette advertising. I was not troubled at all at the FCC saying this is a controversial issue and the other side has to have a chance to reply.

I want to say that I am opposed to smoking, I wish I could stop my daughter's smoking, and I have a feeling, too, that if those announcements, which were far more clever than the commercial ones, could have stayed on the air, they would have cut down on smoking. So I have a vested interest, you see.

But seriously, sir, to allow people to reply, to have both views on, is very important. While I might not agree with what the tobacco industry says, I do not want the American people deprived of the views of the tobacco industry. I do not want them deprived of the views of any element in American society. So I would have been happy if it had stayed as a Fairness Doctrine thing.

Now, if cigarettes are poisonous, and I think they are, then the decision is to be made someplace else. If tobacco is really a poison, then it should be proven and the manufacture and distribution should be stopped. If big cars are poisoning the atmosphere so that they are going to kill us, somebody ought to make that decision and there ought to be a law they cannot manufacture cars of a certain kind, but not that you cannot advertise them in one medium.

I do not have much sympathy for broadcasters, but I think in this case I am troubled about the constitutionality.

Senator ERVIN. I do not think you and I are in much disagreement, if any, because I think as long as it is legal to sell a product and the value of that product is in controversy, both sides should have an opportunity to be heard.

Reverend PARKER. Yes, if you tell the truth about the product.

Senator ERVIN. The thing that bothers me is if the Government assumes the right to make a determination about a product which is legal to sell to the general public, it is just one step away from saying that we have the complete possession of the truth in respect to a political question and those who disagree with us have none and can't be heard.

Reverend PARKER. Yes, sir, but nevertheless, the Government does have a right to stop you selling inflammable clothing for children and things of that sort. I am thinking about things where a present danger is proven. Then it ought to be handled under that kind of law.

Senator ERVIN. Yes.

Well, thank you very much. You made a very fine and very interesting statement.

Reverend PARKER. Thank you, sir.

Mr. BASKIR. Mr. Chairman, our next witness this morning is Dean Elie Abel, dean of the Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism, who I think will discuss for the most part problems of public television.

Senator ERVIN. Dean, I want to welcome you to the subcommittee and express our deep appreciation for your willingness to come and testify and give us the benefit of your views in a field in which you are very knowledgeable.

STATEMENT OF DEAN ELIE ABEL, GRADUATE SCHOOL OF JOURNALISM, COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY, NEW YORK

Dean Abel. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am grateful for the opportunity to be here.

You have heard a great many witnesses of diverse views and qualifications. It may be relevant to observe, Mr. Chairman, that I was what used to be called a working reporter for a quarter of a century, 16 years on various newspapers, then in television, before becoming dean of the graduate school at Columbia.

It is fair to add also—I think the committee has a right to know this—that I am a member of the Board of the National Public Affairs Center for Television.

The life I have led, Mr. Chairman, has inevitably shaped my views and attitudes. It should surprise no one that I share your passionate concern for the preservation of the First Amendment. I share also your feeling, expressed in these hearings, that public television in America must be preserved and strengthened. I believe that public television has a vital function and that, in your words, we have got to find some way to make it secure in its financing and also to make it secure against government control of the contents of what is broadcast.

The root question before this country in this area, I suppose, is whether it is possible in our society to have public funding of public television without inviting government control or, at least, government influence upon the matter that is broadcast. The answer, I suggest, is that it is possible, even imperative. To suggest that Americans cannot hope to accomplish what has long since been a fact in other countries, notably Britain and the Federal Republic of Germany, seems to me plain defeatism.

Perhaps the time has come for Americans to study this foreign experience by way of learning that there are other ways, perhaps better ways of operating a public broadcast system that is adequately funded and, at the same time, free from government interference or control. I might add that in Britain—as in Germany, Japan, and other countries—public television offers the viewer a balanced diet of programming, quite apart from news and public affairs, that is in my judgment superior to the day-to-day programming available on either commercial or public television in the United States. Most Americans, I would guess, do not know what they are missing.

When Americans think of high-quality programs they surely have in mind among others, certain imports from the BBC which have caused an appreciable stir in this country: "The Forsyte Saga," "Civilization," "The Wives of Henry VIII," "Masterpiece Theater," to name a few recent examples. Anyone who has lived in London, as I did for almost 3 years in the sixties, could expand that list almost indefinitely with dozens of additional programs never seen in this country. Nor were these programs limited, I might say, to costume drama or high cultural offerings, which is what one thinks of. In fact, we found they had some of the most illuminating and some of the toughest documentaries that I have seen anywhere in the world.

Living in London with my family, I discovered that prime-time television could be something more than a cheap way to fill up an idle evening at home with no strain to the intellect. We discovered that television could be absorbing, exciting, occasionally uplifting.

How do the British or the Germans do it? As between the British Broadcasting Corp. and ARD, the standing committee of broadcasting corporation in the Federal Republic of Germany, there are significant structural differences. The German system is far more decentralized, for example, than the BBC. But the crucial distinction is that both are financed out of license fees, rather than appropriated public funds. In short the consumer pays directly for the broadcast service he receives. A German household with both radio and television receivers pays an annual license fee of 84 deutsche marks, slightly more than $25 at the present rate of exchange. For radio alone, the fee is 24 deutsche marks, slightly less than $8. In Britain, the comparable rates are six pounds sterling ($15.60) for black-and-white TV, with an additional charge of 5 pounds ($15.30) for color; 1 pound, 5 shillings ($3.25) for radio only.

In both countries these license fees are collected by the post office, which is entitled to withhold its own collection charges. The greater part of the funds collected in this way cannot be used for any other purpose; they must go to support public broadcasting. In Britain, for example, the Ministry of Posts and Telegraphs turned over to the BBC in 1969–70 (the last year for which I have actual figures) 21 million pounds earmarked for BBC radio and 72 million pounds for BBC television. That is an impressive amount of money, Mr. Chairman, more than $170 million at the current exchange rate for television alone. When you consider that British production costs are substantially lower than in the United States and the geographic area to be covered is a great deal smaller than our own, it becomes clear that we have been treating public television in this country as a poor relation. The administration bill now before the Congress provides all of $45 million to fund the corporation for public broadcasting in the next fiscal year; after that we leave it to the foundations and whatever private contributions the stations can scrape together in their own communities. The administration, moreover, has decided (as Dr. Whitehead informed this committee on February 2) that 1972 is simply not an appropriate time to try to push through this session of Congress a long-range financing plan.

Long term financing has been promised by President Johnson and by President Nixon repeatedly. It seems to me the only realistic alternative to a dedicated tax or to a license fee on the British or German model, if we mean what we say about insulating public broadcasting from political control or pressure. It is saddening to me to recall that the Carnegie Commission on Educational Television specifically recommended a dedicated tax and that the administration of the day, or the Congress, or both, chose to ignore that recommendation. That seemed to me a precious opportunity to set up the kind of television system that you, Mr. Chairman, and I, and millions of Americans, possibly including Dr. Whitehead himself, would like to see. However, the national opportunity was fumbled. I am not here calling for an instant replay.

I have some difficulty, I must confess, trying to reconcile Dr. Whitehead's concern for the First Amendment with the administration's refusal to send the Congress a long-term financing proposal. In my opinion, he cannot have it both ways. If he cares about a free sturdy public broadcasting system in the United States, how does he justify letting one more year go by—a presidential election year at that—without making the effort to secure the long-term financing we have long been promised? Nor is that the only apparent contradiction in what we can learn of the White House attitude. Let me cite several others:

On the one hand, Dr. Whitehead has told this committee that the Federal Government has no business running a broadcast network—a statement with which I wholeheartedly agree. On the other, he tells the Corporation for Public Broadcasting what kinds of programs it ought to put on, what segment of the national audience it ought to be reaching for and what kinds of broadcasters it ought to employ. All this unsolicited advice is reinforced, incidentally, by a fairly direct suggestion that if these matters are not arranged to his satisfaction or to that of his bosses, the system as a whole will be denied the long-term financing it so desperately needs. And all this in the name, Heaven help us, of the First Amendment.

On January 17, 1972, in a special report on National Public Radio, Dr. Whitehead stated that there was in his mind a real question as to whether public television, particularly the national federally funded part of public television, should be carrying public affairs, news commentary, and that kind of thing. His reasons were: (a) that the commercial networks, by and large, do quite a good job in that area and (b) that there is an irreconcilable conflict between government funding and journalistic freedom.

Here again I have some difficulty reconciling Dr. Whitehead's general satisfaction over the good job the commercial networks are doing with Vice President Agnew's complaints to the contrary. Is the administration of two minds on this matter? Does Dr. Whitehead or Mr. Agnew more nearly reflect President Nixon's own thinking? I wish I knew. I have no way of answering these questions but the contradictions seem to me apparent. Perhaps as you jurists say, Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of circumstances altering cases.

Perhaps more important is Dr. Whitehead's contention that there is something inherently improper about a public television system, funded in part by Federal dollars, getting into public affairs programing at all. In making this argument, I would submit that Dr. Whitehead has managed to ignore the letter and the spirit of the Federal Communications Act, the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967, and if I may say so, also the Carnegie Commission Report. This is the same document that he has quoted with solemn approval on other occasions as if it were graven in stone. I need not remind this distinguished committee of the Senate that the Federal Communications Act requires of all broadcasters, whether commercial or noncommercial, that they should present adequate and diverse programming in the area of public affairs, both local and national.

This is not a matter of debate, sir.

Section 307 of the Communications Act requires all broadcasters to operate in the public interest. Section 315(a) of the act further defines this requirement by its stipulation that broadcasters operate in the public interest and must afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance. In the most recent interpretation, Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 373 U.S. 367 (1969), the Supreme Court noted that the Communication Act did not merely require broadcasters to present the other side of a public issue, once an initial viewpoint on that issue had been presented; it imposed a broad affirmative responsibility on every broadcaster to present diverse public affairs programing.

The Court stated that the fundamental principle common to the Communications Act and the FCC's Fairness Doctrine was that the public had a right to be informed on the great issues of the day, and to receive suitable access to social, political, aesthetic and other ideas and experiences through the broadcast media.

Further, public television licensees, like commercial broadcasters, when applying for renewal of their broadcast licenses, must specifically list the percentage of time during a typical broadcast week that is devoted to "news", "public affairs," and "other nonentertainment" programs. Each must submit to the FCC a detailed account of the station's public affairs policies and programing during the past license period. As defined in the FCC's renewal application, "public affairs" includes "talks, commentaries, discussions, speeches, editorials, political programs, documentaries, forums, panels, roundtables, and similar programs primarily concerning local, national and international public affairs." (Emphasis added) Thus, a licensee is expected not only to deal with matters of purely local interest and concern but, as noted in Red Lion to deal on a national and international basis with what the judgment describes as matters of great public concern.

As I read the law, Mr. Chairman, there can be nothing improper or illegal about the presentation of national public affairs programs on public television, Dr. Whitehead to the contrary notwithstanding. Instead, I find a positive legal obligation to present such programing. It is theoretically possible, of course, that each of public television's 215-plus stations across the land could somehow fulfill its obligations under the Communications Act by producing its own national and international programing. The trouble with that solution is that it is altogether too theoretical. The resources, human and financial, simply do not exist at station level to comply with the legal obligation imposed by the FCC. Any more than the resources exist in a small to medium-sized local newspaper you were talking about, sir, for staff coverage of national and international affairs; in fact that capacity does not exist in any but a handful of local commercial stations across the country. That is why newspapers subscribe to the Associated Press or the United Press or any number of additional supplementary services. That is why commercial stations, wherever possible, affiliate with one or other of the commercial networks. If public television is to grow and prosper, the stations that make up the system must, in much the same way, be capable of receiving national public affairs programing produced outside their own limited facilities.

There is, however, a more affirmative argument to be made. It comes, eloquently expressed, from a Committee on Broadcasting established by the British Government in 1960 under Sir Harry Pilkington as chairman. The Pilkington report makes the point, eloquently, that:

> By its nature, broadcasting must be in a constant and sensitive relationship with the moral condition of society. Broadcasters are, and must be involved; this gives them a responsibility they cannot evade.

Public broadcasting, even more than its commercial counterpart, must be involved with the people and their concerns. It can shun the people and their concerns, only at the risk of becoming irrelevant. The Carnegie Commission report itself, in which Dr. Whitehead claims to discover some mysterious sanction for the dumping of public affairs, had some cogent things to say about this affirmative responsibility back in 1967.

Chapter 4 of the Carnegie report foresaw a major role for public television in extending public knowledge and understanding of contemporary affairs. "Its programing of the news should grow," the Carnegie Commission held:

> To encompass both facts and meaning, with information and interpretation. It should be historian, in addition to being daily journalist. Its programs should—give perspective and depth to interpretation of the news, in addition to coverage of news day by day."

At another point, the Carnegie report talks of the need for public television to assess the significance of news events whether they happen to involve a strike, a mine disaster, a Supreme Court decision or a new scientific discovery. "The bare reporting of incidents," the report continues:

> Is not sufficient to meet the responsibilities we see for public television. Programs should find ways to show us the context of incidents, the past and present from which they spring, the impact they may make on tomorrow."

Mr. Chairman, I agree with the Carnegie Commission; I fail to see how any of these necessary objectives can be met by barring public television from the field of national public affairs. It seems to me clear beyond question that Dr. Whitehead has no warrant for claiming that his attitude is in line with the Carnegie report.

A public television system that is prohibited by law or administrative edict or plain cowardice in the board room from examining the people's concerns is a system without brains or heart. That kind of system is not worth a single dollar of public money. I would rather see it abolished.

Finally, let us look briefly at the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967 and the intent of Congress in passing it. It was this piece of legislation that established the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. Far from declaring public affairs programing to be off limits, the report of the Senate Committee on Commerce, with Senator Pastore as chairman, said:

> Although the aims of noncommercial broadcasting should be directed toward cultural and information programs ,it should not be so highly specialized, however, that it caters only to the most esoteric tastes. Particularly in the area of public affairs, your committee feels that noncommercial broadcasting is uniquely fitted to offer in-depth coverage and analysis which will lead to a better informed and enlightened public.

The committee indeed was so firmly persuaded that public television must play a major role in public affairs programing that it felt constrained to warn commercial broadcasters not to use the passage of the act and this new element as an excuse for doing less of this kind of programing on their own. So much for legislative history.

Mr. Chairman, let this committee not be misled by those who portray this issue as an either or choice between local and national programing. That is a very clear device being used by the administration. The truth is, and the administration knows it, that we need both strong, well-financed and creative local stations together with strong, well-financed and creative national program services. It is wrong-headed, in my judgment, and demagogic, to exploit the manifest poverty of most noncommercial stations by raising the specter of some shadowy fourth network that must necessarily gobble up the available funds.

I am reminded that the late President Kennedy, while in the Senate, resolved a remarkably similar false dilemma by breaking step with his own Massachusetts delegation to vote for the St. Lawrence Seaway. He was bitterly accused of betraying his home port of Boston, which was supposed to shrivel and die the moment ocean-going ships could unload directly in Toledo, Detroit, or Milwaukee. "The rising tide," Senator Kennedy said, "will float all the boats."

Just as the false dilemma between the Atlantic seaboard and the Great Lakes was resolved by at last building the Seaway, so also does it lie within the power of this Congress to resolve the false dilemma between local and national needs in public television. The answer is that rising tide; the answer is more money for the whole system, as provided in the legislation proposed by Congressman Torbert MacDonald now being considered in the House, or as you might recall it, the other place.

I would remind you that bill does carry a specific earmarking, a provision earmarking 30 percent of the revenue for local stations.

I happen to believe that a well-financed public television system, properly insulated from the kinds of political pressure now being brought to bear upon the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, is a national necessity. I happen to believe in competition, Mr. Chairman; competition of ideas as well as business, and I am persuaded that the best way to raise standards in commercial broadcasting is to offer the viewers an alternative; that seems to me a wiser course than to place our hope in tougher and ever tougher FCC regulation. I happen to believe that a competing public television system such as I have sketched here will do a great deal to raise the prevailing standards of public-affairs programing at CBS, NBC, and ABC.

For those among you who may be inclined to doubt the potential influence of this puny public system upon the giant networks, let me cite a few examples: It was, to begin with, the success of public television with the "Forsyte Saga" and other BBC imports that led first CBS ("The Wives Of Henry VIII") and than NBC to turn to the same program source. The less graphic are two examples, one a program on NBC called "Chronolog" (formerly "First Tuesday"), and one on CBS called "Sixty Minutes."

Both seem to me lineal descendants of the Public Broadcast Laboratory in terms of approach, technique and to a degree also of format. Thus if PBL has to be accounted a failure, if we must do that, sir, I would ask you to remember that it was probably one of the most influential failures of our time. I say we need more of them.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator ERVIN. We have attempted in conducting this hearing to obtain the expressions of all kinds of viewpoints in respect to all different media of communications.

Dean ABEL. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And I think we have done a fairly good job in that respect. You have made a most significant contribution. I think we have here in Washington an exceedingly fine public broadcasting station, WETA. I have to confess that it has gotten to be perhaps my favorite station.

Dean ABEL. I am delighted to hear that.

Senator ERVIN. They have many programs which are most informative and have a tendency to expand our intellectual horizons.

Dean ABEL. Exactly.

Senator ERVIN. We also have an excellent public broadcasting station at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. It carries great programs that you never get on the commercial stations.

Dean ABEL. Right.

Senator ERVIN. I am much concerned about the Congress' understanding of the Public Broadcasting. I am very much impressed with your reference to the experiences in Germany and England of financing these by fees paid voluntarily by the people. I have also felt there is a danger of depending upon appropriations by Congress, because while our Constitution has many virtues, some of the virtues may handicap things. For example, the idea, and it is quite a good idea in the longrun, that one Congress can't tie the hands of a succeeding Congress by insuring long range public financing out of appropriated funds. It does seem to me, though, that the approaches you have pointed out as having been taken in Britain and Germany are approaches which are quite feasible.

Also, I agree with you thoroughly in the idea that you would destroy a large part of the value of public broadcasting if you excluded from public broadcasting the presentations of programs dealing with public questions.

Dean ABEL. Right.

Senator ERVIN. I saw on WETA sometime ago a program which was under the charge of Bill Moyers which dealt certainly with a public question. In my State there is quite a controversy between the local people and local government in northwestern North Carolina and the Federal Power Communication as to how the New River shall be developed, which method of development will be best in the public interest. Mr. Moyers prepared a magnificent program and I would think that a public broadcasting station in a situation like that could, if anybody wanted to present a counter program, present it and let the people concerned make the choice between the conclusions of the two programs.

Dean ABEL. I do not happen to know the details surrounding that particular program, but I am reasonably confident that if there was a reasonably impressive case to be made on the other side or if there were enough protests, of course, the time would be made available.

Senator ERVIN. I would think so if it were presented dispassionately by a broadcasting station which had no interest whatever in the problem beyond merely presenting the problem in a fair and objective manner. I also agree with you on the idea that we have to avoid at all costs letting the Government dominate the contents of the programs on public broadcasting, as well as programs of other commercial broadcastings where they are merely expressing their own views. I think the First Amendment would certainly be thwarted if Government exercised a control and influence over what any media of communications should say.

Dean ABEL. Right.

Senator ERVIN. Mr. Baskir?

Mr. BASKIR. I have just one question, Mr. Chairman.

As I understand it, part of the administration's proposal for the financing of public broadcasting would not only involve giving a large portion of the funds to local stations, but would allocate that money through instrumentality of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Without discussing the problem of the balance between central and local financing, I wonder what your view is to using HEW as the medium of allocating these funds and whether that would increase the independence of local stations?

Dean ABEL. No, sir. I have to tell you in all honesty that I have the impression that HEW has already become the largest bureaucracy in this country and in the nature of that kind of bureaucratic machinery, more and more people duplicating and triplicating more and more other people's work, I think it would be bizarre, it would be unthinkable, to add all that confusion of responsibility for parceling out money as between one local station and another.

The Corporation for Public Broadcasting exists. It was created by this Congress and it is quite capable of doing that job if Congress will vote whatever monies are required according to whatever formula Congress decides. I do not know why we have to be back into the Federal Government to distribute this money. That seems to me a most unwise provision.

Senator ERVIN. It would seem to me if the problem is that of Government control and we are worried about long term as opposed to short-term financing, and short-term financing increases Government control, the worst of any conceivable possible worlds is to have that money doled out by the executive branch, be it HEW or any other part of it.

Dean ABEL. I am bound to agree with that. I would oppose any part of the executive branch getting into the business of doling out money. But I thought it was worth mentioning that HEW is already a fairly large bureaucracy which is having a fairly difficult time, I think, getting its job done.

Mr. EBNER. I have just one question.

Dean Abel, during Dr. Whitehead's testimony before the subcommittee, he expressed concern at what he said was an increasing tendency on the part of public broadcasting to concentrate on those areas of programing in which he felt the public objection, I take it to establishment-type programing, was the strongest. He thought there was a danger in this of provoking control through the political process.

Simply stated, he felt that this type of establishment programing would irritate members of the public who would therefore express their concern to their elected public officials, who would in turn be motivated to take some action with regard to public broadcasting. Do you see any merit in this view?

Dean ABEL. I suppose one ought to be very grateful to Dr. Whitehead for trying to warn us of all these dangers ahead. But in the processes, I would suggest that Dr. Whitehead is not hesitating to tell the Public Broadcasting System in the name of the White House what it ought to do and how it ought to do it and that, in any judgment, is not what he is there for.

I have a very serious question in my mind, and it came up earlier in Dr. Parker's testimony. Why do we have a FCC at all? This office of Dr. Whitehead's was, I gather, as recently as the last administration, a matter of one elderly general and a secretary who were concerned only with the allocations of frequencies for the use of our armed services within the broadcasting spectrum. Mr. Whitehead now has a staff of 80 people, I am told. It is a nice question in my mind, by what authority that kind of operation has grown as quickly as it has and whether he has any proper business in this at all.

He is entitled to his opinion as one citizen, but I must say I must take exceptions to his coming down here and going around the country saying, I love the First Amendment so deeply that I do not want to see it hurt. Therefore, I will now interfere with your freedom to make editorial decisions. Because that is what he is doing.

Senator ERVIN. I take it your answer to the question, then, the short answer, is no, you do not share his feelings on that particular point?

Dean ABEL. I do not. I am grateful for his solicitude, but I think he is going about it the wrong way.

Senator ERVIN. I think you have put your finger on a very peculiar development in Government of recent years, in which Presidents of both political parties have a tendency to set up in the White House duplicate departments and agencies of the Federal Government. For example, we have almost a little State Department at the White House—it may be a petty good system. The questions involving broadcasting operate in the field of the FCC, to a certain extent, and it causes us in the Congress a lot of confusion when you really do not know where the real power lies.

Dean ABEL. That is right.

Senator ERVIN. And HEW has gotten so large that I do not think anybody knows what all its functions are.

Dean ABEL. Right.

Senator ERVIN. Well, you have made a most helpful contribution and I am much impressed with this idea of voluntary fees made by the people who want to see public broadcasting. That would certainly divorce it from Government financing and insure its independence.

Of course, I will have to say there also is danger of politicians doing something that is unwise, but I was very much encouraged in this field of the First Amendment by the fact that the House did not back up the idea of one of its committees that the committee should have the unpublished records assembled by CBS in "The Selling of the Pentagon." I think the committee was actually trying to point out to the people that CBS had not exercised its First Amendment privileges in a manner satisfactory to the committee and the committee thought they should be exercised. However, I certainly am opposed to letting any governmental agency, even a congressional one, pass on the way in which citizens, the broadcast media or the print media, exercise their first amendment rights.

Thank you very much for your appearance.

Dean Abel. Thank you, sir.

Senator Ervin. The subcommittee stands adjourned. We will hold the record open for about 2 weeks for any additional statement.

(Whereupon, at 11:35 a.m. the subcommittee adjourned,)

STATEMENTS SUBMITTED FOR THE RECORD

STATEMENT OF JAMES Q. WILSON BEFORE THE SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

(James Q. Wilson is Professor of Government and Chairman of the Department of Government at Harvard University. He was formerly Director of the Joint Center for Urban Studies of MIT and Harvard. He served as a member of the Sloan Commission on Cable Communications. The views expressed in this statement are entirely his own and do not necessarily reflect the views of any of the above organizations.)

We are seeing in this country the emergence of two different communications media, one free and the other not, one protected by the First Amendment and the other subject to the growing regulatory attentions of courts and commissions. The free medium is that of the printed page; the unfree medium that of the broadcast message. There is no Federal Book Commission and no Federal Newspaper Commission, and any proposal to create such bodies and empower them to license publishers and regulate the content of their publications would be quickly and rightly denounced. But there is a Federal Communications Commission that has such licensing powers and is requiring such regulatory powers; moreover, we are hearing on every side growing demands for it to be more vigorous in the use of those powers. Ironically, those who would be most appalled by efforts to regulate the print medium seem most in favor of efforts to control the broadcast one.

There are four justifications for regulation of the broadcast medium. Three of these have, in my view, no validity at all and the fourth is partially valid only under certain limited (and changeable) circumstances. The first is that space on the electromatic spectrum is scarce and signal interference will result without regulation. This, indeed, was the reason for the passage of the Communications Act. But the prevention of interference is a technical problem of frequency allocation that need not entail any regulatory controls at all or even a license-renewal process. Furthermore, it is not even clear that there is a "shortage." The average resident of a metropolitan area is exposed to far more radio and television stations than to newspapers and the number of such stations is growing at a time when the number of metropolitan newspapers has been static or declining. Finally, there are in almost every area substantial numbers of unused frequencies, including television frequencies, particularly on the UHF band.

The second argument is that the "airwaves are public property and should therefore be used in the public interest." It is far from clear, however, in what sense the public "owns" the airwaves, or how such ownership as exists conveys any regulatory rights. The public also "owns" the streets on which newspapers are sold and delivered and owns some of the forests from which trees are taken to make newsprint, but no one is proposing that newspapers operate "in the public interest." And most importantly, I had supposed that the reason for the passage of the First Amendment to the Constitution was that Americans were not prepared to trust any agency of government to determine what constituted the public interest in the field of information and ideas.

Third, broadcast messages should be regulated, it is claimed, because they have no extraordinary, even hypnotic, impact on the listening and viewing audience. Even if the impact is as great as alleged, this is tantamount to saying that ideas should be subject to a regulatory constraint when they are powerful. This is not the premise that animated those men who spoke out against laws aimed at controlling certain religions because their ideas were powerful, nor the premise that kept us from the political control of motion pictures when they were supposedly exerting "hypnotic" effects. But the impact of the broadcast message is not well-known. For example, there have been repeated efforts to measure scientifically the effect of television violence on children, including a major new effort commissioned by the Surgeon General, and the results are at best equivocal—depending on the many other factors and on what measure of "violence" is used, there may or may not be a media effect on behavior.

The final reason for some degree of regulation has some plausibility. Commercial broadcasters, especially television broadcasters, must show programs that attract as large a listening or viewing audience as possible. To act otherwise is to sacrifice advertiser revenue. While from time to time, partly in order to satisfy their own desire to do good, networks and stations will show programs with low audience ratings, the general and inevitable thrust of their programming is based on the assumption, which I believe is quite correct, that they are in the mass entertainment business. This means that programs that are offensive to any significant number of viewers or which have only a limited and specialized appeal will rarely be shown. An important consequence of this is that the access that indivduals with specialized or controversal interests have to the broadcast media is much less than their access to the print media. Speciality magazines catering to political or cultural minorities need not compete with each other or with the mass circulation magazines and newspapers; they can accumulate their own audience, often a quite profitable one. And even in the mass circulation publications, controversy and special interests can be printed because the reader can easily skip over what he does not like and read what he does like, all the while noting, for whatever value it may have, the advertisements interspersed among the articles.

Many critics of broadcasting recognize the consequences of making a mass appeal but fail to understand its causes. To them, especially to many writers and other creative persons, the consequences result from the wickedness or commercial corruption of the network and station owners. While I would be the last to claim these executives have any more virtue than the rest of us, I see no reason to believe they have any less. They are responding in the only way they can to the reward system that exists in an industry which competes for mass audiences by the presentation of sequential entertainment images which perish the instant they are produced. It is easy to understand, however, why the advocates of greater control over broadcasting can justify their demands by the argument that such control already is exercised by network and station executives responsible only to themselves, their pocketbooks, and their advertising clients.

The regulatory framework that has developed around broadcasting—the license-renewal process, the right-to-reply rule, the fairness doctrine, the limitations placed on network programming during prime time—is based on an effort to regulate cultural variety and political diversity into a medium the very structure and indeed existence of which depends on the maintenace of relatively homogenous mass entertainment. Such efforts are bound to fail, or at best to lead to unexpected and probably undesirable consequences. Public policy is rarely effective when it seeks to use regulatory sanctions in opposition to the interests and preferences of a large segment of the population. Public policy is more effective when it seeks ways of harnessing self-interest to serve larger objectives.

Consider the history of the effort to tell broadcasters what the "public interest" requires. In 1940 a Boston radio station had its license renewed only after it promised that it would cease broadcasting editorials and cease expressing views on controversial questions. By 1946 the FCC had decided that "public service" required that stations offer programs that cater to minority views, some of which, presumably, would be controversial. By 1949 it had changed its mind about editorializing provided that it met the criterion of "overall fairness." "Fairness" has meant in theory that a broadcaster has "an affirmative duty generally to encourage and implement the broadcast of all sides of controversial public issues." In practice this means that there is a tax on controversy—if a station broadcasts a program, even a sponsored one, favoring fair employment practices, opposing pay television, attacking fluoridation, or favoring nuclear disarmament, free time must be given to those who have different points of view. Indeed, the most recent formulations of the doctrine hold that the station must actively seek out opponents and give them a chance to reply. These are all costs to the broadaster.

In general, when we tax something, we are raising the price of it. How vigorously would the National Review, the New Republic, the New York Review of Books, or Human Events press their own views on the pages of their magazines if they also had to pay a "controversy tav"—namely, seek out opponents and offer them, free of charge if necessary, equivalent space on their pages?

Recent court decisions have held that advertising may also be subject to the same considerations of fairness. Ecologists may claim, as a matter of right, the chance to broadcast, free if necessary, advertisements attacking pollution if stations broadcast advertisements selling automobiles or gasoline.

No one is opposed to fairness—that is what makes it so difficult to think clearly about the problems created by government and court pressures to change the content of broadcasting. We think it is fair for the people to hear both sides of an issue, and therefore we conclude that it is only fair that broadcasters be required to tell both sides of an issue. But that is not the way serious debate is conducted. Debate is most vigorous when people can behave as partisans, and partisanship is not enhanced when those who manage the forum in which partisanship will occur know that if they don't put on the right mix of viewpoints their right to do business will be challenged before a government agency.

Indeed, the fairness doctrine imples a curious, and I think unsatisfactory, theory of argument in a democratic society. It does not say that it is public policy to insure the presentation of all points of view on important subjects, but only that if a broadcaster offers one point of view, he must offer a chance to some opponent to present another point of view. In short, the media may be as bland as it wishes, but should it say something controversial, it must add the phrase, 'but on the other hand . . ." What we really desire, I suggest, is an institutional structure that makes it easy for partisans of many causes to make partisan statements about those causes. We need, not a fairness doctrine, but a diversity doctrine.

The current challenges to broadcasters in the name of fairness or public-service programming may serve the cause of fairness, but they are not likely to serve the cause of diversity. The powers that have always lay dormant in the Federal Communications Act have been discovered, not just—or even primarily—by the FCC, but by various interest groups all over the country. Many of them are using the courts or the license-renewal process to activate those regulatory powers. The message in each case is the same—"do it my way, or don't do it at all." Broadcast what I want to hear, or I will try to prevent you from broadcasting at all. What these groups want ranges all the way from more classical music to more rock music, from fewer Italians in crime programs to more Mexican-Americans in non-crime programs.

In the short run, the effect of these challenges is not likely to be thought ominous—in part because the changes will be slow in coming and in part because the changes are principally being sought by the same groups normally thought to be defenders of free speech, namely, liberals. But the regulatory powers conferred on the FCC by the decision in the Red Lion case and the license-renewal powers the FCC already has are not the exclusive property of liberals: they can be used by all points of the political spectrum. And in time they will be. I have heard few liberals protesting the fact that a small radio station broadcasting anti-black propaganda was forced off the air; we will wait and see what their views are if a small black-owned station is challenged for broadcasting anti-white propaganda.

Diversity of opinion and variety in culture will not be achieved by efforts to regulate these things into a commercial structure designed for mass entertainment. What is more likely to happen is that regulation will insure that while we will have editorials, they will be banal ones; that while we will have a mix of ethnic groups portrayed, each will be portrayed as inoffensively, which is to say, as unrealistically, as possible; that while we will have public service programming and community interest features, they will be ones that few viewers will be tempted to watch.

Diversity of opinion and variety in culture will become available in broadcasting, especially in television, only when the structure of that medium is altered in such a way as to make it economically and technically feasible to serve specialized and partisan audiences with specialized and partisan programming. There are at least two ways of achieving this.

The first is by abandoning, except perhaps as a last-resort method for dealing with the most blatant abuses, the fairness doctrine and the renewal hearing process as devices for improving the quality of broadcasting. They have not significantly improved things in the past, they are not likely to in the future, and the costs (in litigation, in hearings, in record-keeping, and in the exercise of inhibiting constraints) will be burdensome for everyone but the lawyers whose fees are enhanced by such trials by ordeal. In the place of these regulatory devices, I would substitute some form of statutory right of access to broadcast facilities for any and all groups who would pay a nondiscriminatory fee on a first-come, first-served basis. Any legal advertisement would be accepted. Some part of television broadcasting might also become a genuine Town Hall or an oral letters-to-the-editor column. To a great extent, this has already happened, without legislative stimulus, on radio in the form of the talk shows. The broadcaster would have to be absolved of liability for the use to which this access is put.

The second is to end the barriers to the development of cable television in such a way that enables it to compete fairly, and without real or hidden subsidies, with over-the-air broadcasting. Cable, as you all know, holds the promise of ending channel scarcity and of making possible a realistic test of pay television. It also holds the promise of substantially reducing programming costs for certain forms of communication and of permitting the national linkage of specialized audiences so that groups with specialized interests and views could be simultaneously reached available. A guaranteed right of access will initially mean a few commercials, plus some talk shows, against the war in Viet Nam and in favor of ecology. Even a cable system or a right of access with high acceptance in the prime markets, such as New York, will mean in the near future only better reception, additional syndicated re-runs and movies, and a greater variety of athletic events.

But I would argue that such a prediction, however realistic, is not an argument against the strategy. What we are concerned about, after all, is access for specialized, unpopular, or controversial broadcast material. By definition there is no large market for that: if there were, if would be found on NBC or CBS at 9 p.m. on Wednesday evenings. There is no large market for the opinions to be found in the National Review or the New Republic, at least compared to the market for the Readers' Digest, yet the more sectarian views are there for those who wish to consume them. And those who want them have no trouble finding them. They may complain that their views do not attract as wide an audience as does Flip Wilson, but they have no right to insist that their presentations should pre-empt the time or channel allotted to Mr. Wilson.

It would be foolish to claim too much for a strategy of unregulated, diverse channels of communications. The best that can be said for it is that it has none of the costs, and more of the benefits, of the present strategy of regulating a few scarce channels. Should the new strategy be adopted, we will not find ourselves suddenly transported into the world of vigorous television debate. Nor, I suspect, is that the world most people really want. The prospect recalls to mind Oscar Wilde's observation that the problem with socialism is that it takes too many of one's evenings.

THE DETROIT NEWS,
DETROIT, MICH., October 4, 1971.

Senator SAM J. ERVIN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, Committee on the Judiciary, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR ERVIN: In response to your September 15 letter, and after talking with Mr. Pursley of your staff, I submit the following statement. Needless to say, if the Committee should have any questions I would be glad to answer them either in writing or in person.

First I should point out that I speak only as the Editor of The Detroit News, not as a representative of the profession as a hole. As a matter of fact, I know that some of my colleagues in the profession will disagree in part with my approach.

PROTECTION OF CONFIDENCES

Your letter asks for my opinion of S1311.

Let me say as a generalization that I and my newspaper have long taken the position that we would prefer to have legislative bodies stay out of the newspaper business. Certainly we want no new laws restricting present operation of the free American press and, in consistency's name, we carry that to the point of wariness about any legislation which would give special privilege to newspapers.

Along this line we see some inconsistency in the more extreme positions of some of our colleagues who, while on the one hand defending a national "right to know" which would make everyone else divulge information, seemingly would exempt "responsible"editors and broadcasters from any required contribution to that public "right."

The one very limited exception we would make is in the case of a newsman with a legitimate need to protect a confidential news source.

Having read S1311 I, as a newspaper editor, see no objection to it. I would have to qualify that by adding that I am not an attorney and that someone more trained in the law might point out some "fishhook" not apparent to me from a reading of the Bill.

I favor a spelled-out and reasonably qualified legal statement of a newspaperman's privilege to protect confidential information. I note in this respect that Solicitor General Erwin N. Griswold, speaking recently to the Supreme Court, said:

"The news media have functioned effectively and efficiently in this country for almost 200 years without a reporter's privilege. Since the early days of the Republic, the news-gathering profession has depended in large part on information given reporters in confidence. Despite the fact that American informants have always been faced with the possibility that some day before some grand jury investigating criminal activity the reporter might be called upon to devulge his sources, the flow of governmental information has increased significantly over the years."

No editor could deny the basic truth of Mr. Griswold's statement. It appears however to leave out certain facts:

First, various states, 17 I believe, have legislation protecting a reporter's right to maintain confidence. A similar privilege should, I believe, be extended to the federal system. Second, Mr. Griswold's statement takes no account of the fact of an increasing number of legislative committees, both state and federal, inquiring into matters where the purposes of their investigation might be helped by forcing newspapermen to reveal their confidences.

Still more basic and left out of Mr. Griswold's statement is the history of how newspapermen since the early days of our Republic have protected confidences. Generations of reporters and editors have ducked, stalled, dodged, sometimes committed perjury, and frequently gone to jail, in defense of their conviction that protection of sources of confidential information is both a moral obligation and a practical necessity if newspapers are to make an investigative contribution to a better and more honest society. I want to reemphasize that my support is solely for legislation which would protect a reporter's "confidential information." Here I reluctantly disagree with some of my editorial colleagues who seemingly would demand for the communications media a privilege going far beyond that now accorded to lawyers, ministers and doctors.

A minister for instance, who from his pulpit sees a crime committed in the midst of his congregation could not refuse to testify on the basis of the privilege surrounding information given to him in the confessional. A doctor on a house call who witnessees a crime cannot claim a physician-patient relationship in refusing to testify; the same apparently applies to a lawyer who might witness a crime not directly connected with any information given him in confidence by a client.

Similar limits, it seems to me, logically apply to a newspaper reporter. Sent out on a straight news assignment, he can hardly claim professional privilege of refusal to testify as to what he sees. Again however I would support legislation that would protect the reporter against the necessity of later testifying as to information given him following his assurance that it would be kept confidential.

SUBPOENAS IN GENERAL

Your Committee asks my views concerning the general effect of governmental subpoenas on newsmen's ability to do their job. Like every metropolitan editor I have found that subpoenas, both by prosecutors and defense counsel and by contending lawyers in civil cases, can be both burdensome and disruptive. Chiefly, this comes about when lawyers or legislative investigators essentially are on fishing expeditions trying to find in newspaper offices data which might help their presentations. Usually, it would seem to me this matter can and should be controlled by the judge or legislative committee chairman who issues the subpoena; the big exception, I repeat, is in the case of a subpoena calling on a newspaperman to reveal confidential information.

PENTAGON PAPERS

On the matter of the release by newspapers of classified information and the goverment's effort to enjoin such publication, I attach herewith a copy of a June 27, 1971, editorial which I wrote and had published on the front page of The Detroit News. It expressed our disagreement with the inference by New York Times attorneys that they were speaking for the whole press when they defended before the Supreme Court their publication of the so-called Pentagon Papers.

We still stand by this editorial and I would add several thoughts to the argument set forth in it.

First, from my own experience of ten years as a Washington correspondent, I think I can speak with some authority on the working of our present system, a system which has resulted in the American people being better informed than any other nation of people, present or past. Unquestionably too much information is classified by various governmental agencies and too much classified material is kept in secret files long after there is any need for its protection as confidential information. Like every other newspaperman, I would like to see this situation corrected. But, having said that, I would point out from my own experience that very little remains secret indefinitely in Washington. Consistently, there is at work an amorphous sort of system under which various people—presidents, cabinet members, civil and military officials and members of Congress—give out key bits and pieces of secret information. Admittedly such releases usually are for the self-service of the official releasing them, or are released in furtherance of what such officials believe to be the public welfare.

But, regardless of the motivation, the "secrets" do come out. And it should be noted that this rule applied to virtually all of the factual "revelations" of the Pentagon Papers.

Certainly any regular newspaper reader or listener to broadcast news was informed that President Johnson ultimately espoused programs he had attacked when Senator Goldwater suggested them during his presidential campaign; no reader or listener could have failed to know that many advisers of the President opposed his limitations on combat action; the Kennedy administration support of the overthrow of the Diem regime was reported and commented on. The list goes on to cover other "facts" as differentiated from the interesting detail of personal memoranda, etc.

My fear is that if the argument propounded by The New York Times attorneys is carried to its logical conclusion there will be other publication of secret documents the release of which will lack the public support accorded in the Pentagon Papers incident; then I fear a publicly supported congressional reaction in the form of legislation which would close the present avenues of information.

For example, there are some men in official positions who disagree with the traditional friendliness of our government to the State of Israel. Assume a hypothetical case under which a State Department employee, so motivated, decided to remove from the files all governmental information on present Middle East negotiations and to deliver to a sympathetic editor those portions best calculated to support his theory that we were headed into a new war. The informant and the editor both might argue that the national good required this breach of security regulations in order to prevent a war which was about to begin. But I would submit that, if a majority of Congress and of the people disagreed, there would be an immediate call for legislation to prohibit any such further violation of security and to punish anyone, either informant or editor, responsible for such a breach. The result well could be the passage by our Congress of an Official Secrets Act modeled after Britain's which really would close the flow of information without doing anything about the admitted evil of overclassification of information.

In this respect I would note that a careful reading of the individual decisions of the Supreme Court justices in the New York Times case indicates that several justices who ruled with the Times felt they could not support the government's injunction because Congress had not chosen to pass legislation permitting such an injunction of a newspaper to prevent publication of classified documents. The implication was clear that, if there had been such legislation, an injunction would have been upheld by a court majority; indeed a reading of the decisions would seem to indicate that some of the justices almost invited passage of such restrictive legislation.

The many of my colleagues who disagree with me argue that the issue in the Pentagon Papers case involved the novelty of a pre-publication injunction against a newspaper. I cannot argue that such prior restraint would not have been precedent making; neither, however, can I recall another case in which the government knew in advance that secret documents were going to be published and thereby had a chance to seek such an injunction.

I would also point out that various "prior restraints" already exist, affecting newspaper editorial decisions, and unquestionably could be used as precedents for an injunction provision in an official secrecy act.

For example, under libel law a man knowing that a newspaper is about to publish information harmful to him can seek an injunction: in a recent case, the publisher of Lyndon Johnson's autobiography threatened injunctive action to prevent publication by a newspaper of excerpts of that autobiography which had come into the hands of the paper's editor. More specifically every editor knows of the prior restraint now surrounding the records and activity of a grand jury. It is true that, if an editor had delivered to him the transcript of a secret grand jury investigating organized crime, he could go ahead and publish it but he would know that, if he did, he would automatically go to jail for contempt of court.

REARDON COMMISSION

In conclusion I would like to suggest that your Committee might want to take a look at another matter potentially affecting First Amendment freedoms which is not covered in your letter to me. That has to do with the American Bar Association's adoption of certain Reardon Commission rules drafted to correct an alleged conflict between the basic American doctrines of "fair trial" and "free press."

Going in, I do not agree with the Bar and the Reardon Commisssion that any such basic conflict exists. In the tragic aftermath of the assassination of President Kennedy this issue came to the forefront as a nation trying to rationalize the horror of that event was presented with the question as to whether either Lee Harvey Oswald, or Jack Ruby, "ever could have gotten a fair trial."

Certainly if a fair trial requires that a defendant face a jury with no advance knowledge of any of the basic facts, then we would have to conclude that no presidential assassin could be tried fairly and therefore presumably must be let go. The same would apply to a murderer—like Jack Ruby—who chose to commit his crime before national television cameras and a couple of hundred newspaper reporters.

But I think most accept the logic that no practical lawyer can insist on total advance ignorance of all facts as a requirement if jurors are to rule fairly.

Still the Reardon Commission, and later the American Bar seemed to take this position. Under the rules passed by the Bar (and fortunately ignored by most state supreme courts), all discussion of a crime would be kept out of newspapers from the time of an arrest until after the last appellate consideration of the case. It would seem to me that every lawyer, and every citizen, should join editors in opposing this approach.

Existing in the past, such a policy would have barred the public debate between Clarence Darrow and William Jennings Bryan which, while not affecting the Scopes case verdict, did so much to educate Americans on the importance of free academic thought.

A Reardon rule would have required the disbarment of Felix Frankfurter who, as an associate counsel working on the Sacco-Vanzetti appeal, spoke out as he did against prosecution based on political ideology.

Under the Bar Association's amended Canon 20, newspapers would be cut off from facts indicative of corrupt handling of a trial or prosecution until after the final appeal: naturally, if the corruption was sufficient to prevent a trial, there never would be any appeal.

Granted, the Reardon Commission was careful not to specify any action to be taken against newspapers or newspapermen; instead they sought simply to close the sources of information which might permit a newspaperman to get a story.

Perhaps this censorship by indirection might seem to be beyond the jurisdiction of a subcommittee primarily interested in the direct right to print and broadcast news. I submit however that, if information is choked off, the right to print is meaningless. I would hope therefore that your Committee might find it proper to speak out in support of the great majority of judges who have chosen to ignore the American Bar recommendations on this subject.

Sincerely,

MARTIN S. HAYDEN.

[From The Detroit News, June 27, 1971]

AN EDITORIAL: "OUR COLLEAGUES ERR ON WAR SECRETS ISSUE"

The Detroit News does not agree with those of our press colleagues contending that national interest—and the cause of a free press—are served by the current battle over publication of secret Pentagon papers.

As the U.S. Supreme Court considers a case which could produce a new interpretation of the rights and responsibilities of the press in a democracy, this newspaper wants to emphasize that though we will be affected and bound by the decision, the newspaper lawyers in the court are not speaking for The Detroit News.

We do not believe the New York Times and other involved newspapers acted responsibly and in the public interest when—without even trying to use established procedures for declassification of secret papers—they chose to publish an edited version of what it now appears was an incomplete account of our involvement in the Vietnam war.

Despite our devotion to, and dependence upon, the basic rights guaranteed under the First Amendment, we do not accept the premise that the doctrine of a free press is an unrestricted license to print any secret document, the publication of which, in an individual editor's opinion, would be in the national interest.

Finally, we consider as unfactual the current contention by some newspapers that there never before has been any prepublication restriction on what newspapers decide to print.

Our brief includes several points:

First, carried to its logical conclusion, the Times theory would permit publication of any government secret—the design of a Polaris missile, contingency war plans, intelligence reports on enemy war preparations—provided only that the editor believed such publication would be in the national interest.

Such a conclusion, we believe, would result in a disastrous (for the press) collision between press freedom and the manifest democratic need for orderly government.

Granted, the bureaucratic tendency to cover mistakes with a "top secret" stamp is a problem. It always has been and newspapers have an obligation to fight it. But the solution does not lie in a grant to an individual—be he editor, scientist or public official—of power to substitute his personal definition of national interest as a basis for declassification.

To argue otherwise would be to accept the thesis of defenders of Dr. Klaus Fuchs that his betrayal of Anglo-American atomic secrets was justified by his sincere conviction that a better world would result from their delivery by him to the Soviet Union.

Newspapers which have published the Vietnam war papers protest that, in stopping them by court action, the Justice Department sought to establish a precedent of prior restraint upon newspaper publication.

Is that true? Forgetting the national defense field, is it not accepted that both state and federal judges use "prior restraint" to protect their own secrets? Would any of the judges to whom the Times appealed last week have listened for a minute to a contention that a newspaper which acquired a transcript of a grand jury investigation of organized crime had a right to publish it on the ground that Mafia operations constitute a national problem concerning which the public has a "right to know"?

We and the New York Times know the offending editor would be jailed for contempt of long-recognized prepublication restraints.

It is argued now that an informed public has a right to know right now what individual diplomats and military men recommended over the years of our Vietnam war escalation. But the Times itself has not always followed this theory, as is reported in the current Newsweek magazine by Columnist Stewart Alsop.

Alsop recalls the Cuban missile crisis and an article which he co-authored describing deliberations of National Security Council members. The Times then reacted with outrage to what Alsop calls his "attempt to present the American public a history—admittedly incomplete—of decision-making at the highest levels of government."

In an editorial captioned "Breach of Security," the Times fumed then that: "The secrecy of one of the highest organs of the United States has been seriously breached."

"What kind of advice can the President expect to get under such circumstances?" asked the Times. "How can there be any real freedom of discussion or dissent; how can anyone be expected to advance positions that may be politically unpopular or unprofitable? Does no one in Washington recall the McCarthy era and the McCarthy technique?"

What the Times asked then we'd repeat today. If it was wrong for McCarthy retroactively to crucify diplomats for alleged wrong decisions and recommendations when China was falling to communism, is it proper to assail military and State Department men in 1971 for reports they wrote a decade ago when our Vietnam effort had general support?

As the Times (and The Detroit News) said during the McCarthy era the President will get no sincere recommendations if his subordinates suspect that they will be publicly pilloried for them a few years later, and in the context of different times.

And were the newspapers which published the documents motivated solely by a search for the whole truth? Current revelation as to the sources of the misappropriated documents raises questions.

First, the 40-odd volumes of secret papers went to the Times, which studied them for several weeks and then, without bothering to apply for declassification, began publication, the busy peddlers of the documents hurried them to other papers, each—like the Times—an advocate of immediate Vietnam withdrawal.

Simultaneously the papers were peddled to anti-war congressmen then preparing their effort to use the draft extension bill as a new vehicle to force adoption, without enemy reciprocation, of a firm withdrawal date for all U.S. forces in Indochina.

Manifestly the newspapers were used by the peace movement to get over a propaganda point. Obviously there is reason to wonder if they would have responded with such alacrity to an effort to publicize documentation supporting an opposite views of the Vietnam problem.

But, it is contended, publication did not harm national security. Is that true?

Included in the published material were verbatim and dated translations of coded messages. Given the translation, cryptographers have a major tool for code-breaking. Granted, most of the codes have been changed but ability to decipher now our secret transmissions of the 1960's (which other nations have recorded) opens all our messages of that era to any country wishing to use them for diplomatic mischief.

Secretary of State William Rogers has noted other serious diplomatic problems:

What government is going to freely and frankly exchange views with us if it suspects the correspondence shortly will be published worldwide?

What head of state allied with Washington is going to be comfortable in the relationship when he reads the published recommendation of Assistant Secretary of State Roger Hilsman (now a leading resident of the dovecote) that military plotters who later murdered President Diem be given a free hand in disposing of the head of government with whom we had a fighting alliance?

Even if the papers publishing them did not so intend, the prospects are that the already obdurate Hanoi negotiators may feel that revelation of the alleged "immorality" of every U.S. president since Harry S. Truman will so stir American protest as to force President Nixon to surrender now. Certainly if a negotiated peace is in the American interest, none of the events of the last two weeks have helped our bargainers get one.

In summary, The Detroit News does not want the freedom of press so important to our existence stretched to justify this type of irresponsibility.

We do not defend the proposition that any government employe with access to classified material has a right to leak it for publication in the name of national interest.

We repeat that a contrary contention can lead only to a confrontation which the public will decide in a manner destructive to freedom of the press.

THE AUTHORS LEAGUE OF AMERICA, INC.,
NEW YORK, N.Y., October 18, 1971.

Hon. SAM J. ERVIN, JR.,
Chairman Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR ERVIN: I appreciate your invitation to submit a statement in connection with your Subcommittee's hearings on the First Amendment and the Press; and accordingly, I respectfully request that this letter be included in the record. As you have said, the Subcommittee is "seeking to create a better appreciation of the First Amendment's purposes and its crucial importance to a free society." This understanding is much needed.

Freedom of speech and press are essential to creative work and are naturally prized by writers and dramatists. But the Authors League realizes that the rights safeguarded by the First Amendment are "for the benefit of all of us" and "assure the maintenace of our political system and an open society." (Time, Inc. v Hill, 385 U.S. 374). The League also recognizes that freedom of expression requires protection of each step in the process of communication, not only writing and publishing. The distribution of books, their circulation in schools and libraries, the gathering of information—these vital steps must also be protected. Otherwise, the rights to write and publish could be reduced to empty formalities. Consequently, the Authors League has worked to defend the rights of booksellers, distributors, librarians and teachers—as well as authors and newsmen. And, recognizing the First Amendment rights in all media are threatened by restrictions imposed in any medium, it has given support in briefs, statements and testimony to the rights of broadcasters, motion picture producers and newspaper publishers—as well as the rights of authors and book publishers.

In many of these controversies, broadcasters and newspaper publishers—whose representatives are now testifying before the Subcommittee—have been conspicuous by their absence. It is therefore encouraging to see some of them joining in some First Amendment controversies, e.g., the Caldwell appeal and the SELLING OF THE PENTAGON dispute. Let us hope that they will also participate in less well known and "respectable" battles where First Amendment principles are under fire. And let us hope that they will also devote themselves more actively to helping create that "better appreciation of the First Amendment's purpose and its crucial importance", which the Subcommittee is seeking to develop.

An understanding of that purpose and importance requires more than occasional "lip service" to "free speech". It requires thorough reporting of threats and restraints on free speech. In this respect, most television news reporting, and much press coverage, leaves a great deal to be desired. Even controversies as publicized as the Caldwell and other recent newsmen-subpoena cases received scant attention from television news reporters. Furthermore, an appreciation of the purposes and importance of the First Amendment requires effective explanation of its basic principles, the benefits it secures, the abuses that may result, the reasons they must be tolerated to achieve meaningful protection, and dynamics of suppression. Lack of this understanding leads many to reject the basic principles of the First Amendment. In large part, this reflects a regrettable failure of our educational system. But it also reflects a failure by television, our most effective medium of communication, to do anything to increase its audience's understanding of the "First Amendment's purpose and its crucial importance to a free society."

Of course, the solution to this problem does not lie in any legislative compulsion on broadcasters or the press. But freedom of speech and press would be strengthened if television journalists were permitted by stations and networks to report and comment on First Amendment controversies.

Effective protection of First Amendment freedoms does require legislative assistance in other areas. In broadcasting, for example, it is essential that the Congress make certain that the "fairness doctrine" should not be gutted under the pretext of preserving "freedom of speech". As the Supreme Court unanimously held in the Red Lion case, the fairness doctrine protects free speech in the broadcast media. It enforces the public's

". . . collective right to have the medium function consistently with the ends and purposes of the First Amendment. It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount." (395 U.S. 390)

The Red Lion opinion also focuses attention on another critical First Amendment problem in the broadcast media, the concentration and perpetuation of control over the limited number of television and radio broadcast channels. It would be catastrophic if permanent control of television stations were frozen into the hands of present licensees, who were intended by Congress to receive only limited licenses subject to reveal if they effectively served the public interest. Rather than consider perpetuating these licenses, the Congress would do well to consider the alternative suggested by the Supreme Court in the Red Lion case:

"Rather than confer frequency monopolies on a relatively small number of licensees, in a Nation of 200,000,000, the Government could surely have decreed that each frequency should be shared among all or some of these who wish to use it, each being assigned a portion of the broadcast day or the broadcast week." (395 U.S. 390, 391)

Concentration of control poses a serious threat to free speech in all media of communication—broadcasting, newspaper and book publication. If three or four book publishers are merged into the control of one corporate owner, then one editorial viewpoint is substituted for three or four. While book publishing has not yet reached the dangerous dimensions of newspaper monopolies or oligopolies in major metropolitan areas, it has moved much too far down the path, without any inhibition. Several major publishing firms have lost their separate identities. Some of the largest have been acquired by television networks or other large corporations engaged in other fields of communication, resulting in concentration of multimedia in fewer and fewer hands.

This trend is especially dangerous for book publishing which has enjoyed considerable indepenence in the past because of individual ownership and freedom from pressure by advertisers or other outside interests. As publishing houses come into the hands of broadcasters and conglomerates, they are increasingly exposed to that kind of pressure, to resulting self-censorship and, finally to the suppression of books and obstruction of the flow of information and opinion to the public. As the Supreme Court has warned repeatedly, the most effective form of restraint is often that which induces self-censorship. The wave of mergers and acquisitions in book publishing and other media have vastly increased the possibility of such restraint.

The destruction of independent publishers will be accelerated by the unfortunate escalation of second class postal rates. The death of LOOK magazine is a grim harbinger of things to come. If LOOK's publishers could not afford to continue publishing, faced with a 142% rise of postal costs from $4 million a year to $10 million a year, then obviously smaller magazines will not be able to survive the high cost of using a public medium of communication.

Congress should recognize that the second class mail is an essential, indispensable channel of communication, no less so than the airways. A substantial increase of postal costs will suppress periodicals as effectively as a law prohibiting them from being published. Millions of readers will be denied access to periodicals of every political persuasion; to scientific, educational and technical journals; to publications serving the public interest in countless areas of interest. The country can afford to maintain reasonable postal rates for the second and fourth class mails. It subsidizes many activities, at greater cost, which are of far less use or benefit.

The subpoenaing of journalists is a serious threat to First Amendment rights. Our views on the issues presented in the Caldwell case are set forth in the amicus brief filed by the Authors League in the Supreme Court, a copy of which is enclosed. We would appreciate the opportunity to comment separately on S. 1311, the "newsmen's privilege" bill, although we might note—as we have in our Caldwell brief—that what is at stake is not the protection of a privilege for reporters, but the protection of a First Amendment right for the benefit of the public and the press at large.

We also suggest that the Subcommittee consider these First Amendment problems:

1. Grass roots censorship—i.e. pressures from public officials or private groups to remove books, periodcals and newspapers from public libraries and schools.
2. Congressional "blacklisting" of persons for expressing controversial views; e.g. the blacklist issued last Spring by the House Internal Security Committee.
3. Attempts by public officials to effect the content of television news and special events programs, to induce producers to invite spokesmen of official positions to appear on these programs or to bar opponents. An example: programs on the SST debate.
4. Access to government information by authors and publishers.
5. Methods for insuring greater independence of television, as a medium of communication, from the direct or inherent influence of advertisers.
6. Methods for providing more freedom of access to television and cable television in light of the Supreme Court's suggestions in the Red Lion case.

Respectfully yours,

IRWIN KARP,
Counsel.

OCTOBER 6, 1971.

The Honorable SAM J. ERVIN JR.,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights,
Committee on the Judiciary, The U.S. Senate

The Associated Press Managing Editors Association appreciates the invitation and opportunity to express to the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights the views of its members on the current state of freedom of the press in the United States.

The free press of America from Colonial days and the tribulations of John Peter Zenger has been the target of those who would throttle it, subvert it, sway it, seduce it, intimidate it or in various other ways prevent it from fulfilling its responsibility to the citizens of the nation.

So it is not new when manifestations of these same things become evident today. But they are no less dangerous than when the great Philadelphia lawyer, Andrew Hamilton, told the jurymen that, in freeing Zenger, they would "have laid a noble foundation for securing to ourselves, our posterity and our neighbors that to which nature and the laws of our country have gvien us a right, the liberty both of exposing and opposing arbitrary power ... by speaking and writing truth."

Misuse of the subpoena power, prior prevention of publication by injunction, public business conducted in secrecy, denial of access to public records have a bigger import than the mere handicapping of a newsman trying to perform his work. They are a direct infringement upon the rights of the citizens of the United States. They deny to him the information essential to the performance of his democratic responsibility, that of choosing his governors.

In their wisdom the drafters of the Bill of Rights saw this truth. They wrote a guarantee that the citizen would have the right to a free press. The press itself was not the recipient of that guarantee. The distinction is important. It is one the attackers of America's free press too often ignore.

The subpoena is a vital tool in the nation's judicial process. It too bulwarks a constitutional guarantee, that to the accused. But wrongfully, even if mistakenly, employed it can and does threaten to destroy the keystone of a free press, the right to protect confidential information and confidential informers. Without that protection, information sources will dry up. The citizen will lose his necessary opportunity to learn facts he must know.

In the last two years this threat has assumed epidemic proportions. From an original highly-publicized attempt by the U.S. Justice Department to obtain information by this method, it has spread like wildfire to courts throughout the land, to law enforcement agencies, even to such diverse public bodies as boards of education and state boards of personnel review.

Editors from coast to coast have hastened to the barricades in alarm, summoning their own legal counsel to throw up a protecting screen. Court decisions are pending. It is of the utmost importance that the citizens of the United States realize what is at stake. Unfortunately, they are hearing, and perhaps in dismaying degree heeding, the self serving attackers (I do not label them merely critics) of the nation's news media.

By prior prevention of publication of information deemed by editors to be essential to their readers, we take the road of the tyrannies which made censorship and then press seizure their first steps to dictatorship.

It makes no difference whether it is one hour, one day, one week or one year. It is suppression of information to which the citizen has a right. If the First Amendment specifically directs the Congress to "make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech or of the press . . ." it would appear that the prohibition must have equal force in application to acts by other branches of government.

The United States Supreme Court, we are reminded, recently rendered a decision in this particular area of concern. The court dissolved restraining orders which had probhited the New York Times and the Washington Post from further publication of the so-called "Pentagon Papers."

While this was a victory of sorts for a free press, some reactions should be noted:

The Washington Post editorial on the decision said: "There is not much comfort, let alone clear cut law, to be found in yesterday's outcome."

U.S. Solicitor General Erwin N. Griswold said (threateningly as far as editors are concerned): "Maybe the newspapers will show a little more restraint in the future."

Justice Brennan, in his opinion, said: "The error which has pervaded these cases from the outset was the granting of any injunctive relief whatsoever."

Judge Gerhardt Gessell, as pointed out in an article in Quill Magazine written by Jack C. Landau, took only eight hours in refusing to enjoin the Post and emphasized that time was of the essence and that the right to publish was so precious that no one can "measure the effects of even a momentary delay."

In the light of this action by the government, and the Supreme Court's decision, it is surely pertinent that the Congress examine carefully what is occurring today in the matter of constitutional guarantees to the citizens of this nation.

Two other areas of major concern to editors in carrying out their responsibilities to their readers are those of open meetings and open records. A principal contributor to the problem has been Congress. The accelerating trend toward closed Congressional committee hearings, plus the mounting tendency in administrative departments to refuse reporters ready access to information, where considered the main contributing factors to passage in 1968 of the United States Freedom of Information Act.

That this did not solve the problem completely is indicated by the results of a survey taken by the Associated Press Managing Editors Association this year. John R. Finnegan, executive editor of the St. Paul Dispatch and Pioneer Press, found that 40.6% of the 123 editors surveyed indicated they had encountered difficulties in varying degree in eliciting information from federal agencies in their home communities.

Most of the 50 editors encountering difficulties cited the Justice Department, particularly the FBI, as the most difficult agency with which to deal. Federal courts and building were rated the second major problem area.

Other problem areas cited by editors: Post Office Department; Defense Department; Immigration and Naturalization Service; Federal Housing Administration; Social Security; U.S. Corps of Engineers; Housing and Urban Development; Selective Service; Atomic Energy Commission; General Accounting Office; U.S. Geology Survey; Natural Academy of Sciences; NASA; Economic Development Administration; Security and Exchange Commission; Labor Department; and the U.S. Bureau of Census.

This report is but a brief summation of the major threats menancing the news media of the United States. It focuses merely on the tip of the iceberg. Unless the media itself, and those in government who believe in and support it, are successful in its defense, deep trouble for the nation lies ahead.

The 1971 report of the Freedom of Information Committee of the Associated Press Managing Editors Association in one disturbing paragraph emphasizes the insidious growth of the cancer spreading because of stimulation by the enemies of America's free press:

"The general population, despite probably the most consistently responsible newspaper performance in history, still appears to take on a growing antagonism toward news media."

The APME, made up of 525 working editors and chief news executives of newspapers who are members of the Associated Press, is dedicated to this freedoms battle.

It was a major persuader in the American Bar Association's decision two years ago not to implement a report calling for stringent new controls on enforcement agencies and the media in coverage of pre-trial news.

It supported newsmen resisting unwarranted use of subpoenas directed at them.

It protested the dangerous employment of a search warrant to invade the offices of a university student daily newspaper.

It has joined with the New York Times and others in a friend-of-the-court action in support of Times reporter Earl Caldwell in his case now before the United States Supreme Court, on appeal from a lower court decision which reversed a contempt of court ruling for refusing to appear under subpoena before a grand jury.

And it protested strongly to the Attorney General of the United States in the government's action in seeking and obtaining injunctions blocking publication in several newspapers of portions of the so-called "Pentagon Papers."

The APME fully intends to continue this battle.

It hopes it will find allies in the halls of Congress.

WILLIAM M. WARE,
Chairman, Freedom of Information Committee,
Associated Press Managing Editors Association.

STATEMENT SUBMITTED TO THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS, SENATE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

(By Thomas Powell, President, The Associated Press Boardcasters Association)

Though the First Amendment explicitly protects the purveyors of news against official interference, the public, we believe, was the intended chief beneficiary.

A flow of news unimpeded by the statutes and untinctured by the governors was, we think regarded by the authors of the Bill of Rights as an essential condition of freedom.

Yet, viewed in that light, the First Amendment has been stripped of its meaning and stands today as little more than an empty shell.

Government's heavy hand bears down on radio and television which supply a growing majority of the citizens with their basic informational needs.

The full protective cover of the First Amendment has receded to the point where it is enjoyed only by those citizens who receive all their news from printed pages.

That cover would vanish altogether with the adoption of electronic techniques to transmit newspapers into the home.

Government's pervasive presence in contemporary journalism is a consequence of its regulation of broadcast transmissions on a technical level. No one questions the need for policing the electronic pathways used by broadcasters in the same sense that there is no objection to applying rules of the terrestial road to newspaper delivery trucks.

But government has gone far beyond the role of establishing order in the broadcast spectrum and has intruded deeply into the news role of radio and television through the Fairness Doctrine of the Federal Communications Comission.

There is scarcely an area of journalistic endeavor that has not been the subject of a Fairness Doctrine and a subsequent decision. This ever-enlarging web of rulings cannot help but have dampened dedication to journalistic inquiry and to the ventilation of controversitl matters.

It is now obvious that broadcastng erred in accepting the promulgation of the Doctrine with passivity. Many broadcasters felt it was benign enough, merely reflecting their own policies of treating public issues fairly. We know now that it has deepened the wedge driven by expanding government control between broadcast news and the First Amendment.

It is supremely ironic that broadcasting should be inhibited in its news function while it has been validating to a degree that could not have been foreseen the free press theory underlying the First Amendment. The addition of thousands of radio and television stations to the nation's journalistic enterprices has produced what is certainly an almost optimal condition of diversity in which truth can combat error. Yet, instead of a concomitant decline in agitation for government regulation, we have witnessed the reverse.

Only the courage and professionalism of thousands of broadcast journalists have enabled our media to meet the high responsibilities of public service we sense to be ours.

But the integrity of broadcast news canot be forever preserved in the absence of affirmation of our First Amendment rights.

This Subcommittee can provide no greater service than in achieving its announced intention of "seeking to create a better appreciation of the First Amendment's purpose and its crucial importance to a free society."

We would hope this would lead to a serious re-examination of the propriety both of the Fairness Doctrine and of any news-related considerations in the license renewal procedures of the Commission.

These grave issues of public policy have regrettably been overshadowed recently by the rather spectacular exchanges which have taken place between the broadcast media and some highly-placed critics. We perceive no imminent peril to freedom in the critical assessment of press performance by public figures, no matter how highly placed. In fact, we would associate ourselves with the remarks of the Chairman made at the outset of this inquiry and quoted by the Associated Press:

"It is my belief that robust criticism of government by the press and the consequent skepticism of the press on the part of government are the necessary ingredients of the relationship between the press and government in a truly free society."

Little wonder, however, that the motives of critics are viewed with suspicion and doubt by some broacasters when we are faced with expansionary rule-making, Congressional probing into editorial judgements and the awesome power of government to terminate franchises.

The use of government force for the stated objective of assuring fairness has paradoxically corrupted the important role of criticism, both external and internal, in sharpening press performance in a free society.

It is not necessary to go into horror stories associated with attempts at legislated fairness to say that self-correcting procedures and public judgement constitute an infinitely preferable alternative.

We believe the hour is late. If recent developments have not shown the compelling need to give the broadcast press its freedom, then a course toward abolition of the First Amendment through erosion has been irretrievably set.

STATEMENT OF THE CENSORSHIP COMMITTEE, WRITERS GUILD OF AMERICA, EAST, INC., for the SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

In their statements before your Sub-Committee, writers from Writers Guild of America, West hardly touched upon one area of the Communications Media which has enormous and continuing influence on the thoughts and attitudes of its audience: TV and Radio journalism. Journalists have always been aware that they are in a position to influence public thought, while at the same time accepting a responsibility for impartial and unprejudiced reportage so that thinking individuals can form independent judgments. It is a complex area and TV and Radio News and documentary writers are very aware of their responsibilities to keep airwaves free of bias, and to tell the truth. But how does anyone know if he is telling the whole, unbiased truth; and if he does know, can he; and if he can, should he? Who decides, and how.

The Censorship Committee of the Writers Guild of America, East, believes that of all the forms of censorship currently threatening the freedom of television and radio news, documentaries and public affairs, self-censorship is both the most pervasive and most dangerous.

There have been instances of overt censorship of news. But, on the whole, they have been both rare and difficult to document. Where, for instance, do newspeople draw the difficult line between censorship and fair journalistic judgment? If management does on occasion make news decisions based on judgments other than journalistic, there are seldom ways of tracing those decisions back to their sources once they have filtered down through the various executive levels. We cannot come up with a single case of a writer or reporter being ordered to change vital facts on a story—but it is not rare for controversial facts to be omitted or glossed over, especially when contained in film reports.

The greatest danger lies in self-censorship.

Self-censorship is the end result of hiring practices over the years which have valued corporate loyalty over journalistic skepticism; conformity over individuality; safety over risk-taking. Self-censorship is the end result of a news system which would like to make a financial profit out of news. It is the result of the urgent need not to antagonize the Congress, the Federal Communications Commissions, various other governmental agencies and numerous pressure groups including advertisers.

Part of self-censorship in television and radio news is the continued absence of minority group representation from the decision-making levels of the two media. It is only recently that Blacks, Puerto Ricans and women have been hired in lower-level writing and reportorial positions and this came about only after considerable pressure from sources both within and outside the media.

The three major television and radio networks are major offenders in this regard. Our figures show that only some small percentage of network newspeople are of any minority group and that there is virtually no minority representation in network administrative and executive ranks.

On March 25, 1971, the Joint Equality Committee (made up of the Writers Guild of America, East: the American Federation of Television and Radio Artists, New York local; Directors Guild of America, East, and the Screen Actors Guild, New York branch) issued a public statement deploring the fact that "the faces seen on television news programs, the voices heard on radio news programs and the minds producing these programs do not adequately reflect the multi-racial makeup of our society."

Twenty-seven major network television and radio correspondents supported the statement, as did the Full Opportunity Committee of the National Academy of Television Arts and Sciences, New York Chapter.

Among the individual supporters were Walter Cronkite (CBS News), Edwin Newman (NBC News), Dan Rather (CBS News), Frank Reynolds (ABC News), Douglas Edwards (CBS News), Edward P. Morgan (ABC News), Tom Jarriel (ABC News), Dallas Townsend (CBS News) and Barbara Walters (NBC News).

They and 18 other network news correspondents agreed that "it is LONG PAST the time that ethnic minority groups were properly represented in the television and radio news departments of the networks."

There has been little change since that statement was issued.

Freedom of information is also threatened by the current climate of governmental pressure on news organizations, including issuance or threats of issuance of subpoenaes to reporters.

The Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press released a study on February 11, 1972 detailing the impact that the subpoenaing of newsmen is having upon the free flow of information to the public.

One of its findings was: "Newsmen have reported that the possibility of being subpoenaed either clearly has, or may have, adversely affected their news coverage in the last eighteen months in the following categories.

"Trial coverage (37% of reporters); investigative reporting (27%); radical-militant groups (34%); minority groups (28%); police reporting (30%); and financial reporting (20%)."

We believe that ultimately local and network television and radio news need believability to survive. Believability is their single most important asset.

And, unless there are drastic and far-reaching changes made; unless television and radio news documentaries and public affairs programs open their closed doors to influences, ideas, and values from outside their small circles; unless journalistic integrity is substituted for corporate loyalty, local and network television and radio will lose much of the believability it needs to maintain public confidence in this influential area of mass communications.

Writers are also concerned about a more subtle form of censorship which affects those of us working in the purely entertainment side of television, particularly on dramatic shows.

Since the beginning of television, writers have been harassed by artificial and arbitrary requirements to avoid situations, sentiments and characters which certain authorities fear will be disturbing to powerful forces, either in or out of government. Up to a few years ago, for example, the use of ethnic minority characters in stories was rare and discouraged. Various strategems and disguises were forced on writers to avoid "controversial" stories. Negroes could be disguised as less dangerous Mexicans or Indians. Jews turned up metamorphosed into Italians because, at that time, it was a less sensitive minority. More recently, responding to changing times and public pressure, ethnic minority characters became more acceptable and television writers were allowed by their employers to flirt with stories touching on political and social issues, generally as long as the approach or the moral drawn did not conflict with safe consensus opinion.

As a residue of this period, there is now a much higher visibility of minority characters in dramatic shows. However, a gain in our industry is generally balanced by a more profound loss. The shift in emphasis on the type of dramatic program from anthology drama or issue-oriented series to action adventure and situation comedy has simply relieved anyone of the necessity of censoring dangerous thought by removing completely the forum for any thought at all.

The disastrous disappearance of "original drama" from American television is more than an aesthetic loss, it also deprives the American people of an effective platform for the exchange of ideas in the form of popular storytelling, a skill which American commercial television had developed to a high artistic and still popular point.

The form which has become the main substitute, and which its apostates claim is comparable to the original anthology, is the so-called "movie for television." However, the almost universal blandness of content provides little stimulation other than the artificial titilation of horror, suspense and occasional mawkish sentimentality. There "television movies" largely duplicate the B pictures of our childhood double features. The depressed standards and the absolute artistic control exercised by network executives on these "television movies" with but a few praiseworthy exceptions which point up the barrenness of the rest, have filled the evening air with a sort of dramatic cold oatmeal and have deprived both the viewer and the writer of any real stimulation.

Writers wishing to tackle important controversial subjects and immediate social problems that are not very popular or cannot be dramatized into simplicity are forced to tuck them into the weekly and most popular form for drama today; the episodic series: MOD Squad, Ironside, Bonanza, Marcus Welby . . . Doctor, Lawyer, Indian, Thief . . . But the very form of the episodic series negates controversy and startling revelation, it's basically a weekly visit with familiar and trustworthy friends. The leading characters must survive for the next week, the leading characters are the goodies, the audience is guaranteed it will all work out.

While bemoaning this "guaranteed-to-please" kind of drama which is glutting prime time we must, in fairness, pause to pay tribute to what was called the "year of relevance." Two seasons ago, several shows were put on the air, in the form of episodic series, where an attempt was made to be realistic, to tackle serious social problems, to do it without the usual sugar-coating, to write and cast and film with intelligence. The result? Low ratings and the cancellation of relevance. In its stead? Irrelevance and high ratings. The audience censored relevance by not watching, just as it censors documentaries and forces them to be relegated to expected poor rating times when they are not removed from the schedules completely. We mention this to remind ourselves of the inherent problem of a medium which must combine popularity with integrity, commercialism with creativity, money with freedom of expression. So far it has been an impossible marriage, but somehow a medium committed to capital profit must also be able to commit itself to artistic and intellectual and idealogical goals without being penalized.

Thus, while the journalistic side of television is still struggling, fighting its own censorship battles against government, executives and self, the entertainment or dramatic side lies a victim of a successful lobotomy, perpetrated by bookkeepers and audience. The result is no trouble, no scuffles, and not much worth writing . . . or watching.

STATEMENT ON SENATE BILL 1311, A "NEWSMEN'S PRIVILEGE" BILL, BY SIX OFFICERS OF THE ASSOCIATION FOR EDUCATION IN JOURNALISM (AEJ)

To: Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr., Chairman, and the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, U.S. Senate.

From: Prof. Hillier Krieghbaum, New York University, President, Association for Education in Journalism (AEJ); Prof. R. Neale Copple, University of Nebraska, President-Elect, AEJ; Prof. Wayne A. Danielson, University of Texas, Past President, AEJ; Prof. J. Eward Gerald, University of Minnesota, Past resident, AEJ, and Member, AEJ Committee on Professional Freedom and Responsibility; Prof. Dwight L. Teeter, Jr., University of Wisconsin, Chairman, AEJ Committee on Professional Freedom and Responsibility; and Prof. Harold L. Nelson, University of Wisconsin, Past President, AEJ.

As officers of the Association for Education in Journalism (AEJ), an organization of more than 1,000 journalism educators, we wish to commend the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights for undertaking its important study of the state of freedom of the press.

We join the Subcommittee in recognizing that there are many areas affecting freedom of the communications media which need extensive study. (A copy of a letter written to Senator Ervin on August 2, 1971, by Professor J. Edward Gerald of the University of Minnesota and setting out many areas which need study, is appended to this statement.) This statement by six AEJ officers, however, will be confined to one issue: concern over the subpoenaing of newsmen as reflected in a "Newsman's Privilege" bill, Senate Bill 1311.

We support the newsmen's privilege against disclosure of confidential sources or information. The ability of reporters to continue as effective news gatherers would be damaged if not destroyed if reporters betrayed their confidential news sources or disclosed confidential information by testifying.

Because of our support of newsmen's privilege, our basic reaction to Senate Bill 1311 is one of caution. We fear that the language of the bill, should it become law, might deter future court decisions from granting as useful a constitutional privilege as has been granted, for example, by the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in the case of Caldwell v. United States of America.[1] We wish to discuss the Caldwell case, and also a 1969 Minnesota newsmen's privilege case, Thompson v. Minnesota and Donald John Giese.[2] It is our view that cases such as Caldwell and Thompson suggest that courts are able to undertake more subtle balancing of interests, in view of the individual fact situations in each privilege case, than is possible in legislation such as that proposed by Senate Bill 1311.

In the Minnesota case, T. Eugene Thompson, serving a sentence after having been convicted of first-degree murder, brought a post-conviction action. Thompson sought to have newspaper reporter Donald John Giese reveal the sources for his news stories about the Thompson case. Giese was called as a witness, evidently to testify concerning the claim that Thompson " 'was denied his Constitutional right to a fair and impartial trial because the prosecutor, police and their agents stimulated some of the adverse publicity, which contaminated the jurors, by releasing information and making prejudicial statements to the news media that were improper, unethical, and calculated to persuade those exposed to such statements of the prisoner's guilt.' "[3]

Giese was asked by Thompson's attorney: " 'And who were the sources of your information for the news articles that you wrote in connection with the murder of Carol Thompson?' " Giese refused to answer, citing (among other things) the right to keep his sources confidential. Giese said:[4]

"I think that this deprives me of my right to confidential news sources and my right to keep these confidential news sources; and two, it tends to violate the basic ethics of the journalism profession . . ."

Giese was found in contempt and sentenced to 90 days in the county jail.

The Supreme Court of Minnesota, however, reversed the judgment of contempt. Justice William P. Murphy bypassed the pleas of reporter Giese, but instead agreed with a statement in the amicus curiae brief of the Newspaper Guild of the Twin Cities. The Guild had argued that[5]

---

[1] 434 F.2d 1081 (CA. 9th Cir., Nov. 16. 1970).
[2] 170 N.W.2d 101, 284 Minn. 274 (1969).
[3] 170 N.W. 2d 101, 102, 284 Minn. 274 (1969).
[4] 170 N.W. 2d 101, 102-103, 284 Minn. 274 (1969).
[5] 170 N.W. 2d 101, 103, 284 Minn. 274 (1969). Emphasis added.

". . . it is not apparent from the "scattergun" question [which reporter Giese had refused to answer] whether the information sought was either relevant, material or involved with identification of individuals whose identity might not have already been known * * * or could have easily been identified in another way."

We would expand on the statement by Justice Murphy of the Minnesota Supreme Court, and we have italicized his key points for emphasis. That is, we believe that reporters should not be subjected to judicial or legislative "fishing expeditions" as to the identity of their sources or into their notes and records. It is our conviction that reporters should not be questioned as to the identity of their confidential sources when the material is available from other sources, or when the material is not crucial to the matter under consideration.

As James Hoge, an editor of the Chicago Sun-Times, said on a television panel last summer, it is exceedingly rare when courts or grand juries really need to question a reporter to ascertain the source of anything printed in a newspaper. "More times than not," said Mr. Hoge, "lawyers do attempt to use newspaper men to make their jobs easier." Mr. Hoge's views are quoted and seconded by a leading authority on newsmen's privilege, Professor A. David Gordon of the Medill School of Journalism, Northwestern University. Professor Gordon has said: [6]

"In only four of some 80 cases in and out of the law reports have newsmen eventually revealed the identity of a confidential source . . .

"More telling even is the failure of judges to repeat contempt sentences once the first one ends with the source still undisclosed. If the name of the source were really essential to justice or even to orderly judicial procedure, the process should be repeated until the name is revealed.

"Yet judges have almost without exception imposed one fine or jail sentence for contempt and then let the matter drop. This leads to a strong suspicion that part of the legalistic antagonism to newsmen's privilege stems from a perceived affront to the judicial process . . ."

Professor Gordon also said that he sees a trend in recent cases for allowing newsmen to refuse on various grounds to disclose their sources. He declared that ". . . courts in California [in a state case in addition to the Caldwell case], Illinois, Louisiana, and New York have ruled in the past two years that reporters need not reveal their confidential sources . . ." [7]

The Caldwell case, of course, is far better known than the Thompson case from Minnesota. Earl Caldwell, a black reporter for the New York Times, had become a specialist in reporting news concerning the Black Panther Party. A Federal Grand Jury had subpoenaed Caldwell, in order to pursue a general investigation of the Black Panthers and the possibilities that the Panthers were engaged in criminal activities contrary to federal law. Caldwell won this "protective order" from the United States District Court for the Northern District of California: [8]

"(1) That * * * he [Caldwell] shall not be required to reveal confidential associations, sources or information received, developed or maintained by him as a professional journalist in the course of his efforts to gather news for dissemination to the public through the press or other news media.

"(2) That specifically, without limiting paragraph (1), Mr. Caldwell shall not be required to answer questions concerning statements made to him or information given to him by members of the Black Panther Party unless such statements or information were given to him for publication or public disclosure."

Thus the District Court recognized, in that particular fact situation, a competition of public interests between a newsmen's privilege to keep sources confidential (resting upon the First Amendment) and society's stake in having Grand Juries able to gather testimony from witnesses. Although the District Court told Caldwell that he would not have to give testimony, he would nevertheless have to obey the subpoena and appear before the Grand Jury.[9]

---

[6] Based upon Professor A. David Gordon's unpublished manuscript, in the November-December, 1971, issue of Columbia Journalism Review. See also Gordon's "Protection of News Sources: The History and Legal Status of the Newsman's Privilege," unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, University of Wisconsin, 1970. 925 pp.

[7] Gordon, manuscript for Columbia Journalism Review.

[8] Quoted in Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 1081, 1082–1083 (CA, 9th Cir., 1970).

[9] Ibid., 1083. See also Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545, at 548 (2d Cir., 1958), cer. den. 358 U.S. 910, 79 S.Ct. 273 (1958), involving a journalist cited for contempt for

Despite being told that he did not have to testify, Caldwell refused to appear at all before the Grand Jury, on grounds that the confidence he had won from the Black Panthers would vanish were he to go behind closed doors to appear before the Grand Jury. Narrowly confining itself to the specific facts of the case at hand, the Court of Appeals ruled that Caldwell did not have to appear before the Grand Jury.[10]

"If any competing public interest is ever to arise in a case such as this (where First Amendment liberties are threatened by mere appearance at a Grand Jury investigation) it will be on an occasion in which the witness, armed with his privilege, can still serve a useful purpose before the Grand Jury. Considering the scope of the privilege embodied in the protective order, these occasions would seem to be unusual. It is not asking too much of the government to show that such an occasion is presented here.

"In light of these considerations, we hold that where it has been shown that the public's First Amendment right to be informed would be jeopardized by requiring a journalist to submit to secret Grand Jury interrogation, the Government must respond by demonstrating a compelling need for the witness's presence before judicial process properly can issue to require attendance."

Thus, the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit cautiously—and we believe, wisely—tailored its decision to the Caldwell case. As Judge Charles M. Merrill there noted, "courts can learn much about the problems in this area as they gain more experience in dealing with them." [11] The Caldwell case, along with two other newsmen's privilege cases, is at this writing before the Supreme Court of the United States.[12] We suggest that no action be taken on the bill until the Supreme Court rules on the cases before it.

After expressing misgivings about Senate Bill No. 1311—mainly that it might remove some judicial flexibility in adjusting to the particular fact situations of newsmen's privilege cases—we wish to suggest two amendments which we believe would strengthen the bill.

First, we suggest amending the preamble of Senate Bill 1311 in this fashion, with italics indicating an added phrase:

> "To provide certain privileges against disclosure of confidential information and the sources of information obtained by newsmen, in protection of the freedom of the press guaranteed by the First Amendment."

Second, we would add to the very end of the bill, substituting a comma for the period, and adding the italicized phrase:

> "The order shall be granted if the court, after hearing the parties, determines that there is substantial evidence that disclosure of the information is required to prevent a threat to human life, espionage, or foreign aggression, and that the information is necessary and of central relevance to the proceeding and not obtainable from another source."

This suggested change at the end of Senate Bill 1311 would provide the standards emphasized in the Torre case by Judge [now Mr. Justice] Potter Stewart in regard to the centrality of the requested information to the proceeding and its unavailability from any source other than the newsman.[13] refusing to testify in a libel trial. In that case, Judge (now Mr. Justice) Potter Stewart wrote for the court in affirming the contempt citation. But in so doing, he noted that "compulsory disclosure of confidential sources of information may entail an abridgement of press freedom. . ." In Torre, Judge Stewart declared that the test was "whether the interest to be served by compelling testimony of the witness in the present case justifies some impairment of this First Amendment freedom." Because the information sought from the witness was relevant and central to the plaintiff's libel suit, an over-riding need for the specific testimony was shown in those circumstances.

---

[10] Ibid., p. 1089.

[11] Ibid.

[12] Other cases before the Supreme Court are Branzburg v. Meigs, No. 2-29-71 (Ky., Jan. 22, 1971), cert. granted sub. nom. Branzburg v. Hayes, 39 U.S.L.W. 3478 (May 4, 1971) (No. 1381), and In re Pappas, 266 N.E. 2d 297 (1971). Branzburg involved a Louisville Courier-Journal reporter who watched two men convert marijuana to hashish and then wrote a story about it. In Pappas, a Massachusetts television newsman refused to tell a grand jury what he had seen and heard at a Black Panther headquarters during civil disturbances in New Bedford. The Kentucky Court of Appeals greatly restricted the scope of the state shield statute and the Massachusetts court flatly denied any constitutional protection. Note, however, that the fact situations in Branzbug and Pappas are appreciably different from those in Caldwell. See Harold L. Nelson, "The Newsman's Privilege Against Disclosure of Confidential Sources and Information," Vanderbilt Law Review 24:4 (May, 1971) pp. 667-669.

[13] See Note 9,

To conclude, we quote Circuit Judge Merrill, who in finding for reporter Earl Caldwell and for the New York Times spoke eloquently not only for the news media but also for the public's interest in being informed. Judge Merrill wrote:[14]

> To convert news gatherers into Department of Justice investigators is to invade the autonomy of the press by imposing a governmental function upon them. To do so where the result is to diminish their future capacity of news gatherers is destructive of their public function. To accomplish this where it has not been shown to be essential to the Grand Jury inquiry simply cannot be justified in the public interest.
>
> Further, it is not unreasonable to expect journalists everywhere to temper their reporting so as to reduce the probability that they will be required to submit to interrogation. The First Amendment guards against governmental action that induces self-censorship.

STATEMENT OF FRANCIS G. WILSON, PRESIDENT, ACCURACY IN MEDIA, INC. FOR THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE OF THE U.S. SENATE

Accuracy in Media, Inc. a nonprofit, nonpartisan citizens' organization devoted to improving the accuracy of news reporting, requested the privilege of testifying in the hearings being held by the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee on the question of the freedom of the press. Although this request was made well before the hearings begain, AIM was not afforded this privilege. We are therefore submitting this statement for inclusion in the record, since we believe that the information and the ideas which we wanted to bring to the attention of the Committee are highly relevant to its deliberations and have not been adequately brought out in the testimony heard by the Committee.

The testimony presented to the Committee has focused largely on the right of the news media to print or broadcast any material whatsoever without the imposition of any legal restraint. The Committee's investigation was prompted in large measure by concern that certain acts of the Administration and Congress constituted a threat to the untrammeled right of free publication and broadcasting. Among other matters, the Committee wished to explore the implications of the Administration's effort to prevent the publication by two major newspapers of stolen secret documents and the efforts of a Congressional subcommittee to investigate allegations of unethical and misleading editing in the CBS documentary, "The Selling of the Pentagon." In both cases, it has been alleged that the actions taken by the Administration and the congressional committee infringed upon "the people's right to know."

Accuracy in Media has taken no position on the case of the Pentagon papers, but we have taken a forthright public stand on the investigation of "The Selling of the Pentagon." We defended the people's right to know—the right to know the truth about how this documentary was edited and how the distortions that misinformed the television viewers were incorporated into the CBS documentary.

We believe that this is a clear case of the conflict of rights. One is the right claimed by the broadcaster to use the airwaves to say anything that he pleases, regardless of consioerations of accuracy or public interest. The other is the right of the public to accurate information on matters of public importance, the right of the people to know.

The broadcaster, in effect, claims that his right to use the airwaves to say whatever he pleases is paramount. Moreover, it is the contention of CBS that if this right results in the dissemination of false and misleading information to the public, neither the executive branch nor Congress should seek to uphold the right of the people to know the truth. The argument is that an exposure by Congressional investigation that shows how the people have been deceived by the broadcaster would have a chilling effect on his exercise of his right to say anything he pleased in the future.

This argument, incredible though it may seem, has been supported by a large segment of the print and the broadcast media—the very same people who have been most vociferous in their proclamations of devotion to the "people's right to know." As the Pentagon Papers case showed, leading figures in the news media refused to draw the line on the right of the people to know at the preservation of the right of the government to keep certain information secret in order to safeguard the security of the nation. Top secret information illegally purloined from the files of the government had to be divulged to the world in order to satisfy the right of the people to know.

---

[14] Caldwell v. United States, 434 U.S. 1081, 1086 (2d Cir., 1970).

But when it is not the government, but a television network, that wishes to keep information of interest to the public secret, the right of the people to know is sacrificed without a qualm. The people, according to this line of thinking, have absolutely no right to know how a monopolizer of the public airwaves has used its power to deceive its audience and manipulate their thought processes.

I say this because of the wide support the media gave to CBS in its refusal to cooperate fully in the investigation that was undertaken by the Special Subcommittee on Investigations of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee earlier this year. The CBS position was that it had an absolute right under the First Amendment to refuse to answer questions or provide subpoenaed material dealing with the editing of "The Selling of the Pentagon". This meant that the network was claiming the absolute right to conceal evidence that might reveal the existence of deceptive practices in the processing of its news programs and documentaries. If fully accepted, this claim would deprive the public of its right to use the powers of government to find out whether or not those licensed to use the public airwaves, at great pecuniary profit to themselves, are abusing the public trust placed in them to present the news honestly, accurately and fairly.

The courts have long recognized that the government has the right and the duty to regulate private firms upon whom it bestows monopoly powers. It has an obligation to see that these firms carry out their responsibilities in a way that serves the public interest. This has been the theory underlying the regulation of the railroads, the airlines and the public utilities. The courts have consistently recognized that this same governmental right and responsibility applies in broadcasting. The Supreme Court made this clear in 1943 in the case of National Broadcasting Co. v. United States (319 U.S. 190) in which it said:

"Freedom of utterance is abridged to many who wish to use the limited facilities of radio. Unlike other modes of expression, radio inherently is not available to all. That is its unique characteristic, and that is why, unlike other modes of expression, it is subject to government regulation."

In 1969, the Supreme Court again rejected the contention that government regulation of broadcasting deprives the broadcasters of their rights under the First Amendment. In a unanimous opinion in the case of Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C. (395 U.S. 367), the court said:

"The broadcasters challenge the fairness doctrine, and its specific manifestations in the personal attack and political editorial rules, on conventional first amendment grounds, alleging that the rules abridge their freedom of speech and press . . . Although broadcasting is clearly a medium affected by a first amendment interest . . . differences in the characteristics of news media justify differences in the first amendment standards applied to them. . . This is not to say that the first amendment is irrelevant to public broadcasting . . . But the people as a whole retain their interest in free speech by radio and their collective right to have the medium function consistently with the ends and purposes of the first amendment. It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount."

This is an important reaffirmation by the Supreme Court that the rights of the people are superior to the rights of a particular vested interest equipped with monopoly powers, when two rights come in conflict.

It is clear that CBS, knowing the weight of legal predent against its claim that its first amendment rights was superior to the rights of the people to have the public airwaves used in a fair and responsible manner, did not wish to test its contention in court. It mounted a very intensive lobbying effort to defeat the contempt citation on the floor of the House of Representatives. Using the great power that its control over an important part of the airwaves gives it, CBS was able to defeat the contempt citation and frustrate any definitive solution of the constitutional question it had raised through obtaining a ruling from the Supreme Court. Obviously, the network understood very well that while it could twist the arms of legislators who had to run for office and who could be severely hurt by hostile broadcasters, it could not hope to exercise comparable influence over the justices of the Supreme Court.

It is particularly ironic that in this dispute the private company, CBS, actually portrayed itself as the defender of the rights of the people against the alleged oppressiveness of the people's elected representatives. CBS, which is a purely private and highly profitable business enterprise, was doing nothing more than trying to protect itself from the embarrassment of having its dirty linen exposed to public view. The contention that "outtakes" were equivalent to confidential notes taken by newspaper reporters was novel. No such contention had been made on any previous occasion when congressional committees or special commissions had asked to see television outtakes. Great quantitites of television tapes and films and inter-office communications had been supplied to the House Special Investigations Subcommittee for its inquiry into the aborted CBS documentary, "Project Nassau." The staff of this same committee had been shown outtakes from coverage of the Chicago Democratic National Convention of 1968 by all the networks without even a supoena being issued. The National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence had also been shown network outtakes in connection with its studies. Why were the outtakes of "The Selling of the Pentagon" so jealously guarded by CBS?

This remains a mystery to this day. If the editing was perfectly straightforward and honest, as CBS has contended, the reputation of CBS would have been enhanced and the charges made against the network could have been exposed as false by merely making the outtakes available to the Congressional Committee or any other group or individual that cared to see and judge them. The contention by CBS was that it had nothing to fear from a study of its editing of the documentary but as a matter of principle it would not cooperate with a Congressional investigation. It merely wanted to uphold its sacred rights under the first amendment.

Soon after the contempt citation was rejected by the House of Representatives, Accuracy in Media put this claim by CBS to a very practical test. We sent the following letter, by certified mail, to Dr. Frank Stanton, President of CBS:

"JULY 17, 1971.

"DEAR DR. STANTON: As you know, some four months ago Accuracy in Media sent a letter to Mr. Richard S. Salant in which we asked a number of questions about "The Selling of the Pentagon." No substantive reply to that letter has been received. We understood that you were delaying any reply until after the matter of the subpoena issued by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Subcommittee was settled. Now that that is out of the way, may we assume that a prompt reply will be made to our letter of March 20, 1971?

"We noted that in the June 24th hearings before the subcommittee you did not dispute the contention that CBS, like other broadcast licensees, is a trustee for the public. We understand that it was your contention that you would not permit the Congressional subcommittee to have access to the "Selling of the Pentagon" outtakes only because of your concern for the first amendment, not because of any desire to abridge the right of the public to know the facts about this documentary and the way in which it was edited.

"In view of this, Accuracy in Media, Inc., as a nonprofit corporation which serves as a representative of consumer interests in the news media field, requests that its representatives be permitted to examine the original film or video tapes shot by CBS of the following interviews or scenes shown in part in "The Selling of the Pentagon."

"1. Roger Mudd interview with Daniel Z. Henkin.
"2. Speech given in Peoria, Ill. by Col. John MacNeil.
"3. Scene of children playing with tanks at Fort Jackson, N.C.
"4. Scene of Green Beret karate demonstration and imitation by children.
"5. Interviews with Dr. Richard Chamberlain, David O'Connor, Robert Greenhill, Mr. Dove and Dr. Olav Sola.
"6. Jerry Friedheim's news conference.
"7. Interview with Jack Tolbert.
"8. Interview with George Wilson.
"9. Interview ith Thomas Demitor.
"10. Daily press briefing in Saigon.

"Accuracy in Media wishes to study these outtakes and compare them with the material selected for use in the finished documentary to determine whether or not artifice in the form of misleading editing or staging was employed to mislead the viewing audience. We also wish to ascertain, if possible, whether or not all of the interviews were spontaneous, or whether there was any prearrangement of the questions asked and the answers supplied. We believe that if the editing was done in accordance with the highest journalistic standards and if there was no staging, CBS will benefit from publication of an AIM report to this effect. If there were serious flaws in the editing, as has been charged, the public will benefit.

"Since AIM is a purely private organization with no coercive power or government backing, CBS clearly has no reason to refuse to supply the requested material on the ground that this infringes first amendment rights. We recognize that CBS may plead that it has a right to keep its affairs private, but we are sure that you would not want to do this, since you are known as a foremost advocate of the people's right to know. You have been quoted as defending the right of the people to access to the Pentagon papers in spite of the "top secret" classification put upon them by the government. It would seem evident that if the people have the right to access to secret government documents of this type, in your view, you would not deny their right of access to outtakes in CBS files merely because this might, in some way, be embarrassing to the network. You would agree, I think, that matters of public interest ought not to be kept secret merely because their exposure might cause embarrassment.

"I understand that you have argued that public exposure of the outtakes might have a "chilling" effect on CBS reporters. I can appreciate that this might be true if the reporters and producers were engaging in practices that were in violation of journalistic ethics, the Television Code and the Operating Standards of CBS. However, it would seem clear that a producer who has observed all of the guidelines should welcome the kind of examination that AIM proposes to make of the outtakes. I can assure you that AIM will examine the material only with the object of preparing an accurate and objective report to determine whether or not the charges of distortion are true or false.

"It would be most convenient for us to examine the outtakes in your Washington studies. We would appreciate being informed if you agree to this request and when the examination might take place.

"Sincerely yours,

"ABRAHAM H. KALISH.
"Secretary."

Accuracy in Media has not yet received any reply to this letter from Dr Stanton or any other official of CBS. Nor have we received the long-promised reply to the questions we raised about "The Selling of the Pentagon" in our letter to Richard S. Salant, President of CBS News of March 23, 1971.

The failure of CBS to show the outtakes of "The Selling of the Pentagon" to Accuracy in Media, a purely private citizens' group, does not bear out the contention that these outtakes were withheld from the Congressional Committee merely because CBS wanted to defend its first amendment rights. If there is nothing in the outtakes that could justify criticism of the editing of "The Selling of the Pentagon," why does CBS not make these outtakes available for inspection by AIM or any other similar private group? Why does not CBS reply to AIM's request explaining why the outtakes are not being made available? Why does CBS not answer the many questions about "The Selling of the Pentagon" that AIM and others asked over six months ago?

Americans want a free press, but a democracy also needs a responsible press. The voter is called upon to make weighty decisions that can vitally affect his personal interests and the future of his family and fellow citizens. It is important that he be equipped with accurate information that will enable him to understand the important issues of the day. Unfortuantely, the news media have lost the confidence of a substantial part of our citizenry. This has been noted by both of our leading poll takers, Lou Harris and George Gallup. Mr. Gallup said this last year:

"Never in my time has journalism of all types—book publishing, television, radio, newspapers, magazines, movies—been held in such low esteem.

After Vice President Agnew made his Des Moines speech criticizing network television on November 13, 1969, CBS received a flood of nearly 70,000 letters, telegrams and telephone calls. Seventy per cent supported the Vice President's criticisms. NBC received 45,500 letters and telegrams, and about 85 per cent supported the Vice President. The Vice President had clearly struck a responsive chord. It is not enough to delpore this loss of confidence in the news media. Those concerned with the question of the future of our free press must ask what can be done to build public confidence in the media. This requires serious examination of the criticisms and consideration of what can be done to correct the defects which are the source of public loss of confidence.

As with many other consumer complaints, the chief criticism is that the product being delivered by the news media is defective. The news media profess to serve their customers with reports of the events of the day that are selected and presented in a fair, objective and accurate manner. The New York Times, for example, has stated that objectivity in its news columns is its "number one, bedrock principle." The Times defines objectivity as follows:

"Objectivity is the determination to write and edit with the elimination of as much personal bias as humanly possible, to present facts and situations as close to reality as possible, to avoid our own pejorative phrases or comments, to give accused people or institutions the right of immediate reply, to present all shadings of opinion and counter-argument, and most of all, to keep examining ourselves day by day and story by story to see if we are being as objective as we can.(New York Times, March 20, 1970, p. 41)"

This is a standard that all the news media that are not frankly partisan and ideological might well strive to attain. It is obvious that many of them fall far short of it, at least in the minds of a large proportion of the consumers of the product. A Gallup poll published January 8, 1970, showed that only 40 per cent of those questioned believed that TV networks dealt fairly with all sides in presenting the news dealing with political and social issues. Only 37 per cent of those queried felt that the newspapers dealt fairly with all sides. If we assume that the public wants newspapers and television to present news in a manner that deals fairly with all sides, we may conclude that the news media do a poorer job of giving the customers what they want than do most producers of consumer goods. The important reason why they can do this and still survive is probably relative absence of competition among the news media and the fact that the dissatisfied public has yet to find an effective way of registering its dissatisfaction with those who control the media.

The startling fact is that according to the latest figures there are only three large cities in the United States in which the customer has a choice of two or more morning newspapers. These are New York, Boston, and Chicago. There are only a dozen cities in the United States in which the customer can choose among two or more evening newspapers. There are only three cities in the United States, New York, Washington and Boston, in which three separate companies are publishing metropolitan dailies. There are only 33 cities in the country where there is true newspaper competition in the sense that there is more than one daily paper without joint operating agreements. There are no doubt many people throughout the country who are upset by the way in which their morning or evening paper treats the news, but who nevertheless continue to subscribe because they have no real choice.

With respect to television news, the viewer has a choice among three network programs at most. The choice is widened, of course, by programs put on by local television stations. But with network television alone, there appears to be little significane to the choice that is avalable in terms of the degree and direction of the bias in the presentation of the news. Bias in TV network news has been analyzed by Edith Efron in her book, "The News Twisters." Miss Efron recorded the prime time network news programs over a seven-week period during the 1968 presidential campign. She isolated statements made on these programs that could be classified as pro or con that pertained to 13 key subjects. She then measured the number of words devoted to the pro and con sides of each of these issues. Her object was to reveal the pattern of opinion selectivity used by network news reporters. The results revealed a much greater degree of one-sidedness in the presentation of the news than even Vice President Agnew's criticisms suggested. For example, Miss Efron found that during this campaign period the networks aired only about one-tenth as much pro-Nixon as anti-Nixon opinion. However, pro-Humphrey opinion outran anti-Humphrey opinion on two of the three networks. All three networks aired far more opinion opposing U.S. policies in Vietnam than opinion favoring those policies. Opinion favoring black militants swamped opinion criticial of black militants. Opinion favorable to the white middle class was nonexistent on two of the three networks, but considerable opinion critical of the white middle class was aired.

Miss Efron's figures appear to fully confirm the criticisms of Vice President Agnew and the perception of some two-fifths of the public (according to the Gallup Poll) that TV network news is one-sided.

The answer to this is not to attack the critics as individuals intent on undermining the freedom of the press. The answer is not to accuse the public of harboring resentments against those who report the news because the news happens to be bad. The answer is to undertake to secure wider adherence to that standard of objectivity which the New York Times claims to strive for. This means attainment not only of greater accuracy in reporting what is reported, but attaining a better pattern of news selection so that certain expressions of opinion or certain events are not systematically excluded because they are not pleasing to those who determine what is news.

Media self-criticism of the type The New York Times says it engages in day-by-day is desirable, but it seems clear that self-criticism is not going to be enough to effect the reforms in the media that are needed to restore public confidence. This conclusion emerges from the experience of Accuracy in Media over the past two years. AIM began with the idea that it could be of service simply by calling factual errors observed in the mews media to the attention of the editors or publishers responsible. It was assumed that journalists were dedicated to factual accuracy and that they would be quick to correct any errors that were brought to their attention. However, AIM has discovered that this is not the case.

More frequently than not, AIM has found that the news media have failed to correct the serious errors that it has called to their attention, even in those cases where the errors were conceded. Rather than showing appreciation for the efforts AIM has made to assist them in improving the accuracy of reporting, the media have frequently responded with pique and hostility. This has been particularly true of the broadcast media, but it applies to some of the print media as well.

I would like to cite two examples from the files of AIM, one involving the broadcast media and another involving one of the country's leading newspapers. On May 18, 1971, a report was carried over a CBS radio network evening news program which charged that the FBI was recruiting boy scouts as informers. This report was based on a false interpretation of a circular that had been distributed to boy scouts in Rochester, N.Y. asking them to be alert to various indicators of possible trouble such as fires or crimes. The circular had been endorsed by the police, the fire department and a number of other organizations in Rochester, including the FBI. A copy of the circular had found its way into the FBI files in Media, Pa., from which it was later stolen along with many other documents. The thieves sent copies of the Rochester Boy Scout flyer to various news media, apparently with the suggestion that it showed that the FBI was recruiting boy scouts as informers. This was promptly denied by officials of The Boy Scouts of America, who on May 18, 1971, issued a press release explaining the true nature of this innocuous circular. The denial and explanation was carried by the wire services and was available to CBS prior to the time the evening radio broadcast was aired, carrying the original false story but not the denial. AIM called this to the attention of CBS and asked that the false impression created by the CBS radio broadcast be corrected. CBS has admitted that it would have been better had the original report taken cognizance of the official denial and explanaton by the Boy Scouts of America, but despite repeated efforts by AIM, CBS has obdurately refused to act to undo the damage that its misleading report did to the reputations of both the Boy Scouts and the FBI.

The second example involves the failure by the Washington Post to carry a story that was treated as important news by the wire services and newspapers throughout the country on July 28–29, 1971. This was the announcement by twelve prominent conservatives, including Mr. William F. Buckley, Jr., that they were suspending their support of President Nixon. The failure of the Washington Post to carry a political story of this nature was most surprising. Upon inquiring as to the reasons, AIM was informed that the Washington Post did not intend to publish anything emanating from individuals connected with William F. Buckley's magazine, The National Review. The reason given was that these people had lost their credibility as a result of the hoax they perpetrated pertaining to the Pentagon papers. The Post had been one of the newspapers taken in by the hoax, and it was clear that this had generated feelings of hostility toward Mr. Buckley. AIM called this matter to the attention of the publisher of the Washington Post, pointing out that it was unprofessional to permit feelings of hostility or pique toward certain individuals to interfere with the reporting of the legitimate newsworthy activities of those individuals. The validity of this point was recognized by the publisher, and the omitted news was subsequently reported by the Post, but the Editors of the Post obviously resented AIM's criticism. This has resulted in a blackout of AIm activities, newsreleases and letters by the Post.

It is our conclusion that the news media as a rule do not respond favorably to criticism, even when it is temperate and well-documented. While a few newspapers have experimented with the appointment of in-house critics to provide the kind of self-criticism recommended by The Times, our feeling is that these men will either have to pull their punches or find themselves uncomfortably at war with their own colleagues. We believe that honest and effective criticism must come from the outside.

The average newspaper reader or TV viewer is not equipped to detect most of the errors of omission and commission that find their way into the media. Even if he senses that something is wrong, he probably does not know how to present his criticism in the most effective manner. A certain amount of time, effort and talent is required to do this. What the consumer of the news media product needs is the services of specialists who can make the necessary investigations and file the complaints in the prover quarters.

The desirability of having a professional body equipped to do this has been debated for many years. The Commission on the Freedom of the Press concluded in 1947 that such a body should be created to report regularly on the performance of the media. This body was not to have any official power to censor or penalize the media. It was to have the power to praise, to criticize, to expose and to exhort. The proposal was denounced by the press, but many people, inluding a few prominent journalists, have recognized that the credibility and the performance of the news media could be improved if they were subject to systematic professional criticism. Great Britain has creaed such a body. It is known as the British Press Council, and it has been operative for twenty years. It has won acceptance in the profession as a useful tool. Sweden established its press council as long ago as 1916. It was reorganized in 1969, and it has recently been given the power to impose small fines on newspapers that violate the rules of good journalism. To assist it, an Ombudsman for the press was appointed. All complaints involving newspapers and magazines are now made to the Press Ombudsman. He investigates, and he may refer the case to the Press Court if he cannot negotiate a settlement otherwise. In his first eight months in office, the Ombudsman handled some 200 complaints.

The American press has long been hostile to the press council idea, but it is encouraging to note that the newspapers in the State of Minnesota recently announced the organization of their own press council. This is a welcome sign that our press is becoming increasingly aware that serious efforts must be made to re-establish press credibility.

I believe that the acceptance by the news media of the outside critics, whether they be press councils or ombudsmen or citizens' organizations like Accuracy in Media, is an important step toward the solution of the dilemma that John Adams described in 1815, when he said:

"If there is ever to be an amerioration of the condition of mankind, philosophers, theologians, legislators politicans, and moralists will find that the regulation of the press is the most difficult, dangerous, and important problem they have to resolve. Mankind cannot now be governed without it, nor at present with it."

APPENDIX

SUBPENAING OF NEWSMEN

[Reprinted by permission of the Yale Law Journal and Fred B. Rothman & Co. from the Yale Law Journal, vol. 80, December 1970]

NOTES: REPORTERS AND THEIR SOURCES, THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT TO A CONFIDENTIAL RELATIONSHIP

During the past year, federal and state prosecutors across the country have issued subpoenas to newsmen and their employers in order to gain access to confidential information obtained in the process of gathering news about highly controversial topics.[1] This use of the subpoena power has substantially increased the likelihood of a conflict between the administration of justice and the public's First Amendment interest in a free flow of information.[2] Government officials have justified their actions by pointing to the dangerous activities about which newsmen may have knowledge.[3] In response, the press has argued that informers, fearing disclosure of their identities or their off-the-record communications, will be deterred from talking with newsmen and that this loss of information will critically limit news available for dissemination to the public.[4]

In the past, courts have found that the interest in compulsory disclosure in the circumstances before them outweighed the potential impairment of the news flow to the public; they accordingly have interpreted both the common law [5] and the Constitution [6] to deny the press the right to withhold information in the face of a compulsory disclosure requirement. Within the last year, however, both federal and state courts have found that, in some circumstances, a newsman's right to protect his source is guaranteed by the First Amendment.[7] Yes, that right has not yet been affirmed by the Supreme Court nor is its nature clear.[8]

---

[1] Federal grand juries have subpoenaed the unedited files and unused pictures of Time, Life, and Newsweek magazines relating to the Weathermen faction of Students for a Democratic Society. Files relating to disturbances at the 1968 Democratic Convention have been subpoenaed from four Chicago newspapers by a federal grand jury. The Antitrust Division has issued a subpoena to Fortune magazine demanding all interview notes, tape recordings, documents, and successive drafts of an article appearing in the magazine concerning an alleged violator of the antitrust laws. A federal grand jury has subpoenaed tapes and non-televised films of a program on the Black Panthers from the Columbia Broadcasting System. Earl Caldwell, a San Francisco correspondent for the New York Times has been summoned before a federal grand jury investigating activities of the Black Panther Party. The issuance of these subpoenas, which seems to represent a divergence from previous Justice Department policy, are discussed in New York Times articles on Feb. 1, 1970 at 24, col. 1; Feb. 3, 1970 at 20, col. 1; Feb. 4, 1970 at 1, col. 1; Feb. 5, 1970 at 1, col. 5; Feb. 6, 1970 at 1, col. 7.

This practice has also been used by state prosecutors. A Wisconsin grand jury has subpoenaed a reporter to testify about a bombing on the University of Wisconsin campus. State v. Knops, No. 146 (Wis. Sup. Ct. Feb. 2, 1971). A Massachusetts grand jury has subpoenaed a reporter to testify about activities witnessed by him in the local black panther headquarters during a time of civil disorder. In re Pappas, No. 14,690 (Mass. Sup. Ct. Jan. 29, 1971). In Kentucky, a prosecutor has sought disclosure of the identities of those persons whom a reporter observed manufacturing hashish. Branzburg v. Pound, 39 U.S.L.W. 1088 (Ky. Ct. App. Nov. 27, 1970).

[2] This conflict has been analyzed by previous commentators. See Comment, Constitutional Protection For the Newsman's Work Product, 6 HARV. CIV. RIGHTS-CIV. LIB L. REV. 119 (1970); D'Alemberte, Journalists Under the Axe: Protection of Confidential Sources of Information, 6 HARV. J. LEGIS. 307 (1969); Guest & Stanzler, The Constitutional Argument for Newsmen Concealing Their Sources, 64 NW. U.L. REV. 18 (1969); 82 HARV. L. REV. 1384 (1969); Beaver, The Newsman's Code, the Claim of Privilege and Everyman's Right to Evidence, 47 ORE. L. REV. 243 (1968); Note, Privileged Communications—News Media—A "Shield Statute" for Oregon, 46 ORE. L. REV. 99 (1966); 61 MICH. L. REV. 184 (1962); Carter, The Journalist, His Informant and Testimonal Privilege, 35 N.Y.U. L. REV. 1111 (1960); Note, Journalist's Testimonial Privilege, 9 CLEV.-MAR. L. REV. 311 (1960); 11 STAN. L. REV. 541 (1959); 8 BUFFALO L. REV. 294 (1959); Note, The Journalist and His Confidential Informants—Should They Be Privileged from Compulsory Disclosure? 32 TEMP L.Q. 432 (1959); Note, The Journalist and His Confidential Source: Should a Testimonal Privilege Be Allowed? 35 NEB. L. REV. 562 (1956); Note, The Right of a Newsman to Refrain from Divulging the Sources of His Information, 36 VA. L. REV. 61 (1950); Note, 45 YALE L.J. 357 (1935).

[3] See Statement of Attorney General Mitchell, New York Times, Feb. 6, 1970 at 40, col. 4.

[4] See, e.g., Frankel, Mitchell and Press Problems, New York Times, Feb. 6, 1970 at 40, col. 4, discussing the threat to reporting posed by the subpoena.

This Note will argue that, subject to carefully delineated exceptions applicable to criminal trials and certain libel actions, the First Amendment should guarantee a broad right to keep communications and the identities of informants confidential when news gatherers are summoned before courts, grand juries, and legislative committees. An evaluation of the conflicting positions will suggest that the First Amendment interest of the newsman and his source in knowing with certainty when the confidentiality of their relationship will be respected (and when it will not) should be accorded substantially greater weight than the government's claim for a roving commission to gain access to communications arising from this relationship. This evaluation also provides guidance in deciding the scope of protection, who may claim the right of nondisclosure, what types of information the right protects, and when the right may be invoked.

I. CURRENT APPROACHES TO THE RIGHT TO A PROTECTED RELATIONSHIP

A. Competing Interests

The duty to testify at judicial proceedings is a venerable instrument of justice which was recognized early in the development of English law [9] and has been clearly acknowledged by the Supreme Court.[10] A necessary function of the judicial process in both civil and criminal litigation is to provide a forum where all facts relevant to the controversy at issue may be presented. The theory of the adversary method of conflict resolution demands that each party have the fullest opportunity to acquire and present those facts which advance its interests.

Disclosure requirements are also important to grand jury proceedings; they provide the means for investigating possible criminal conduct and thereby protect society by facilitating the administration of the prosecutorial system.[11]

---

[5] For a discussion of cases denying the newsman a common law right of nondisclosure, see Annot. 7 A.L.R. 3d 591, 592–96 (1966).

[6] Garland v. Torre, 295 F.2d 545 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910 (1958); State v. Knops, No. 146 (Wis. Sup. Ct. Feb. 2, 1971); In re Pappas, No. 14,690 (Mass. Sup. Ct. Jan. 29, 1971); Adams v. Associated Press, 46 F.R.D. 439 (S.D. Tex. 1969); State v. Buchanan, 250 Ore. 244, 436 P.2d 729, cert. denied, 392 U.S. 905 (1968); In re Taylor, 412 Pa. 32, 193, A.2d 181 (1963); In re Goodfader, 45 Hawaii 317, P.2d 472 (1961); Murphy v. Colorado, unreported, cert. denied, 365 U.S. 843 (1961). Dicta in the Torre, Knops, Adams, and Goodfader decisions indicate that a constitutional right of nondisclosure might be found in other circumstances.

[7] In re Caldwell, No. 26,025 (9th Cir. Nov. 16, 1970), petition for cert. filed sub nom. U.S. v. Caldwell, 3905 U.S.L.W. 3273 (U.S. Dec. 16, 1970) (No. 1114), Air Transport Ass'n v. Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization, Crim. Nos. 70–C–400, 410 (E.D.N.Y. 1970) (transcript of April 6, 1970 at 21, 38–39, 149–50); Alioto v. Cowles Communications, Inc. C.A. 52150 (N.D. Cal. 1969) (unreported hearing, Dec. 4, 1969, Tr. 165–67); People v. Dohrn, Crim. No. 69–3808 (Cir. Ct. Cook Cty., Ill. May 20, 1970); People v. Rios, No. 75129 (Super. Ct. San Francisco Cty. 1970).

[8] The Supreme Court has denied certiorari three times: State v. Buchanan, 250 Ore. 244, 436 P.2d 729, cert. denied, 392 U.S. 905 (1968); Murphy v. Colorado, unreported, cert. denied, 364 U.S. 843 (1961); Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910 (1958). The government has recently filed a petition for certiorari in In re Caldwll, No. 26,025 (9th Cir. Nov. 16, 1970), petition for cert. filed sub nom. U.S. v. Caldwell, 3905 U.S. L.W. 3273 (U.S. Dec. 16, 1970) (No. 1114). The Supreme Court has granted stays in two recent cases concerning this issue, an indication that it might grant certiorari. In re Pappas, No. 14,690 (Mass. Sup. Ct. Jan. 29, 1971), stay granted sub nom. Pappas v. Smith by Mr. Justice Brennan (Feb. 4, 1971); Branzburg v. Pound, 39 U.S.L.W. 1088 (Ky. Ct. App. Nov. 27, 1970), stay granted sub nom. Branzburg v. Hayes by Mr. Justice Stewart (Jan. 26, 1971).

[9] See 1 W. HOLDSWORTH, A HISTORY OF ENGLISH LAW, 325–26 (7th ed. 1966); 5 W. HOLDSWORTH A HISTORY OF ENGLISH LAW, 192–93 (7th ed. 1966).

[10] "It is also beyond controversy that one of the duties which the citizen owes to his government is to support the administration of justice by attending its courts and giving his testimony whenever he is properly summoned." Blackmer v. United Staes, 284 U.S. 421, 438 (1932); for a history of the duty to testify, see Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273, 279–80 (1919).

[11] The grand jury serves two important functions: "to examine into the commission of crimes" and "to stand between the prosecutor and the accused, and to determine whether the charge was founded upon credible testimony or was dictated by malice or personal ill will." Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 59 (1906). Compulsory disclosure is important to both of these functions.

The testimony of newsmen, especially those supported by the financial resources of the larger press institutions, is particularly useful to a public prosecutor, since reporters' independent investigative activities often overlap areas under official scrutiny. Because the possession of information by newsmen is easily recognized through published work, prosecutors may turn to reporters as the most immediate sources from which to obtain disclosure of material necessary for indictments and arrests.

A slightly different rationale explains the duty to testify at legislative hearings. Article I of the Constitution invests Congress with "all legislative powers" granted to the United States and with power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper" for carrying into execution these powers and "all other powers" vested by the Constitution in the United States or in any officer. The Supreme Court has held that the power to secure needed information is an attribute of the power to legislate.[12] The requirement of compulsory disclosure facilitates the passage of effective laws by providing Congress with access to a full range of relevant fact and opinion. The power to compel testimony is also needed by state legislatures in order that they may secure information necessary for informed lawmaking at that level of government.[13]

From the press's perspective, however, the unrestrained use of subpoenas issued to newsmen impairs the flow of news to the public, because compulsory testimony poses dilemmas for both news sources and news gatherers which prevent establishment of the confidential relationships necessary for obtaining information. The potential informant must speculate as to whether his identity or other off-the-record aspects of his communications with a reporter will be subject to official scrutiny through the subpoena process. The potential source is therefore forced to choose either to give information, thus risking exposure to official investigatory efforts, or to avoid the risk by remaining silent. The reporter must speculate as to whether publication of certain material will lead to a subpoena. If a subpoena is issued, the newsman must then either disclose confidential information, which could impair his reputation and resourcefulness as a reporter, or receive a contempt citation for his refusal to testify.

B. Attempted Resolutions

Current state and federal law resolves the conflict between the public's interest in compelled disclosure and its interest in a free flow of information in a variety of ways.

No Privilege. The common law requires a reporter to testify concerning information received in confidence and to disclose the identity of informants, for it does not recognize that communication between news gatherer and informant merits special protection.[14]

Statutory Privilege for Informant's Identity. Sixteen states have made the legislative determination that protection of the identities of newsmen's informants from disclosure before judicial and legislative proceedings is necessary to maintain a flow of information to the public and will not unduly hamper the judicial and legislative processes.[15] In twelve of these states, the newsman may refuse to disclose the identity of his informant regardless of the importance of disclsoure to the particular subject of inquiry.[16] However, in half of these twelve states, the communication with an informer must be published before a reporter may claim the nondisclosure right regarding the source of information.[17] Only three of the state statutes protecting the identities of news sources from disclosure also protect confidential communications received from informants.[18] The other state statutes require that confidential communications be disclosed even though the identity of the source may be protected.

---

[12] McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U.S. 135, 175 (1927):

> A legislative body cannot legislate wisely or effectively in the absence of information respecting the conditions which the legislation is intended to affect or change; and where the legislative body does not itself possess the requisite information—which not infrequently is true—recourse must be had to others who do possess it. Experience has taught that mere requests for such information are often unavailing, and also that information which is volunteered is not always accurate or complete; so that some means of compulsion are essential to obtain what is needed.

[13] See Annot, 50 A.L.R. 21 (1927); Annot. 65 A.L.R. 1518 (1930). Administrative agencies may also be granted subpoena power by statute in order to perform effectively their functions. See, e.g., 26 U.S.C. 7608(a)(2) (1964).

[14] 8 J. WIGMORE, EVIDENCE § 2286 (McNaughton ed. 1961). See 11 STAN L. REV. 541 (1959); Comment, Compulsory Disclosure of a Newsman's Source: A Compromise Proposal, 54 NW. U.L. REV. 243 (1959); Galleys, Further Consideration of a Privilege for Newsmen, 14 ALBANY L. REV. 16 (1950); Note, 45 YALE L.J. 357 (1935).

[15] Ala. Code tit. 7, § 370 (1960); Alas. Compl. Laws Ann. §§ 09.25.150, 160 (Supp. 1970); Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 12-2237 (Supp. 1970); Ark. Stat. Ann. § 43-917 (1964); Cal. Evid. Code § 1070 (1966); Ind. Stat. Ann. § 2-1733 (1968); Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 421.100 (1960); La. Rev. Stat. tit. 45 §§ 1451-53 (Supp. 1970); Md. Code Ann. art. 35 § 2 (1965); Mich. C.L. 767.5a (1968); Mont. R. Code Ann. tit. 93 §§ 601-03 (1947); N.J. Rev. Stat. § 2A:84A-21 (Supp. 1970); N.M. Stat. Ann. § 20-1-12.1 (Supp. 1970); N.Y. Civil Rights Law § 79-h (1970); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 2739.12 (1953); Pa. Stat. Ann. titl. 28 § 330 (1958). For a general discussion of these statutes, see D'Alemberte, supra note 2.

A number of federal statutes shielding the newsman from compulsory disclosure have been proposed in an effort to achieve uniform standards of protection for news gathering.[19] In the past, these proposals have been limited to protecting the identities of news informants from disclosure.[20] However, in 1970, legislation was proposed which protects both the identities of informants and confidential communications received from them, unless disclosure is required in the interests of national security.[21]

Reasonable Likelihood Test. One state court has suggested that compulsory revelation of informants or confidential information might raise First Amendment problems, but it proceeded to hold that disclosure of a nwsman's information and sources is constitutional when there is a "reasonable likelihood" that the desired information will be relevant to the judicial subject of inquiry.[22] This test aims to eliminate groundless "fishing expeditions" and to restrict disclosure to situations in which there is reason to believe the disclosed information will aid the administration of justice.[23]

---

[16] See statutory provisions, supra note 15, for Ala., Ariz., Cal., Ind., Ky., Md., Mich., Mont., N.J., N.Y., Ohio, and Pa. These statutes indicate a legislative determination that any protection short of this broad right to maintain the secrecy of informants' identities would significantly impair the newsgatherer-informer relationship because of the uncertainties attending a qualified right.

Four states having a qualified newsman's right of nondisclosure. See statutory provisions, supra note 15, for Alaska, Ark., La., and N.M. In Alaska disclosure may be required if the withholding of testimony would result in a "miscarriage of justice" or is "contrary to the public interest." The Arkansas statute requires disclosure if it can be shown that an article containing information from a confidential source was published "in bad faith, with malice, and not in the interest of public welfare." The Louisiana statute requires disclosure when "essential to the public interest." In New Mexico, disclosure is required when "essential to prevent injustice."

[17] See statutory provisions, supra note 15, for Ala., Ariz. Cal., Ky., Md., and N.J. Publication is required in order to assure that the right of nondisclosure is only granted when the public has had the opportunity to benefit from the informer's communication.

[18] See statutory provisions, supra note 15, for Mich., N.Y., and Pa. The Michigan statute protects from disclosure all "communications" between reporters and informants. The New York statute provides for nondisclosure of "any news or the source of any such news." This statute was passed in May, 1970, subsequent to the issuance of a number of Justice Department subpoenas to newsmen requiring disclosure of information communicated in confidence. See p. 317 and note 1 supra. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court has construed the word "source" in the Pennsylvania statute to include confidential information, as well as the identities of sources. In re Taylor, 412 Pa. 32, 40, 193 A.2d 181, 184–85 (1963).

[19] See, e.g., S. 1851, 88th Cong., 1st Sess. (1963) ; H.R. 8519, 88th Cong., 1st Sess. 1963) ; S. 965, 86th Cong. 1st Sess. (1959) ; H.R. 355, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. (1959). For an analysis of proposed Congressional legislation, see Staff of Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 89th Cong., 2d Sess., The Newsman's Privilege (Comm. Print 1966).

[20] A typical proposal reads: A witness who is employed by a newspaper, news service, newspaper syndicate, periodical, or radio or television station or network, as a writer, reporter, correspondent, or commentator or in any other capacity directly involved in the gathering or presentation of news, shall not be required in any court of the United States to disclose the source of any information obtained in such capacity unless in the opinion of the court such disclosure is necessary in the interest of national security.

[21] S. 3552, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. (1970) ; H.R. 16328, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. (1970) ; H.R. 16704, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. (1970).

[22] In a case before the Hawaiian Supreme Court, In re Goodfader, 45 Hawaii 317, 367 P.2d 472 (1961), a plaintiff was suing for reinstatement on the Civil Service Commission, claiming that her dismissal was the result of prior conspiracy among the Commission members. She sought disclosure of the source from whom a reporter had received advance warning of her dismissal. The court recognized that disclosure would create some deterent effect but held that disclosure could be constitutionally allowed because the reporter's source might have knowledge as to the cause of her dismissal and aid her claim. It reasoned: "There, of course, can be no assurance that if the plaintiff is permitted to pursue her inquiry, she will obtain from deponent's answers the identity of anyone who can substantiate the basic point of her alleged case. . . . [W]e can only say that it is our best judgment that the inquiry desired to be made by the plaintiff in this case could be considered likely enough to lead to discovery of sufficiently important admissible evidence to warrant the trial court's permitting her to pursue it . . . ." Id. at 338, 367 P.2d at 484–85.

[23] Presumably this standard, determined in a trial context, could also apply to grand jury and legislative investigations; disclosure could be required if there were reason to believe that the desired information would aid the investigation.

Heart of the Matter Test. The Second Circuit's opinion in Garland v. Torre can be read to require that the constitutionality of compulsory disclosure of a newsman's confidential sources be determined by whether the information sought by subpoena goes "to the heart of the . . . claim." [24] In this case, Judy Garland had sued the Columbia Broadcasting System for libel because of an allegedly defamatory comment published in a newspaper column, but attributed to an unnamed C.B.S. executive. The identity of the author of the comment was crucial to her claim, for only if he were proven to be a C.B.S. executive would she have grounds for action against the broadcasting network. The court reasoned that because the action would be defeated if the informer's identity were not revealed, "the paramount public interest in the fair administration of justice" outweighed the potential injury to the free flow of news.[25] It indicated that in other situations, as "where the identity of the news source is of doubtful relevance or materiality," the source might not be constitutionally compelled to testify.[26] This is perhaps a stricter test than the demand for "reasonable likelihood." The Torre rationale suggests that disclosure should not be compelled unless the information possessed by the reporter appears important to the resolution of the judicial controversy.

A variant of the "heart of the matter" test has been proposed by recent Justice Department guidelines for the issuance of federal investigatory subpoenas.[27] As with the "heart of the matter" test, the theory of this proposal is that testimony should not be compelled before governmental bodies unless the desired information appears necessary to the inquiry. These guidelines state that "[t]here should be sufficient reason to believe that the information sought is essential to a successful investigation"; they explicitly recognize that "[t]he subpoena should not be used to obtain peripheral, nonessential or speculative information." [28] The Attorney General's permission is required for issuance of a subpoena to a reporter, and the guidelines further recommend that, before issuance of such a subpoena, "reasonable " attempts should be made to obtain the desired information from nonpress sources or to persuade the reporter to convey voluntarily the desired material.[29]

Miscarriage of Justice. A constitutional test requiring disclosure by a newsman only when a miscarriage of justice would otherwise result appears to be a somewhat stricter standard than a determination whether the information goes "to the heart of the matter." An Illinois court recently adopted this test in People v. Dohrn.[30] The court held that the Illinois subpoena statutes violated the First Amendment rights of newsmen by requiring them to appear before judicial bodies regardless of the importance of the testimony desired from them. The court reasoned that because of the "inherently" inhibiting effect of subpoenas on reporters, the party desiring such a subpoena must show substantial cause for compelling the reporter's testimony. It then quashed subpoenas which had been served on newsmen by the defendants in a criminal suit and held that no such orders may be issued without a preliminary hearing at which the party desiring to compel the reporter's testimony must prove: (1) there is probable cause to believe that the reporter has information relevant to the subject of investigation; (2) the subpoena is the only method by which the evidence may be obtained; and (3) a "miscarriage of justice" would result if the information sought were not provided.[31]

---

[24] 259 F.2d 545. 550 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910 (1958). The Wisconsin Supreme Court interpreted the Torre decision in this manner. State v. Knops, No. 146 (Wis. Sup. Ct. Feb. 2, 1971).

[25] Id. at 549.

[26] Id. at 549–50.

[27] Address by Attorney General John N. Mitchell, A.B.A. House of Delegates, Aug. 10, 1970, in 7 CRIM. L. REP. 2461 (Sept. 2, 1970). Previously there were no express guidelines, although it was Justice Department policy to negotiate with the publisher prior to the issuance of a subpoena. See Statement of Attorney General Mitchell, New York Times, Feb. 6, 1970 at 40, col. 4.

[28] Address by Attorney General John N. Mitchell, supra, note 27.

[29] Id. These guidelines would be applicable for the issuance of subpoenas by all Justice Department officials whether in a trial or grand jury context. However, neither Congress, state legislatures, state prosecutors, nor individual litigants would be bound by the guidelines.

[30] People v. Dohrn, Crim. No. 69–3808 (Cir. Ct. Cook Cty., Ill. May 20, 1970).

[31] Id. This standard entails judicial enforcement of an "alternative means" test suggested by the Justice Department guidelines; disclosure may be required only when the confidential information appears necessary to a non-frivolous claim or investigation and the desired information cannot be obtained in an alternative fashion. It is applicable to both the government and private parties, and presumably applies in both a judicial and legislative setting; however, it is difficult to determine how the "alternative means" test will function in a criminal trial in those circumstances in which there is need for cumulative evidence.

Compelling Need. The Ninth Circuit recently adopted a somewhat similar constitutional test as a prerequisite for compelling a journalist to appear before a grand jury.[32] The district court had held that New York Times reporter Earl Caldwell must appear before the grand jury investigating the Black Panther Party, but it had granted him a protective order stating that he was not required to testify about matters transmitted to him in confidence until such time as a "compelling and overriding national interest which cannot be alternatively served has been established to the satisfaction of the court." [33] The Court of Appeals agreed with the district court that "compelled disclosure of information received by a journalist within the scope of such confidential relationships jeopardizes those relationships and thereby impairs the journalist's ability to gather, analyze, and publish the news." [34] However, because of the potential deterrence created by Caldwell's mere appearance before a secret investigatory body, the court of appeals held that the First Amendment provided Caldwell with a right not to appear before a grand jury until the state had demonstrated a "compelling need" for his testimony.[35] While the court did not set guidelines as to what would constitute such a showing, it referred to those standards formulated in People v. Dohrn as possible criteria for a state showing of "compelling need." [36] The Ninth Circuit did not indicate whether "compelling need" had a meaning different from the phrase, a "compelling and overriding national interest." although the concurring opinion suggested that no distinction was intended.[37]

II. FIRST AMENDMENT PROTECTION FOR THE REPORTER-INFORMANT RELATIONSHIP

The newsman's right to protect his sources and their communications flows from the freedom of the press clause of the First Amendment.[38] However, those cases [39] which have found constitutional protection for the newsman-informer relationship have not, in construing the free press clause, enunciated a coherent set of principles which justify the right of nondisclosure. Nor have they provided much guidance for future decisions, since they are usually based on an ad hoc balance of interests. For example, in the recent Caldwell case, the court of appeals held that a reporter did not have to appear before a grand jury because the political group he covered was extremely sensitive to the possibility of disclosure of certain information the reporter had obtained.[40]

---

[32] In re Caldwell, No. 26,025 (9th Cir. Nov. 16, 1970).

[33] Application of Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358, 360 (N.D. Cal., 1970).

[34] In re Caldwell, No. 26,025 (9th Cir. Nov. 16, 1970) (quoting district court opinion).

[35] The Ninth Circuit reasoned:

> [W]e find guidance in the Supreme Court decisions regarding conflicts between First Amendment interests and legislative investigatory needs; the Court has required the sacrifice of First Amendment freedoms only where a compelling need for the particular testimony in question is demonstrated.

Id. (footnotes omitted).

[36] See p. 324 supra.

[37] Judge Jameson, concurring, stated: "In my opinion the order of the district court could properly be affirmed, and this would accord with the customary procedure of requiring a witness to seek a protective order after appearing before the grand jury. I have concluded however, that Judge Merrill's opinion properly holds that the same result may be achieved by requiring the Government to demonstrate the compelling need for the witnesses's presence prior to the issuance of a subpoena and in this manner avoid any unnecessary impingement of the First Amendment rights." In re Caldwell, No. 26,025 (9th Cir. Nov. 16, 1970) (concurring opinion).

[38] The First Amendment provides: "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press . . . ." The First Amendment is not only applicable to legislative action, but also to action by the federal executive and judiciary, including the issuance of subpoenas in connection with federal investigations and proceedings. See e.g., Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 187–88 (1957). The First Amendment applies to state government by reason of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. See, e.g., New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964); Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234 (1957).

[39] See note 7 supra.

[40] The court reasoned: "Finally we wish to emphasize what must already be clear: the rule of this case is a narrow one. It is not every news source that is as sensitive as the Black Panther Party has been shown to be respecting the performance of the "establisment" press or the extent to which that performance is open to view. It is not every reporter who so uniquely enjoys the trust and confidence of his sensitive news source." In re Caldwell, No. 26,025 (9th Cir. Nov. 16, 1970). Uncertainty as to the use of this test in other newsman-informer relationships is exemplified by a comparison of recent decisions by the supreme courts of Massachusetts and Wisconsin. The Massachusetts court rejected the test altogether, arguing that "there exists no constitutional

The court recognized that, because of the potential deterrence of informers in that particular situation and because the government had not shown a "compelling need" for his testimony, the First Amendment provided the reporter with a right of nondisclosure. However, uncertainty still surrounds the newsman-informer relationship, since the court offered no guidelines to measure the requisite potential deterence or the quantum of need to be demonstrated by the government. In light of the divergent approaches adopted by lower courts and the stunted rationales of those decisions which have given constitutional protection to the informer-reporter relationship, a coherent First Amendment argument for the constitutional right to a confidential relationship must be developed before the proper reconciliation of the competing interests can be determined.

A. "Freedom of the Press" Implies the Right To Gather News

Democratic society is premised on the idea of individual autonomy and requires that citizens make informed decisions of a political, social, and economic nature. This conception of personal development and participation in societal processes, which is a core tenet of democratic theory, is based, in turn, on a presumption that the fullest range of information should be available to individuals so that they will be adequately equipped to make both personal and political decisions.[41] Such access to opinion and fact may only be provided if there is a flow of information to the public, unconstrained (insofar as possible) by either public or private forces. A free press plays a crucial role in preserving this information flow, for in a large and complex society where face-to-face communication is often impossible on a meaningful scale, information must usually be disseminated through the press.[42] In giving meaning to the First Amendment's mandate for a free press, the Supreme Court has, therefore, defined freedom to print as a right basic to the existence of a democratic society.[43]

The Court has also delineated a set of corollary rights to "freedom to print" which must be protected in order to ensure the continued vitality of the information flow to the public. A basic freedom is the right to publish without prior governmental approval.[44] The Court has recognized, however, that government action less drastic than prior censorship may curtail the dissemination of news to the public. In Grosjean v. American Press Co., the Court found it necessary to recognize explicitly a right of circulation in order to ensure the preservation of an "untrammeled press as a vital source of public information." [45] Other Supreme Court decisions have recognized the right to newsman's privilege either qualified or absolute, to refuse to appear and testify before a court or grand jury." In re Pappas, No. 14,690 (Mass Sup. Ct. Jan. 29, 1971). The Wisconsin court, acknowledging the test, held that a newsman could be required to disclose before a grand jury the identities of those who had allegedly bombed a building because the "administration of criminal justice itself is a sufficient substantial interest of the state." This interpretation of the "compelling need" test suggests that disclosure could always be compelled during an investigation into possible criminal conduct. State v. Knops, No. 146 (Wis. Sup. Ct. Feb. 2, 1971).

---

[41] See T. Emerson, Toward a General Theory of the First Amendment 3–15 (1963). Emerson states four reasons for maintaining a system of free expression: (1) to issure individual self-fulfillment; (2) to attain the truth; (3) to secure the participation of the members of society in social decision-making; and (4) to maintain a balance between stability and change in society. Id at 3. See generally A. Meikeljohn, Free Speech and Its Relation to Self-Government (1948).

[42] The First Amendment freedom of the press provision applies to radio and television broadcasting as well as to publications. See, e.g., Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C. 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

[43] See. e.g., Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 250 (1936); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270 (1964).

[44] Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931).

[45] 297 U.S. 233, 250 (1936). A special license tax applicable only to newspapers with circulation in excess of 20,000 copies per week was held unconstitutional as a restraint upon both publication and circulation. The Court recognized that the tax would deter circulation in excess of 20,000 and therefore limit the flow of news to the public.

distribute literature freely[46] and the right to receive printed matter without state restrictions which might impair the free flow of information.[47]

The right to gather news is as basic to a free press as the right to distribute and receive printed materials, because without freedom to gather information the right to print would be severely diminished in value. The general principle that news must not be unnecessarily cut off at its source is fundamental to the concept of a free flow of information to the public. The framers of the Bill of Rights recognized that the right to gather news was implicit in the First Amendment. Madison wrote:

"A popular government without popular information or the means of acquiring it is but a prologue to a farce or tragedy or perhaps both."[48]

Modern commentators have also emphasized the fundamental importance of the news gathering function of the press:

"If the public opinion which directs conduct of governmental affairs is to have any validity and if the people are to be capable of real self-rule, access to all relevant facts upon which rational judgments may be based must be provoked."[49]

The right to gather material for publication has never been explicitly recognized by the Supreme Court. However, the Court, in recognizing specific exceptions to a right of access in the interests of national security, has implicitly acknowledged the existence of a general right to gather information.[50] The existence of some right to gather news (whatever its exact dimensions) is thus derived both from the central position a free press occupies in democratic theory and from its relation to other rights established by the existing cases interpreting the freedom of the press clause.[51]

---

[46] See, e.g., Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501 (1946); Martin v. City of Struthers, 319 U.S. 141 (1943); Jamison v. Texas, 318 U.S. 413 (1943); Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147 (1939).

For example, in Martin v. City of Struthers, supra, the Court held unconstitutional an ordinance which forbade door-to-door distribution of handbills because those accustomed to circulating material in this manner would be restrained in their activities, and, as a consequence, the public would be the recipient of less information. The ordinance was passed for substantial reasons, viz. prevention of crime and protection of privacy in an industrial community where many worked night shifts. However, the Court determined that the reasons advanced to support the statute were insufficient to justify such a limitation on the means of distribution.

[47] Lamont v. Postmaster General, 381 U.S. 301 (1965). The case involved a challenge to legislation which required the Postmaster General to detain unsealed foreign mailings of "communist political propaganda" and deliver only upon the addressee's request. The statute was held to violate the addressee's First Amendment right to receive information because it imposed upon him an affirmative obligation of requesting delivery, and he might be deterred from performing the necessary steps in order to receive the information. Mr. Justice Brennan concurring, reasoned that the First Amendment protected dissemination of ideas and that "such dissemination can accomplish nothing if otherwise willing addressees are not free to receive and consider them." 381 U.S. at 308.

[48] 6 WRITINGS OF JAMES MADISON 398 (Hunt ed. 1906).

[49] Note, Access to Official Information: A Neglected Constitutional Right, 27 IND. L.J. 209, 211 (1952).

[50] See Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1 (1965). The Supreme Court held that the Secretary of State's denial of a passport for travel to Cuba did not violate a citizen's First Amendment right to acquire information concerning that country. The Court recognized that the Secretary's refusal to validate passports for Cuba rendered less than wholly free the flow of information concerning that country; however, it reasoned that the Secretary's refusal was a restraint of action, and that under certain circumstances actions were subject to regulation. Implicitly recognizing some right to gather information, the Court concluded that the "right to speak and publish does not carry with it the unrestrained right to gather information," and that "the weightiest considerations of national security" necessitated this particular restraint. Id. at 17, 16 (emphasis added).

See also Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1 (1945). In this case, certain by-laws of the Associated Press were held to be in violation of the Sherman Act because they prevented non-member newspapers from publishing news from the Associated Press or its publisher members and thus curtailed publication of competitive newspapers. The Court noted, however, that the First Amendment provided a substantial argument in support of the application of the antitrust laws because the by-laws denied non-member newspapers access to news: "That amendment rests on the assumption that the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources is essential to the welfare of the public, and that a free press is a condition of a free society. Surely a command that the government itself shall not impede the flow of ideas does not afford non-governmental combinations a refuge if they impose restraints upon that constitutionally guaranteed freedom."
Id. at 20.

[51] The right to gather information raises a number of complex issues such as an individual's right to travel, discussed in Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1 (1965), and an individual's right of access to government information. However, discussion in this Note is limited to the right to confidential informer-reporter relationships as derived from the right to gather information.

B. The Right To Gather News Implies the Right To Protect News Sources

The right to confidential informer-reporter. relationships follows logically from the right to gather news when four factual assumptions are accepted: (1) Newsmen require informants to gather news; (2) confidentiality (the promise that names and certain aspects of communications will be kept off-the-record) is essential to the establishment of a relationship with many informers; (3) the use of an unbridled subpoena power will deter potential sources from divulging information; and (4) the use of an unbridled subpoena power will deter reporters from gathering or publishing information which might lead to a demand for complete compulsory disclosure. If these factual assumptions are correct, the press will be less effective in uncovering criminal activity, corruption, government mismanagement, and other matters of public interest unless a right to protect the confidentiality of news sources is created. Much discussion will be stifled concerning socially controversial activites, such as illegal abortion and drug usage, for individuals will avoid the possibility of public identification with illegal conduct.[52] Some persons will be reluctant to voice their opinions without assurances of anonymity for fear of harassment and reprisal.[53]

It is obvious that the first assumption is valid. However, courts that have denied the constitutional right to confidential informer-reporter relationships have often not accepted the validity of either the second, third, or fourth assumptions from which the right is logically derived.[54] Yet, available data suggests that those who deny any vaidity to these three assumptions are wrong to do so.

Surveys of the press indicate that a substantial number of newspaper stories are based on information which could only be secured through confidential informer-reporter relationships.[55] Erwin D. Canham, editor-in-chief of the Christian Science Monitor, estimates that from 33% to 50% of that newspaper's major stories involve confidential sources, and the Wall Street Journal states that 15% of its articles are based on information from confidential informants.[56] The managing editor of the San Francisco Chronicle writes that "an absolutely staggering number of stories, political and non-political, arise from information received in confidence."[57] "Systematic" empirical evidence has not been developed, in part because reporters and editors do not keep records of the confidential nature of sources and therefore must make educated guesses as to the incidence of confidentiality. But it is still clear from available data that some leading newsmen regard confidentiality as essential for development of many news stories.

The issuance of subpoenas to news gatherers also appears to silence potential informants who fear that their identity of their off-the-record communications may have to be revealed by the newsman. Even some courts that have denied the constitutional right to a confidential relationship have taken judicial notice that compulsory disclosure of information will deter informers and limit sources available to newsmen.[58] Recognizing that a broad guarantee of confidentiality is essential to the maintenance of informer-reporter relationships, the American Newspaper Guild has adopted the following rule as part of the newsman's code of ethics: "Newspaper men shall refuse to reveal confidence or disclose sources of confidential information in court or before other judicial or investigative bodies." [59]

---

[52] See, e.g., State v. Buchanan 250 Ore. 244, 436 P.2d 729, cert. denied, 392 U.S. 905 (1968), which required disclosure of several informants who, under an express promise that their identities would not be revealed, had provided information to a reporter relating to the use of marijuana on a university campus.

[53] The Supreme Court has recognized the importance of guarantees of anonymity to assure free expression. In Talley v. California, a statute prhibiting distribution of anonymous handbills was held void on its face because "identification and fear of reprisal might deter perfectly peaceful discussions of public matters of importance." 362 U.S. 60, 65 (1960).

[54] See note 6 supra. In the Massachusetts case, In re Pappas, No. 14,690 (Mass. Sup. Ct. Jan. 29, 1971), the court stated: "Any effect on the free dissemination of news is indirect, theoretical, and uncertain, and relates at most to the future gathering of news."

[55] For the most extensive survey to date, see the Appendix to Guest & Stantzler, supra note 2, at 57–61. In Application of Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970), eighteen affidavits by such prominent newsmen as Walter Cronkite and Eric Sevareid were submitted with the Caldwell and amicus briefs stressing the importance of informer-reporter relationships in the gathering of news and the necessity of guaranteeing confidentiality for the maintenance of these relationships. The Court of Appeals relied heavily on these affidavits: "The fact that subpoenas would have a chilling effect on First Amendment freedoms was impressively asserted in affidavits of newsmen of recognized stature, to a considerable extent based upon recited experience." In re Caldwell, No. 26,025 (9th Cir. Nov. 16, 1970).

[56] Guest & Stanzer, supra note 2, at 43–44, 61.

[57] Id. at 60.

[58] Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545, 548 (2d Cir.;, cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910 (1958); In re Taylor, 412 Pa. 32, 41, 193 A.2d 181, 185 (1963).

Although again no "systematic" empirical evidence of a deterrent effect is available, the inhibiting effect of subpoenas to newsmen on the willingness of informants to talk to newsmen has been demonstrated by the reaction of militant groups to the recent increase in subpoenas issued by federal grand juries. The Oakland Black Caucus, an organization representing major black groups in the Oakland area, refused to co-operate with the American Broadcasting Company in the filming of a documentary on the Black Panthers when A.B.C. admitted it was unable to provide an assurance that its newsmen would remain silent in the face of possible government subpoenas.[60] In this and other cases,[61] fear generated by the issuance of a subpoena to New York Times reporter Earl Caldwell was expressly stated as the reason for the informants' unwillingness to co-operate with newsmen. The impediment to news gathering caused by a reporter's testimony under subpoena before a legislative committee has also been recently demonstrated. When a New York Times reporter was required to testify before the House Committee on Internal Security investigating militant activities, militant groups thereafter refused to talk with either him or other Times reporters, asserting that those newsmen could not be trusted with confidential information.[62]

The silencing effect caused by the increase in government subpoenas has not been confined to militant groups. A Newsweek reporter's affidavit submitted in the Caldwell trial asserts:

> "Particularly disturbing to me has been a marked increase recently, in the reticence of my confidential sources in government itself. These sources, some of whom have in the past been instrumental in exposing instances of governmental abuse or corruption, now tell me that, because of the increasingly widespread use of subpoenas to obtain names and other confidential information from reporters, they are fearful of reprisals and loss of jobs if they are identified by their superiors as sources of information for newsmen." [63]

It also appears likely that some reporters will be deterred from seeking and publishing information that could lead to a subpoena which would force them to disclose confidential information or to receive a contempt citation. Again, it is difficult to reach any precise conclusions as to the extent of this deterrence, but the acceptance of contempt citations by newsmen in the past indicates an unwillingness to place themselves in a position of losing their reputation through disclosure of information intended to be kept confidential.[64] It is not unreasonable to assume that some reporters, especially those who cannot count on the support of their editors or publishers or who cannot otherwise command resources for legal defense, will be reluctant to print stories likely to lead to subpoenas and possible contempt citations.[65]

---

[59] G. Bird and F. Mervin, The Newspaper and Society 567 (1942).

[60] Affidavits of Gilbert E. Noble and Timothy C. Knight accompanying Petitioner's Brief, Application of Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970).

[61] A Los Angeles Newsweek correspondent who had previously maintained good relations with the Panthers was refused an interview until Newsweek agreed to contest judicially any subpoenas the correspondent received, but by the time this agreement was secured, the subject of the interview had left Los Angeles. Affidavit of Nicholas C. Proffitt, accompanying Brief for Newsweek as Amicus Curiae, Application of Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970). In New York, a New York Times reporter found previous news sources unwilling to discuss Black Panther activities. Affidavit of David Burnham, accompanying Petitioner's Brief, Application of Caldwell, supra. In Massachusetts, a former source of information on black militant groups was highly reluctant to cooperate with a Newsweek Bureau Chief. Affidavit of Frank Morgan, accompanying Brief for Newsweek as Amicus Curiae. Application of Caldwell, supra.

[62] Affidavits of Anthony Ripley, John Kifner, Thomas A. Johnson, Earl Caldwell & Gerald Fraser, accompanying Petitioner's Brief, Application of Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970).

[63] Affidavit of Jon Lewell, accompanying Brief for Newsweek as Amicus Curiae. Application of Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970). See also affidavits of Walter Cronite and Mike Wallace, accompanying Brief for C.B.S. as Amicus Curiae, Application of Caldwell, supra, for examples of the importance of confidential informers in gathering news concerning government activities. In his affidavit, Cronkite cites five recent examples of important stories he could have secured only through confidential informants: A member of the staff of a United States Senator advised me, far in advance of the announcement, that his employer did not plan to run for re-election. Another person in a similar position tipped me to his employer's intention to seek higher office. An officer high in Pentagon circles recently offered evidence of pressure high in the military command structure to get the President to cut back on his Viet Nam withdrawal commitments. A bartender told me of fraud in restaurant inspection in New York City. A scientist asserted that the Atomic Energy Commission's safety standards for atomic energy installations were not adequate. None of these persons would have volunteered this information if they thought they would be exposed as the source of this information."

Nonetheless, the validity of the factual assumptions has not been established "conclusively," in part because of the inherent ambiguity, in this context, of the concept of "conclusiveness," a word which necessarily has reference to values as well as to facts. For example, what would it mean to show "conclusively" that Assumption #2—confidentiality is essential to the establishment of many reporter-informer relationships—was valid for "constitutional purposes"? First, it would require a difficult factual inquiry to determine what percentage of all reporter-informer relationships are confidential. But, even assuming it were possible to find a methodologically satisfying answer to that question, when would the finding be "conclusive enough" to require that the right to a confidential relationship be given constitutional protection: when 10% are confidential, 50%, "some," "many"? Obviously, the second question can only be answered with reference to value choices.

Similarly, determining the validity for constitutional purposes of Assumption #3 or #4—the use of an unbridled subpoena power will deter potential sources from divulging information or reporters from gathering and printing certain kinds of information—requires a prediction about the occurrence of factual sequences in the future. If X occurs, Y or Z will result N per cent of the time. Again, even if one could produce a proposition in that form that was defensible in methodological terms (and there is substantial reason to doubt that such an achievement is possible),[66] the value question of when N per cent was sufficiently great to require constitutional protection for the right would still be open. If such a proposition cannot be produced, then one's assessment of the assumption—one's presumption about its validity and the degree of "incidence" deemed important—would even more starkly depend upon value preferences.

The reason for determining the validity of the four assumptions isolated above is to help resolve two issues: first, the one posed in this subsection—should some right to a confidential relationship exist?; second, the one posed in the next two subsections—how far should that right extend (how important is it compared to other interests)? But the question of factual validity regarding the existence of confidential relationships (Assumption #2) and the scope and incidence of deterrent effects that result from use of the subpoena power (Assumptions #3 and #4) must be inevitably linked with the value question of the importance of the First Amendment interests. Clearly, given the "inconclusive" state of available facts and the likelihood that they will in important respects remain "inconclusive,"[67] resolution of the two issues must rest on articulated value choices—on a presumption for or against the First Amendment interests in this setting.

---

[64] See notes 5 and 6 supra. There has not been extensive research in this area, however, to determine the extent that reporters are deterred by the absence of a broad right of confidentiality.

[65] The threat of a deterrence of reporters was recognized in the Caldwell case: [I]t is not unreasonable to expect journalists everywhere to temper their reporting so as to reduce the probability that they will be required to submit to interrogaton. The First Amendment guards against governmental action that induces self-censorship."In re Caldwell, No. 26,025 (9th Cir. Nov. 16, 1970).

[66] Establishing the empirical basis for the deterrence assumption is complicated by determining what constitutes "unabridled subpoena power," when such power has existed, and when informants have been aware of its existence.

[67] An empirical study is presently being conducted by the Field Foundation under the direction of Vince Blasi of the University of Michigan Law School, and Richard Baker and W. Phillips Davison of the Columbia School of Journalism. While additional data will provide helpful information concerning confidential informer-reporter relationships and the deterrent effects caused by the issuance of subpoenas to reporters, such data can by no means be conclusive and is not necessary for a judicial decision that the informer-reporter relationship should receive constitutional protection. Reporters questioned in a survey cannot determine the number of potential informants who have refrained from contracting newsmen because of the absence of a right of nondisclosure, and it is doubtful whether they can determine the extent to which their informants refrain from fully disclosing information to them because of the absence of a nondisclosure right. If a survey attempts to question informants, it will be extremely difficult to obtain a random sample of confidential informants willing to respond to such an inquiry. Furthermore, it will be difficult to build the requisite objectivity into a survey where all persons questioned have a vested interest in the results of the study. Therefore, courts must rely on logical reasoning, present knowledge of the newsman-informer relationship and presumptions based on First Amendment values, to decide what a constitutional right to confidential informer-reporter relationships is necessary to the maintenance of a free flow of information.

This Note proposes that the facts presently known rebut the charge of invalidity previously attached to the four assumptions by some courts and warrant the establishment of some right to a confidential reporter-informer relationship. This conclusion—which is the fulcrum of the subsequent argument—rests on two beliefs.

First, the demonstration of some factual validity of the four assumptions and common sense are sufficient grounds for presuming that these assumptions will have some validity in the future. For example, it seems clear that sources within government, who are willing to divulge information to the press about alleged government misfeasance, will dry up if they have reason to believe their names can be compelled.

Second, a relationship, (a) whose protection is consistent with First Amendment theory[68] and (b) that has some basis in fact, should be given constitutional protection if "unnecessary" deterrent effects can be shown. The word "unnecessary" does not have reference to a finely calibrated evaluation of empirically validated behavior in which the "benefits" of the right are quantified and weighed against its "costs."[69]

As will be discussed in the next subsections, both these beliefs draw strength from the Supreme Court's sensitivity to deterrent effects on First Amendment freedoms. This sensitivity is based clearly on value preferences arising out of common sense predictions, since it is extremely difficult for the Court to "prove" the existence of those effects or to demonstrate their "rate of incidence" with any precision.

C. The Right to Protect News Sources Must be Broad and Subject Only To Clear Exceptions

Establishing the necessity for judicial recognition of some First Amendment right to protect informer-reporter relationships, however, does not define its precise nature or scope. Two general principles derived from other First Amendment cases will provide an orientation to help further delineate the dimensions of this right: (1) permissible governmental regulation of First Amendment conduct may not be vague in scope or application; and (2) First Amedment rights are accorded special protections and may be restricted only because of a compelling government interest. Although the First Amendment speaks in terms of "law," the protections of the Amendment are available not only against legislation but against government action in other forms.[70]

In areas where the Supreme Court has recognized that the government may regulate First Amendment conduct, the Court has insisted upon precision and specificity of the prohibitions so that parties will not unnecessarily forego the exercise of First Amendment rights.[71] It is well settled that a statute which is so indefinite in its language or is interpreted to permit the punishment of incidents which are within the protection of the First Amendment is void on its face.[72] Similarly, stricter standards of permissible vagueness are applied to governmental action which has a potentially inhibiting effect on speech or the press than are applied to governmental regulation of economic activity:[73] "A man may the less be required to act at his peril here because the free dissemination of ideas will be the loser."[74] Administrative or executive action would seem logically subject to similar prohibitions regarding overbreadth, vagueness, and abuse of discretion if exercise of this action (e.g., issuance of subpoenas) impinges upon First Amendment rights.

---

[68] See pp. 326–29 supra.

[69] At this point, the Note assumes some "unnecessary" effects exist. An extended discussion of this value judgment occurs at pp. 345–60 infra.

[70] Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51, 56 (1965). Standards of permissible statutory vagueness are particularly high when a state empowers an administrative or executive agency to take action which may infringe First Amendment rights. Cf. United States v. Robel, 389 U.S. 258, 275–76 (1967) (Brennan, J., concurring) [T]he numerous deficiencies connected with vague legislative directives . . . are far more serious when . . . the exercise of fundamental rights [is] at stake. . . . Formulation of policy is a legislature's primary responsibility, entrusted to it by the electorate, and to the extent Congress delegates authority under indefinite standards, this policy-making function is passed on to other agencies, often not answerable or responsive in the same degree.

[71] See generall Note, The First Amendment Overbreadth Doctrine, 83 HARV. L. REV 844 (1970); Note, The Chilling Effect in Constitutional Law, 69 COLUM. L. REV. 808 (1969).

[72] See, e.g., Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359, 369 (1931). See generally, Note, The Void for Vagueness Doctrine in the Supreme Court 109 U. PA L. REV. 67 (1960).

[73] Winter v. New York, 333 U.S. 507, 517–18 (1948).

[74] Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147, 151 (1959).

The Supreme Court has frequently emphasized the need for certainty in the exercise of First Amendment rights, even though precision increases the likelihood that libelous and obscene materials (which the state has a legitimate interest in suppressing) will be published and distributed.[75] This certainty is necessary to effectuate the free press guarantee of the First Amendment because, without certainty, parties responsible for the dissemination of information to the public will be unable to predict when the state can suppress their activities. Thus, there is a substantial possibility that they will unduly censor their publications to avoid punishment. The Court has determined that the mere prospect of self-censorship of activity protected by the First Amendment is sufficient to hold such statutes unconstitutional on the ground of vagueness even though the exact extent of self-censorship is empirically uncertain.[76]

The deterrent effect of an unbridled subpoena power may be analogized to the inhibiting effect of vague and overbroad statutes affecting First Amendment freedoms.[77] Unless reporters and informers can predict with some certainty the likehood that newsmen will be required to disclose names or information obtained in confidential relationships, there is a substantial possibility that many reporters and informers will be reluctant to engage in such relationships.[78] As a result of this deterrence, the flow of information to the public will be diminished regardless of whether disclosure could have actually been compelled. Thus, to prevent this unconstitutional deterrent effect once the right to a confidential relationship has been established, occasions on which the state may compel a newsman to disclose names or information obtained in a confidential relationship must be defined with specificity.

The second general principle that may be used in defining the scope of the news gatherer's right to protect his confidential relations with informants is that First Amendment rights are traditionally "protected against government curtailment at all points, even where the results of expression may appear to be in conflict with other social interests which the government is charged with safeguarding." [79] The rationale for specially protecting First Amendment rights is that freedom of speech and of the press are the indispensable preconditions for the exercise of other freedoms.[80] The Supreme Court once spoke of these rights as being "preferred" [81] in relation to other legal rights, and although this language has been abandoned,[82] the concept of special safeguards still survives in a number of First Amendment doctrines.[83] Correlatively, the Court has explicitly recognized that these rights are "delicate and vulnerable" [84] and must be vigiliantly safeguarded because they are particularly susceptible to government inhibition. Their exercise is easily deterred or "chilled" by government action because the economic self-interest that may be relied upon for the vindication of other legal rights is lacking in the First Amendment area.[85]

---

[75] In New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, for example, the Court recognized that the common law standard for libel actions, requiring truth as a defense to a claim of libel, would deter the press from publishing matters difficult to establish as true, whether libelous or not. To prevent self-censorship by the press, the Court required a showing of actual malice by the plaintiff in libel actions against public officials. 376 U.S. 254 (1964).

[76] See, e.g., Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51, 56 (1965); A Quantity of Copies of Books v. Kansas, 378 U.S. 205 (1964).

[77] In Freedman v. Maryland, the statute to which the vice of vagueness attached was MD. ANN. CODE art. 66A, § 2 (1957), which required films shown in Maryland to be "duly approved and licensed" by a state board of censors before exhibition, 381 U.S. 51 (1965). It is here argued that a similar defect of vagueness (as well as overbreadth) inheres in the statutes which authorize reporters to be subpoenaed before grand juries, legislative committees, and civil and criminal tribunals, but which do not provide for nondisclosure of confidential information and the names of confidential informants. For example, 2 U.S.C. § 190b (1964) provides that a Senate standing committee may require "by subpoena [sic] or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses . . . to take such testimony . . . as it deems advisable." A judicial gloss will later be suggested which will avoid the vagueness and overbreadth of such subpoena statutes. See p. 339 infra.

[78] See pp. 330–32 supra.

[79] T. EMERSON, THE SYSTEM OF FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION 17 (1970). The Court has held that these rights must be taken as a "command of the broadest scope that explicit language, read in the context of a liberty loving society, will allow." Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252, 263 (1941).

[80] Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 145 (1967).

[81] This doctrine originated in U.S. v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144, 152 n.4 (1938), with the cautious assertion that "there may be narrower scope for operation of the presumption of constitutionality when legislation appears on its face to be within a specific prohibition of the Constitution, such as those of the first ten amendments" than when legislation regulates economic activity. Cf. Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501, 509 (1946). The preferred freedoms doctrine has been formulated in terms of First Amendment rights, however, because freedom of speech and of the press have been viewed as basic for democratic government. Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 530 (1945). The preferred freedoms language seems to have been primarily a rhetorical device to emphasize the importance the Supreme Court attaches to First Amendment freedoms. Note, A Uniform Valuation of the Religion Guarantees, 80 YALE L.J. 77, 81 n.20 (1970).

This principle of broad scope for First Amendment rights is translated into a presumption that any governmental restriction of First Amendment rights is impermissible.[86] The Supreme Court has consistently held that only a "compelling," [87] "substantial," [88] "subordinating," [89] "paramount," [90] "cogent," [91] or "strong" [92] state interest in the regulation of a subject within the government's constitutional power to regulate can justify limiting these freedoms. Even the advocacy of law violation or the use of force may only be proscribed when such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action.[93] It is not possible, however, to use these adjectival tests to catalogue the situations in which First Amendment rights must yield to other governmental interests because in each case, speech and non-speech elements may be combined in the same course of conduct.[94] This requirement of an extraordinary government interest seems to be primarily a rhetorical device used to emphasize that only in rare circumstances may First Amendment rights be restricted.

Moreover, the Supreme Court has consistently held that the exercise of First Amendment rights may not be restricted by indirect inhibitions or secondary prohibitions. For example, the Court has recognized that the primary First Amendment right of free association may be impaired by government investigation of membership lists [95] and has therefore prohibited such investigations even though they did not directly prevent individuals from joining any organization.[96] The Court has also struck down tax statutes which indirectly prohibited the exercise of First Amendment rights.[97] The mere threat of sanctions may deter the exercise of free speech or free association almost as much as the actual application of sanctions.[98] Thus, since the right to a confidential news gatherer-informant relationship has been found to be within the First Amendment press freedom, this right should be protected from indirect restrictions, subject to limitation only because of "compelling state interests."

D. Nature and Further Justification of the Right

1. The Proposed Rule

In light of the argument thus far, this Note suggests the following rule as being sufficiently broad and specific to satisfy the First Amendment freedom of the press requirements. The proposed rule consists of the following elements:

a. The right lodges in news gatherers to withhold

b Informants' names and information received from informants

c. Except at a criminal trial and in civil trials when the newspaper is a defendant to a libel action covered by the rule of New York Times Co. v. Sullivan; [99]

---

[82] Cf. Justice Frankfurter's criticism of the "preferred freedoms" doctrine in Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77, 90–94 (1949) (concurring opinion).

[83] The clear and present danger rule (see, e.g., Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 447 (1969)), the alternative means test (see e.g., Aptheker v. Secretary of State, 378 U.S. 500, 512, (1964)), negative presumptions (see, e.g., Speiser v. Randall 357 U.S. 513, 526 (1958)), and the overbreadth doctrine (see, e.g., U.S. v. Robel 389 U.S. 258, 265–66 (1967)) all indicate the survival of a special "preference" for First Amendment rights in modern constitutional theory.

[84] NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 433 (1963).

[85] Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479, 486–87 (1965).

[86] See, e.g., Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 106–07 (1968).

[87] NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 438 (1963).

[88] NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 464 (1958).

[89] Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 524 (1960).

[90] Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 530 (1945).

[91] Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 524 (1960).

[92] Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 408 (1963).

[93] Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 447 (1969).

[94] Cf. United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 376–77 (1968).

[95] NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (1958).

[96] Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516 (1960).

[97] Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233 (1936).

[98] NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 433 (1963).

[99] 376 U.S. 254 (1964). See pp. 360–63 infra.

d. At a criminal trial, the reporter is only required to give information, according to the rules of evidence, relevant to the alleged elements of the crime charged to an informer-defendant and

e. May withhold the names of third party sources and information received from such sources;

f. Before testifying in the criminal trial context, the reporter may require the party seeking compulsory testimony to show cause that the reporter had reason to possess information about the defendant and the alleged criminal acts;

g. In the civil trial setting, the reporter should only be required to testify when he or his publication is a defendant in a libel action under the Times rule and when substantial evidence of defamation

h. And falsehood have been shown by the plaintiff; and

i. When the defendant cannot bear the burden of proving lack of actual malice or reckless disregard of the truth

j. Regardless of the source's identity or the content of his communication, i.e., assuming the source is anonymous and thus unreliable.

In effect, this rule means that newsmen will not be required to give information at a preliminary hearing or (except in a very limited case) civil trial or before a grand jury or legislative committee.[100] Testimony at a criminal trial will be restricted by the rules of evidence to relevant information concerning the acts and statements of the defendant-informer;[101] the requirement to appear at all is qualified by a showing that it is reasonable to assume that the reporter has knowledge of revelant facts.[102] In the criminal trial setting, only those informants who fear that they will be indicted or arrested as a result of information stemming from sources other than the reporter will be uncertain about the likelihood of compelled disclosure. The proposed rule further limits the material which must be revealed to a sphere of information that surrounds the alleged criminal act.[103] The limited civil trial exception should, in practice, result in very few (if any) compelled disclosures.[104]

In general, this formulation of the right is justified because it is the only way in which uncertainty can be reduced, the unlimited power of compulsory disclosure checked, and vital interests in the administration of justice still served. Justifications for specific elements of the proposed rule follow.

2. Where the Right Should Lodge and the Primary Discretion Rest

Once it has been determined that a right to a confidential relationship exists and the power to compel disclosure is to be curbed, a decision must be made about who should have the greatest role in shaping the contours of that right —a judge, the reporter, or the informant.[105] In formulating a right to a confidential informer-reporter relationship, three basic approaches may be taken after analyzing and valuing the deterrent effects on First Amendment freedoms: (a) the right may be determined by the importance of the subject about which testimony is sought, that is, by choosing a point on the spectrum ranging from misdemeanor cases to situations involving national security; or (b) the right may be determined by the degree of relevance the information sought bears to the subject under investigation or at issue, that is, by choosing a point on the spectrum ranging from "possibly related" to "highly relevant"; (c) the right may be determined by the importance of the stage of the legislative or judicial process at which the information is to be used, that is, by comparing the function of the preliminary hearing, grand jury deliberations, legislative inquiry, or criminal or civil trial with the function of the right itself.

The tests thus far developed for reconciling the competing interests have been based on the first two approaches.[106] The difficulty with both approaches is that they necessarily vest substantial discretion in the judge and therefore do not meet the requirements of specificity and predictability which should attach to a definition of the right. Courts must determine in each case whether disclosure of an informant's confidential information or identity should be required according to a developing standard of "importance" or "relevance." Under the case-by-case method of developing rules, it will be difficult for potential informants and reporters to predict whether testimony will be compelled since the decision will turn on the judge's ad hoc assessment in different fact settings of "importance" or "relevance" in relation to the free press interest. A "general" deterrent effect is likely to result. This type of effect stems from the vagueness of the tests and from the uncertainty attending their application. For example, if a reporter's information goes to the "heart of the matter" in Situation X, another reporter and informant who subsequently are in Situation Y will not know if "heart of the matter rule X" will be extended to them, and deterrence will thereby result. Leaving substantial discretion with judges to delineate those "situations" in which rules of "relevance" or "importance" apply would therefore seem to undermine significantly the effectiveness of a reporter-informer privilege. (The "specific" deterrent effects which result from requiring disclosure in Situation X—reporters and informers in all future situations of the type X will not disseminate information —are dscussed in the next subsection.[107]) Because of the prospect of such "general" deterrence, the approaches to a constitutional right recently adopted by state and lower federal courts fail to provide the journalist and informant with sufficient certainty to safeguard adequately the public's First Amendment interest in a free flow of information.[108]

---

[100] See pp. 348–63 infra.

[101] See pp. 346–48, infra.

[102] See pp. 363–65 infra.

[103] See pp. 364–65 infra.

[104] See pp. 360–63 infra.

[105] A prosecutor should not possess the discretion in criminal actions for obvious reasons. See note 108 infra.

[106] See pp. 320–25 supra.

The strictest test yet advanced, a requirement that disclosure only be made when a compelling state interest is shown,[109] still leaves the judge with a substantial amount of discretion and is likely to cause "general" deterrent effects of the type described above. It would seem likely that in many situations the test would not be strictly applied, particularly in those situations where the judge is confronted with evidence from the state that disclosure is relevant to a government investigation.[110] And although an "overriding and compelling national interest" or "national security" requirement[111] may further limit the number of subpoenas issued to reporters, precise guidelines will also be difficult to develop for the administration of this rule. Informers and reporters would thus be unable to predict the situations in which disclosure would be required. Many groups and individuals that considered themselves potential targets of "national security" investigations would probably be deterred from talking with members of the press—especially informants within the government or of an "extreme" political stripe.[112] Moreover, the "compelling state interest" or "national security" tests do not limit the range of material which a reporter must reveal. Not all communications received by the reporter from a "national security" source would be relevant to protection of that state interest, but once the source's reports may be disclosed because of his status, it will be difficult to limit the parts of the communications to be revealed.

---

[107] "General" deterrence is thus differentiated from "specific" deterrence. See pp. 349–55 infra for an extended discussion of both terms.

[108] The "reasonable likelihood," "heart of the matter," and "miscarriage of justice" tests are all based on an ad hoc balancing of interests, and thereby fail to provide the informant and reporter with any assurance of nondisclosure at the time of the reporter-informant communication. As a result of this uncertainty, many reporters and informers will be deterred even though their communications would never have been necessary to the administration of justice, either because no proceeding related to the subject of communication took place or because the reporter's testimony was not required for a determination of the case.

The Justice Department guidelines, suggesting that the desired information should be necessary to the investigation, in fact leave the Department free to subpoena a reporter whenever it determines a need for his testimony, and the guidelines give little indication of what factors other than "reasonableness" and "sufficiency" must be weighed in making this determination. Furthermore, there is an express option to permit, in unusual situations, the issuance of a subpoena under circumstances not conforming to the guidelines. Thus, the reporter and informer can never be assured that the Department will not seek disclosure of their confidential communications. See Address by Attorney General John N. Mitchell, supra note 27.

[109] See pp. 324–26 supra.

[110] Under an ad hoc balancing test, the judge would balance the importance of disclosure to a particular investigation against the probable deterrent effect caused by disclosure in that situation. Under such a balancing approach, it would be difficult for the deterrence caused by disclosure in a single case to outweigh the importance of disclosure once the government has shown some need for the desired information. See State v. Knops, No. 146 (Wis. Sup. Ct., Feb. 2, 1971).

[111] See pp. 324–25 supra.

[112] The Ninth Circuit has recognized the importance of maintaining communication between members of the press and dissenting groups: "The need for an untrammeled press takes on special urgency in times of widespread protest and dissent. In such times the First Amendment protections exist to maintain communications with dissenting groups and to provide the public with a wide range of information about the nature of protest and heterodoxy." In re Caldwell, No. 26,025 (9th Cir. Nov. 16, 1970).

The basic responsibility for defining the dimensions of the right should not be left to the informant either. In part, this judgment is based on existing practices. Although specific requests for confidentiality are often made, the informer ultimately gives the reporter discretion over what aspects of the communication will be published. In other words, the informer and the reporter negotiate, and then the informer assumes a risk that the reporter will not disclose more information than the informer intended. Although there are no precise studies of the workings of the reporter-informer relationship,[113] informants have clearly been willing to assume this risk in the past; informants talk and the reporter is under pressure of his profession's ethics to honor the informant's request. It is also in the interest of a reporter to honor the confidence so that his relationships with informants are not impaired and he can have continued access to confidential information.

The newsman-informer relationship is different from that of other relationships whose confidentiality is protected by statute, such as the attorney-client and physician-patient relationships.[114] In the case of oher statutory privileges, the right of nondisclosure is granted to the person making the communication in order that he will be encouraged by strong assurances of confidentiality to seek such relationships which contribute to his personal well-being. The judgment is made that the interests of society will be served when individuals consult physicians and lawyers; the public interest is thus advanced by creating a zone of privacy that the individual can control.[115] However, in the case of the reporter-informer relationship, society's interest is not in the welfare of the informant per se, but rather in creating conditions in which information possessed by news sources can reach public attention.

As indicated, the current practices employed by newsmen and informers (absent unrestrained use of the subpoena power) seem to produce a substantial flow of news. However, regardless of how one evaluates current practices, it can be argued that vesting the source with the discretion to invoke the right could only have an adverse impact on the free flow of information, since one who initially sought anonymity would be forced to come forward and identify himself in an effort to prevent the compelled disclosure of information obtained by the newsman. A prosecutor could thus "flush" out a source by subpoenaing the reporter. In fact, sources probably would prefer to have the newsman function as a shield, protecting them from official scrutiny. Further, if the informer attempted to restrain the newsman from voluntarily publishing material gathered, a problem of prior restraint would arise.[116] If the informer could only invoke a right of nondisclosure to prevent a reporter's testimony (either voluntary or compelled) at judicial and legislative proceedings subsequent to publication, the situation would develop in which material had been published and widely circulated and yet was still not available for use in the administration of justice. This practice would largely frustrate accomplishment of state interests without substantially aiding First Amendment concerns.[117]

---

[113] See note 67 supra.

[114] For a general discussion of the attorney-client and physician-patient privileges, see 8 WIGMORE, supra note 14, at §§ 2290–2329 and §§ 2380–2391.

[115] Wigmore asserts that four criteria should be met to enact a statutory privilege of the attorney-client or physician-patient type: (1) The communications must originate in a confidence that they will not be disclosed. (2) This element of confidentiality must be essential to the full and satisfactory maintenance of the relation between parties. (3) The relation must be one which in the opinion of the community ought to be sedulously fostered. (4) The injury that would inure to the relation by disclosure of the communications must be greater than the benefit thereby gained for the correct disposal of the litigation." 8 WIGMORE, supra note 14, at § 2285.

[116] Furthermore, proof of confidentiality would often be impossible, as the only available evidence would be the conflicting views of the informant and reporter. Often, there is not even an express request for confidentiality by the informer, for he relies on the reporter's judgment as to what is not intended for publication. See, e.g., Affidavit of Earl Caldwell, accompanying Petitioner's Brief, Application of Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970).

[117] The informant could not protect his identity regardless of whether he was a criminal defendant or third party source. Either his name would have already been publicly disclosed or he would have to come forth in order to claim his right. If he were a third party, his confidential communications could probably be protected at a criminal trial by the hearsay rule. However, if he were a defendant, there would be little justification for protecting his communications. At both grand jury and legislative investigations, an informer's right of nondisclosure of confidential communications could be easily circumvented because of the breadth of the investigation and absence of strict evidentiary

Therefore, the right of nondisclosure should lodge in the reporter, not the source. Similarly, as argued, the primary discretion in deciding whether the right applies should not rest with the judge. The decision to give such discretion to the newsman occurs in part because there is no better alternative. In part, it must rest on an assumption that, generally speaking, the interests of the newsman are congruent with First Amendment values. Since his professional success depends upon presenting fresh, important information to the public, the reporter will presumably act in a manner that will contribute to the full flow of information. Finally, the right of nondisclosure is constructed in a fashion which protects the newsman when he acts in a professional but not a personal capacity.[118]

3. Protecting the Informant and His Communication

The reporter should possess the right to protect from compulsory disclosure both the identities of his informants and communications received from them.[119] Disclosure of private communications may make it possible to trace the informer. Furthermore, protection of off-the-record communications is as important as protection of names in terms of preserving informer-reporter relationships, for informers may be deterred from talking with newsmen unless they are assured that their off-the-record communications will not be disclosed. Empirical evidence[120] and the recent Caldwell case[121] indicate that off-the-record communications are a significant part of news gathering, for reporters often use background information in order to evaluate material for publication.[122] A confidential informer-reporter relationship can only be honored, and deterrence minimized, if such confidential background communications are protected from compulsory disclosure.

When a newsman invokes the right, he need not demonstrate that the relationship or the material sought was confidential. Again, substantial discretion must lodge in the newsman in the form of a strong presumpion of confidentiality.[123] An intent of confidentiality will often be elusive of proof without revelation of the identity of the informant. It will also be virtually impossible for the newsman to distinguish between off-the-record confidential material and on-the-record material for publication without revealing the material that deserves protection. Only in situations in which the party desiring disclosure can almost conclusively show non-confidentiality should disclosure of communications be required.[124]

4. Absolute Right at Grand Jury Proceedings and Legislative Hearings

This Note has argued that the primary danger to First Amendment values posed by unrestrained use of the subpoena power is that informers and reporters will be deterred from revealing or gathering information. Unless one can predict with relative certainty when communications must be divulged and when they are privileged, activity protected by the First Amendment will be restrained. These deterrent effects are especially likely to occur during legislative investigations and at grand jury proceedings, when the government will be rules. If the reporter wanted to disclose the informer's communication, this information could always be conveyed by someone else in a manner that did not directly link the communication to the reporter.

---

[118] Only that information is protected which was gathered in the course of preparing material for publication. See pp. 365–69 infra.

[119] The majority of cases, statutes, and commentary concerning the newsman's claim of nondisclosure have limited their discussion to the question of protection of the identities of confidential informants although no justification has been offered for this limitation. Apparently few cases have arisen in which newsmen have resisted disclosure of confidential communications although it is impossible to determine whether this is because newsmen have been willing to disclose such information or because disclosure has not been asked of them. See notes 2, 5, 6 and 15 supra.

[120] See Affidavits of eighteen reporters submitted with Petitioner's Brief and Amicus Briefs in Application of Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970).

[121] In re Caldwell, No. 26,025 (9th Cir. Nov. 16, 1970). See pp. 324–26 supra.

[122] For example, Walter Cronkite asserts: "In doing my work I (and those who assist me) depend constantly on information, ideas, leads and opinions received in confidence. Such material is essential in digging out newsworthy facts, and equally important in assessing the importance and analyzing the significance of public events. Without such materials, I would be able to do little more than broadcast press releases and public statements." Affidavit of Walter Cronkite accompanying Brief for Columbia Broadcasting System as Amicus Curiae, Application of Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970).

[123] See pp. 342–43 and note 116 supra.

[124] See pp. 367–69 infra.

tempted to use the press as an informal investigative arm of the state and to make fishing expeditions for information.[125] Such effects may also result at civil trials, where broad discovery is allowed and evidentiary standards are relaxed.[126]

Restricting compulsory disclosure to criminal trials and to defendant-sources meets these salient dangers. To justify this approach to the problem concerning the informer-reporter relationship, it is necessary, first, to show that the proposed rule is consistent with the First Amendment values discussed thus far and, second, to demonstrate that these values, when compared with the interests served by compelled disclosure at legislative hearings, grand jury (or preliminary hearing) proceedings and civil trials, do not require disclosure of sources' names or informer-reporter communications.

Obviously, a rule that protects the newsman-source relationship at civil trials, legislative hearings and grand jury proceedings advances the First Amendment values of limiting deterrence of protected activities and insuring the free flow of information. (Justification for the limited civil trial exception with respect to First Amendment values will be given below.) [127] The rule is both broad and, more important, certain. An informer need only establish a relationship of trust with a reporter through a private bargaining process, following practices that currently exist.[128]

Making the confidential communications between a defendant-source and a reporter open to scrutiny at criminal trial, however, should not cause substantial deterrent effect on the flow of information. First, the source cannot have his identity revealed merely by the subpoenaing of a reporter, since an indictment is obviously prerequisite to trial. Nor can the reporter be used to uncover the whereabouts of the source. The reporter cannot thus be used for investigative purposes. Second, the defendant-source can often predict with some certainty whether or not he is going to be indicted. He can thus choose not to talk about his own criminal acts to a reporter if he fears that he will be indicted, arrested and brought to trial. (The source is not likely to do this in any event, unless he has enormous trust in the reporter; the more common occurrence would seem to be fore the source to give information about third parties.) Third, the defendant-source is assured, by the rules of evidence, that the reporter's revelations at the trial proceedings will be circumscribed to information relevant to his own alleged criminal conduct. (He need not worry that the party seeking information at trial can explore his unrelated activities or those of his colleagues.)[129]

An exception to the reporter-informer privilege is justified at criminal trial not simply because the potential deterrent effect is sharply reduced by the relative certainty provided by the rule, but also because the source has been linked with some specificity to allegedly criminal acts. Although the indictment does not function perfectly as a screen, keeping the innocent from trial,[130] nonetheless, at criminal trial there is probable cause to believe that the source did commit a crime. With diminished deterrent effects and the subject matter of compelled disclosure limited to specifically alleged criminal behavior, there is much less reason to shield the informer-reporter relationship.

On the other hand, communications from third parties and identities of third party sources must be protected even during criminal trial.[131] Of course, the rules of evidence will often make inadmissible, as hearsay, information about the defendant received by a reporter from a third party.[132] However, there may be occasions when the hearsay rule does not apply.[133] In these instances, third parties should be protected; the reporter should not be compelled to disclose identities or information. Again, the primary reason for protecting third party sources is that without such protection deterrence of future sources is likely to result. A third party will not have been indicted and thus his identity is not known. When talking with a reporter, a third party source will be unable to determine whether the indictment of someone else will result in disclosure of the source's identity. Where the identity of the third party source is known, the reporter still should not be required to divulge confidential information;[134] the deterrent effects may still result, since potential sources may not want any off-the-record communications revealed for a variety of reasons and compelled disclosure of such information—even information controlled by the rules of evidence—will contravene this desire. Moreover, if there is no diminution of deterrent effects regarding third party sources at criminal trial, there is also no increase in the interests of the state, since the third party source is not yet formally accused of any crime (though he may, obviously, fear such an accusation).[135]

---

[125] See pp. 354, 358, and note 152 infra.

[126] See pp. 358–59 infra.

[127] See pp. 360–63 infra.

[128] See pp. 342–43 supra.

[129] See pp. 364–65 infra.

[130] See A. Goldstein, The State and the Accused: Balance of Advantage in Criminal Procedure, 69 YALE L.J. 1149 (1960).

[131] A criminal defendant could subpoena a reporter if he wanted the reporter to testify about prior defendant-reporter communications. However, the reporter's right of nondisclosure of confidential information obtained from third parties is also applicable when a criminal defendant seeks information, for the deterrent effects caused by disclosure would be similar. Although the Sixth Amendment grants the defendant the right of compulsory process, that Amendment was adopted to guarantee the defendant the same right of process as that provided the prosecution by common law. This right to compulsory process does not override exemptions from disclosure protected by the Constitution, statutes, and common law. 8 WIGMORE, supra note 14, at 2191.

[132] See C. MCCORMICK, LAW OF EVIDENCE §§ 223–29 (1959).

While disclosure at a criminal trial limited to communications received from an informer-defendant is consistent with First Amendment values, disclosure of information obtained through confidential informer-reporter relationships should not be compelled in other settings. At grand jury investigations, legislative investigations, and civil trials, the interests served by compulsory disclosure of confidential sources or information are not as substantial when compared with the potential impairment of the public's First Amendment interest in a free flow of information.

Because of the extremely broad scope of a grand jury investigation,[136] there is the danger of a substantial deterrent effect on informants if reporters are compelled to appear before it. The function of a grand jury investigation is twofold: to investigate possible areas of criminal conduct and to serve as a pre-trial safeguard to insure that an individual is not tried for a crime on the basis of inadequate evidence.[137] In order that it can effectively perform these functions, grand jury investigations are not limited in scope to specific criminal acts[138] nor are they confined to strict evidentiary rules of admissibility.[139] Furthermore, they are conducted in secret in order to protect the effectiveness of the grand jury process and to insure that information about persons suspected of crime is not publicly revealed unless there is some cause to believe them guilty.[140]

Two types of deterrent effects may result from grand jury subpoenas to newsmen. First, general effects due to vague rules will occur when the newsman or informant can neither predict when the identities of sources will be disclosed nor determine what will, in fact, be revealed when a reporter who has been subpoenaed actually appears before a grand jury. The rule most obviously plagued by vagueness is a "compelling need" or "heart of the matter" test used to decide whether the newsman should appear at all. "Importance" or "relevance" tests must be decided on the facts of each case, and the informant and the newsman may often not be able to determine whether the facts of their case will justify a value judgment of "compelling need" by the judge. The rules regulating the grand jury itself and the secrecy requirement also make prediction difficult. Second, specific effects result from a judicial decision that an inquiry into a particular type of activity creates a compelling need—for example, a ruling that investigation of a violent criminal act, such as murder, justifies an abrogation of the right to a confidential relationship. This ruling would deter publication of stories that occur after murders and depend upon confidential informants, since the right would not be available to protect the source.

---

[133] With no constitutional right of nondisclosure, information received from a third party informer might be admissible under an exception to the heresay rule. For example, a declaration against interest by a third party would be admissible if the declarant were not available at the time of trial. Id. at § 253.

[134] Obviously the party desiring testimony as to a known source's confidential communications will try to get direct testimony from the source. But should that fail, the reporter must still be protected so that his confidential communications cannot be admitted under an exception to the hearsay rule.

[135] The confidential relationship should not be violated solely for investigative purposes. See p. 354 and note 152 infra. However, if the third party source is indicted in another proceeding, the reporter should obviously not be able to invoke the right with regard to this source at that proceeding.

[136] See Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43 (1906); Note, The Grand Jury as an Investigatory Body, 74 HARV. L. REV. 590, 591–92 (1961).

[137] See note 11 supra.

[138] The grand jury may summon and examine witnesses with no defendant or crime specifically in mind. See, e.g., Wilson v. United States, 221 U.S. 361 (1911). It can pursue all ramifications of a particular subject of inquiry. See, e.g., United States v. Johnson, 319 U.S. 503, rehearing denied, 320 U.S. 808 (1943).

[139] See Note, Exclusion of Incompetent Evidence From Federal Grand Jury Proceedings, 72 YALE L.J. 590, 596 (1963): "Attempts to limit the basis of grand jury decisions to evidence admissible at trial are complicated by the fact that the issues and direction of the case have not yet been fully developed. Because the precise nature of the charges is not defined prior to indictment, questions about the admissibility of evidence at trial which turn on the content of the accusation cannot be answered before the grand jury acts; questions concerning evidence whose admissibility depends on a particular situation developing at trial are likewise unanswerable at this pretrial stage."

[140] See generally, Note, Defense Access to Grand Jury Testimony: A Right in Search of a Standard, 1968 DUKE L.J. 556 (1968); 8 WIGMORE, supra note 14, at § 2360.

If we are concerned about preventing the general deterrent effects caused by the breadth and secrecy of the grand jury inquiry, the use of the subpoena to compel testimony concerning confidential informant-reporter relationships must be circumscribed, much as an over-broad statute must be more narrowly drawn so that constitutional rights are not infringed. As noted,[141] courts have recently adopted a "compelling need" test to so circumscribe the subpoena power. However, as indicated above,[142] use of this test, no matter how narrowly interpreted, will still result in some general deterrent effects. In spite of this, it could be argued that, although there will be some deterrent effects of a general nature, there will also be some clear cases where compelling need exists, and thus this sort of test must be available for judges to utilize when necessary despite the potential abuse of such a test and the uncertainty that will result even from careful use. In order, first, to rebut that argument—that the compelling need test (or a compelling need test with some form of alternative means rule) must be available despite its defects—and, second, to justify an absolute right of nondisclosure before the grand jury, it is necessary to argue the following point: the specific deterrent effects which result from a judicial decision that inquiry into a particular kind of activity creates a "compelling need" for a reporter's confidential information are of sufficient importance, and the benefits to the administration of justice are so slight, as to make inappropriate the use of a "compelling need" test.

Such an argument can most effectively be made in the context of a hypothetical case. Let us assume the following facts.[143] On Monday, a science building at a major state university is bombed, killing one person and causing several million dollars worth of damage. On Wednesday, an "underground" paper on campus prints a story headlined, "The Bombers Tell Why and What Next—Exclusive." The story includes an account of the reasons for the act and states that future bombings may occur, but does not identify the informants. On Thursday, the editor of the paper is called before a county grand jury, presumably to be asked to identify the persons interviewed and to discuss the nature of the interviews. The editor either seeks a protective order or, upon appearing before the grand jury, refuses to answer questions of the type mentioned. For purposes of discussion, it should be assumed that the "underground" paper is a part of the "press" within the First Amendment meaning of that term, that the editor is a "journalist," and that the information sought by the grand jury was obtained by the editor only after a promise of nondisclosure by him.[144]

It seems clear, on these facts, that if there is ever to be a finding of "compelling need" for the testimony, this is the case. A violent crime, resulting in loss of life and substantial property damage, has been committed; the newsman purports to know the identities of the criminals and to have information about the crime. Why should the reporter be able to invoke the right of nondisclosure? For the moment, let us consider this question with regard to the past actions discussed in the hypothetical story, and not with reference to the future acts also mentioned.

The fundamental reason for allowing the newsman to invoke the right is that to require disclosure in this case is to say, in effect: no story, based on confidential sources, may ever be printed after commission of the "same type of crime" or a "similar crime." After a ruling requiring disclosure in this particular case, if such a story is printed after the commission of a similar crime, the newsman and the source can know with relative certainty that their relationship will not be protected when the newsman is subpoenaed. In all likelihood, the story will not then be printed, since the story was predicated on the maintenance of confidentiality.

---

[141] See pp. 324–25 supa.

[142] See pp. 341–42 supra.

[143] This hypothetical is similar to the recent Wisconsin Case, State v. Knops, No. 146 (Wis. Sup. Ct. Feb. 2, 1971).

[144] For general treatment of these issues, see pp. 365–69 infra.

To put the same point in a slightly different way, the result of the ruling in this case will be to bar effectively the publication of such stories in the future. The general administration of justice will not be served in the future since newsman will not print stories based on "after the act" interviews with people who call themselves fugitives or with third parties who seek protection from disclosure. Without the publication of the story, it is unlikely that the newsman would be linked with the act and called to testify.[145] At the same time, there will be a substantial impairment of the flow of information to the public, information which is of special importance given the seriousness of the events. Alternatively, the future effect of the ruling will be to exact a penalty—a criminal contempt citation—from a newsman who is able to get such a story, and who is willing to publish it while honoring the request for confidence. Again, the administration of justice will not be served since nothing will be revealed and the newsman will take a sentence for contempt. This contempt sentence might serve some purpose if it could force the newsman to reveal names or information, but the probability that the story will either be left unpublished or that the newsman will choose to suffer the contempt penalty would seem high in such future cases that follow the first ruling. Since there is a strong likelihood that such a story will have been based on trust between the reporter and the source, the newsman will either not print or be willing to absorb a contempt citation rather than reveal the names.

The argument may be advanced that these future effects are uncertain and that the administration of justice must be served in this particular case. However, since there is a strong likelihood that the reporter will take the contempt citation,[146] the administration of justice will not be served in the instant case by a subpoena. And there are very plausible further grounds for believing that there will be future deterrent effects of the kind described in the above paragraphs. First, it would seem likely that courts facing future cases involving the right of nondisclosure will construe "the same type of crime" or "similar crime" to include crimes of violence generally. Thus, a grand jury inquiry into a broad range of behavior will lead to a finding of "compelling need" and the demand for testimony; many stories based on confidential informants may thus be "specifically deterred" and not published as a result. Second, the general deterrent effect caused by vague rules may also result, since the probable extension of a "compelling need" finding in the hypothetical case to subsequent crimes of violence would leave other areas uncertain.[147]

The addition of an "alternative means" inquiry does not cure the "compelling need" test of its significant deficiencies. The government may always argue after commission of a violent act that the reporter has information it cannot get elsewhere; a judge will have difficulty denying that claim.[148] Moreover, the inevitable vagueness that surrounds the administration of so elastic a rule as the alternative means test suggests that "general" deterrent effects will result. The source and the reporter will obviously have a difficult time predicting whether their communications will be shielded by an alternative means test at the time they must decide whether to begin communication.

---

[145] The fact that the newsman had previously written stories about individuals suspected of the crime would be insufficient reason for subpoenaing a reporter. See pp. 363–64 infra. It is conceivable, although highly unlikely, that police informers would know that the reporter possessed information concerning the alleged criminal acts. In any event, if no story were published, it might be difficult for newsmen, particularly those of the underground press, to prove that they were gathering information for publication purposes. See pp. 365–67 infra.

[146] In the recent Wisconsin decision, the reporter took the contempt citation rather than disclose the desired information which he had received from confidential informants. State v. Knops, No. 146 (Wis. Sup. Ct. Feb. 2, 1971).

[147] For example, the Wisconsin court found the "administration of crminal justice" itself to be a sufficiently compelling need. Id.

[148] The concurring opinion in the Wisconsin case attempted to narrow the "compelling need" test through application of an alternative means standard. However, an alternative means standard cannot in fact be applied. For example, federal indictments had been issued in the Wisconsin case, but the state could seek information from the reporter in order to deliver further indictments. Furthermore, even if those suspected of the crime had already been indicted, a grand jury could seek information from the reporter to determine if others were implicated. Id.

The value of an absolute right before grand juries is that deterrent effects on First Amendment interests will not occur. A corollary benefit is that an absolute right allows a judge in a controversial case to resist the political pressures that inevitably build around unsolved violent crimes. Although the long-range view might require granting the right to the newsman even in the hypothetical case, it could be difficult for a judge to resist the public outcry against such a violent crime and grant immunity to a newsman—especially a newsman of the "underground" press. The existence of an absolute privilege would allow local judges who believed in the position developed here to rely on a standard adopted nationally, at a time removed from commission of the act under investigation.[149]

A further argument may be advanced against the adoption of a right to nondisclosure in this hypothetical case and in all grand jury settings. One reason for a court to compel a reporter's testimony at trial was that the defendant-source had been indicted (i.e., there was probable cause to believe he had committed a crime). In the hypothetical case, it could be argued that the reporter clearly has " probable cause" to believe the informant has committed a crime because the informant has "confessed" to him, and that, given one part of the rationale advanced above for the criminal trial exception, he should be required to testify before the grand jury.

There are several possible responses to this argument. First, the person being shielded by the reporter may be a third-party source, an informant protected—even by the proposed rule—at criminal trial. Second, a probable cause finding must be delivered by the grand jury; a reporter, however likely that the crime has been committed, is of course not able to make a judicially reviewable probable cause finding, and he should be primarily concerned with publishing information as effectively as possible. (He can, of course, always give evidence about his source if he wishes.) Third, the "at criminal trial" exception was predicated not just on an increased state interest (resulting from the formal issuance of an indictment) with regard to an informer-defendant, but also on diminished deterrence of First Amendment interests. The diminution of these deterrent effects was based on the relative certainty that a source would feel in talking to a reporter, knowing that this reporter would not have to testify until the source was indicted, arrested, and brought to trial. In the hypothetical case, there has been no indictment and no arrest. Only when the defendant-source appears at trial as a result of the state expending investigatory resources should a reporter's testimony be compelled. Only then can the press function so as not to impair First Amendment interests by acting as an investigative arm of the state.[150]

The reporter in the hypothetical case should also not be required to testify before the grand jury about future acts based on information from confidential informants. Again, the basic justification is that it is more valuable to have information made public and the news gathering processes unimpaired than to require disclosure or cite newsmen for contempt and, in effect, bar newsmen in analogous future cases from disseminating information which they are able to gather through confidential sources.

If the reporter publishes an account of a "general" nature regarding future events,[151] then a general deterrent effect in the future will result, since it will be very difficult to predict when disclosure will be compelled after publication of a story in which sources indicate generally that a crime may occur. Moreover, this finding of compelling need on the basis of a general discussion regarding future action legitimizes the quintessential fishing expedition, in which the government uses the press as an investigative arm. Such use significantly undermines the autonomy of the press, as the Ninth Circuit has noted.[152]

---

[149] In some instances indictment may precede arrest. In such a situation, the state may seek disclosure of a party's whereabouts through a reporter who has acquired information from the indicted party for publication purposes. Disclosure may be sought from the reporter at grand jury proceedings, by means of a special court order, or perhaps by an attempt to indict the reporter under an "obstruction of justice" statute. However, the reporter should possess the constitutional right of nondisclosure until the criminal trial. If disclosure were required in a post-indictment but pre-trial setting, reporters would probably be unable to obtain information from indicted parties prior to their arrest, and the public would be deprived of valuable information concerning criminal conduct.

[150] See pp. 346–47 supra.

[151] A "general" account regarding future events might be: "The X faction of the militant Y party said Thursday that, in the future, violence could be used to change the structure of American society." This account is "general" as regards time, place, methods, and persons involved. It is distinguished from a "specific" account not in any precise sense, but only for the purposes of argument. In actuality, the line would be difficult to draw (although there would be clear cases of either "type"). In any event, under the theory of this Note such line-drawing would not be necessary since the publication of neither type of account should result in a subpoena.

If the newsman published a report of "specific" nature regarding a future act,[153] a compelling need for subpoenaing the newsman should not be found. First, specific deterrent effects of the type discussed above would result.[154] Second, there would be general deterrent effects resulting from uncertainty about how far the rule in the particular case would be extended. Third, other preventive measures could be taken as a result of the story.[155] Also, the administration of justice in instances involving both "general" and "specific" reports of future actions is not likely to be served, in general, since information will dry up, or, in particular, since a contempt citation is likely to result.

No matter how one varies the facts of this "hard case" (i.e., with regard to the newsman's relation to the informer, the nature of the event, the place published, or the relation in time of the published account and the actual occurrence of the event itself),[156] the basic arguments advanced in the paragraphs above apply. Therefore, the surest way to preserve the public's interest in a free flow of information is to give reporters a right of nondisclosure concerning informer-reporter communications applicable before all grand jury proceedings.[157] This right, thus defined, not only advances First Amendment values, but should not significantly impair the grand jury's functions. The very reason that grand jury subpoenas are generally harmful to an independent press—the breadth of the grand jury investigatory process—minimizes the loss to the grand jury created by exempting reporters from testifying as to confidential informer-reporter relationships. With vast resources at their disposal through the subpoena process and the need only to establish probable cause for an indictment, there is a substantial likelihood that adequate information will be available from other sources to satisfy the purposes of the grand jury investigation, whether the purpose be a general investigation or a pre-trial screen.[158] [152] The court of appeals reasoned: If the Grand Jury may require appellant to make available to it information obtained by him in this capacity as news gatherer, then the Grand Jury and the Department of Justice have the power to appropriate appellant's investigative efforts to their own behalf—to convert him after the fact into an investigative agent of the Government. The very concept of a free press requires that the news media be accorded a measure of autonomy; that they should be free to pursue their own investigations to their own ends without fear of governmental interference, and that they should be able to protect their investigative process." In re Caldwell, No. 26,025 (9th Cir. Nov. 16, 1970).

---

[153] A "specific" account regarding future events might be: "The X faction of the militant Y party said Thursday that within five days a major government building in New Haven would be blown up by party members."

[154] For example, once a compelling need has been found for forcing disclosure of identities and information regarding a possible future bombing, stories that were necessarily based on such information would probably cease since neither sources nor reporters could be certain of maintaining a confidential relationship.

[155] There should be no exception to a reporter's right of nondisclosure when he has knowledge about future actions, in part because such situations can be adequately handled through other procedures. For example, if a reporter published an article stating that he had learned from a confidential source that a building was to be bombed the following day, several courses of action would be open to law enforcement officials. First, they could try to convince the reporter to disclose the identity of his informant. Presumably most newsmen would disclose such information in order to save human life. However, if the reporter refused to disclose the needed information, the police might have sufficient independent evidence to indict suspects. If no such evidence existed, they could begin their own emergency investigative efforts in order to obtain sufficient information. Furthermore, they would be able to inspect the building in order to prevent the danger. Had the reporter and informant been deterred by threat of a disclosure requirement, this information might not have been available to law enforcement officials. Of course, the right of nondisclosure might be abused by individuals and groups attempting to create fear and panic by publishing false threats, supposedly based on reliable confidential information. However, this situation is best remedied by government investigations establishing the falsity of such reports.

[156] See pp. 365–69 infra.

[157] With this absolute right of nondisclosure concerning confidential informer-reporter relationships, the reporter should be required to appear before a grand jury to testify concerning information not acquired for public dissemination purposes. However, if all this is required of a reporter is verification of his published works, it would seem that such verification could be accomplished through affidavit to prevent impairment of First Amendment interests caused by the reporter's appearance before a secret investigatory body. This conclusion is consistent with that reached by the Ninth Circuit, In re Caldwell, No. 26,025 (9th Cir. Nov. 16, 1970).

Furthermore, it is not clear that an explicit right of nondisclosure will not be more helpful to the investigatory process in the long run than a diluted privilege. There are a number of situations in which the exemption of newsmen from compulsory disclosure will aid the administration of justice. A New York study indicates that those states which have granted reporters some statutory exemption from compulsory testimony have experienced no detrimental effect on law enforcement but rather have found the privilege to be of aid in securing information through the press concerning illegal activities.[159] In instances of governmental corruption, the value of the press as a recipient of such information is particularly important, for it is possible that the government will ignore reports of internal corruption unless disclosure of such information is made public.[160] Unless sources inside government are protected, an especially important flow of news will be impaired.

The arguments in favor of recognizing the newsman's privilege at grand jury investigations apply with even more force when reporters are subpoenaed before legislative committees. The function of a legislative committee is purely investigatory, and to the extent that the press is allowed to become an investigatory arm of Congress and state legislatures, its freedom and independence are further eroded.

The likelihood of general deterrent effects is substantial if informants fear that a newsman may be called before a legislative committee because such committees are not bound by the evidentiary rules that protect parties and witnesses and check abuses of power in judicial trials.[161] Wigmore notes that legislative inquiries are sometimes conducted for partisan purposes and personal aggrandizement. Also, a temptation often exists for such committees to pursue the inquiry beyond what is required for enactment of contemplated legislation and to assume improperly the function of grand juries.[162] The informer and reporter thus cannot determine with any certainty the likelihood of a forthcoming legislative investigation, nor can they predict the scope of inquiry if such an investigation does occur. Even with the use of a limiting test, such as the compelling need rule, specific deterrent effects will result and news sources will probably dry up.

Although a legislature and its committees have power to investigate matters and conditions relating to contemplated legislation,[163] the Supreme Court has recognized that this broad power is subject to certain limitations.[164] Extending the right of news gatherers to refuse disclosure of the names of their informants to legislative committees is supported by the rationale of cases holding that the legislative power to investigate excludes any powers of law enforcement.[165] The theory of these cases is that apprehension of crimes are properly the functions of, respectively, the Executive and the Judiciary. Legislative committee inquiry has been held unconstitutional when it has been judicially determined that the committee was primarily concerned with determining the guilt or innocence of a committee witness.[166]

---

[158] The same reasoning requires that reporters have a right of nondisclosure at preliminary hearings, for again, probable cause to believe an individual has committed a crime must be established.

[159] NEW YORK LAW REVISION COMMISSION, REPORT, RECOMMENDATIONS AND STUDIES 109–10, 143–46, (1949). Statements from attorneys-general and police chiefs in those states with a reporter's statutory privilege of nondisclosure are presented asserting that the existence of the privilege statute has had no detrimental effect on law enforcement and criminal prosecution, and that, on occcasion, law enforcement has been assisted because of the privilege statute.

[160] The Supreme Court has recognized the importance of the press in preventing governmental corruption: "Thus the press serves and was designed to serve as a powerful antidote to any abuses of power by government officials and as a constitutionally chosen means for keeping officials elected by the people responsible to all the people whom they were elected to serve." Mills v. Alabama, 384 U.S. 214, 219 (1966).

[161] 8 WIGMORE, supra note 14, at § 2185.

[162] Id.

[163] See p. 320 and note 12 supra.

[164] A legislative committee cannot inquire into "private affairs unrelated to a valid governmental purpose." McGrain v. Daughtery, 273 U.S. 135, 173 (1927). The power to investigate does not extend to an area in which the government is forbidden to legislate. Quinn v. United States, 349 U.S. 155, 161 (1955). The power to investigate is subject to limitations imposed by the specific guarantees of the Bill of Rights. For example, the Supreme Court has held that a witness before a Congressional committee may refuse to answer questions by claiming the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination. Quinn v. United States, supra. Legislative investigating committees are also subject to the Fourth Amendment prohibition of unreasonable searches and seizures. Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178 (1957). See generally, Note, The Power of Congress to Investigate and to Compel Testimony, 70 HARV. L. REV. 671 (1957); S. Doc. No. 99, 83d Cong., 2d Sess. (1954); STAFF OF SENATE COMM. ON THE JUDICIARY supra note 19, at 57–60.

A news gatherer must also have the right before a legislative committee to refuse disclosure of information obtained from informants in the course of news gathering. Although there are no reported cases concerning a reporter refusing to disclose confidential communications,[167] it will often be possible for a committee to discover identities of sources if the reporter, though allowed to conceal specific names, is nevertheless forced to testify concerning the details of his meeting with informants. Also, the rule that legislative committees can only inquire into fit subjects for legislation is not strictly enforced by the courts,[168] and legislative committees can frequently embark upon broad "fishing expeditions" whose purpose is to discredit the organization or individual under investigation.[169] The threat of a news gatherer having to testify at such a far-ranging inquiry has the potential to deter many informants from communicating with reporters if they fear they are a likely target for such investigation.[170]

Extension of the right of nondisclosure to legislative committees will not seriously impair legislative investigations necessary for lawmaking. Such committees have other resources at their disposal and broad subpoena powers enabling them to obtain information necessary for legislation from a variety of sources other than the press.[171] Furthermore, information which the press has obtained through confidential informants and which is disclosed publicly should provide legislators with a better understanding of the problems confronting society.

5. The Right at Civil Trial and the Limited Exception

A right of nondisclosure concerning informant relationships must also be available in civil litigation. The general effect of compulsory disclosure of confidential sources and information has already been noted:[172] informants become less willing to communicate with newsmen and the flow of news to the public is restricted. Although the focus of inquiry at civil trials is narrower than at grand jury or legislative investigations, there are still reasons to fear substantial general and specific deterrent effects in civil litigation—effects that do not result from creating an exception to the right at criminal trials. The broad discovery provisions of Rule 26 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure enable a party to obtain information that will not be used at trial; the almost unlimited investigation permitted by Rule 26 has frequently led to "malicious, as well as over-extended, questioning."[173] Since a party may discover "any matter not privileged, which is relevant to the subject matter involved in the pending action" and since discovery extends to "the identity and location of persons having knowledge of relevant facts,"[174] the identity of informants may become the subject of discovery.[175] The impact of this extensive discovery machinery is magnified by the fact that any person may initiate a civil suit. In the federal court system, for example, the number of civil cases filed is over twice the number of criminal cases filed.[176] Attempts to limit the range of the subpoena power in civil trial through use of a judicial test (e.g., a "heart of the matter" rule) are, once again, likely to result in both general and specific effects of the type discussed above.[177]

---

[165] See, e.g., Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168 (1880).

[166] United States v. Icardi, 140 F. Supp. 383 (D.D.C. 1956).

[167] On several occasions, reporters have been held in contempt for failure to disclose the identities of informants to legislative committees. These incidents are discussed in Staff of Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, supra note 19, at 60–61, although no rationale for these decisions is offered.

[168] See Note, The Power of Congress to Investigate and to Compel Testimony, supra note 164, at 671–72.

[169] Tests that go to the "importance of the subject" under investigation or "relevancy of the testimony" sought are subject to abuse in a legislative inquiry, as in grand jury proceedings, because the breadth of inquiry is not sufficiently focused to eliminate broad deterrent effects. See pp. 349–55 supra.

[170] See pp. 331–32 supra.

[171] See p. 320 and note 12 supra.

[172] See pp 331–32 supra.

[173] 4 J. Moore, Federal Practice ¶ 26.02[3] (1970), quoting from Comment, The Use of Discovery in United States District Courts, 60 Yale L.J. 1132, 1133 n.3 (1951).

[174] Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b). The great majority of states also have extremely liberal discovery rules for civil trials. As of January 1, 1963, no fewer than forty-three states adopted, either by statute, supreme court rules, or case law, part or all of the federal discovery procedures. Comment, Discovery—the Work Product Protection, 13 Kan. L. Rev. 125, 129 (1964). For a complete list of state provisions as of January 1, 1963, see id. at 129 n. 33. At least four states have not followed the Federal Rules but have adopted other extremely broad discovery procedures. Comment, The Work Product Doctrine in the State Courts, 62 Mich L. Rev. 1199, 1205 (1964). There is a tendency in the few states with limited discovery procedures to adopt the federal provisions; Ohio, for example, recently adopted the new revised Federal Rules on discovery. Beirne, Discovery, 39 U. Cinn. L. Rev. 497, 499 (1970). See generally Developments in the Law—Discovery, 74 Harv. L. Rev. 940 (1961).

Although a reporter's right of nondisclosure at a civil trial may exclude relevant testimony and bring about an occasional miscarriage of justice, the penalties accompanying such a miscarriage are not as substantial in civil as in criminal litigation. Unlike a criminal action which involves an attempt by society to impose its collective judgment on an individual, a civil action involves only private parties. Thus the cost of defeat does not include the stigma of social condemnation and the possibility of imprisonment.[178] The judicial system itself recognizes that imprisonment is a relatively more severe sanction than payment of monetary damages by requiring proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt for imprisonment. In addition, the Constitution and Supreme Court have recognized a number of other precedural safeguards applicable to criminal, but not civil litigation,[179] in order to minimize the opportunity for wrongful decisions in those situations where a state attempts to incarcerate an individual.

The Supreme Court has already indicated its willingness to deprive civil litigants of recovery in order to protect First Amendment interests in a free press. In New York Times Co. v. Sullivan,[180] the Court placed an extremely difficult burden of proof on the public official plaintiff in libel actions in order to assure a free flow of information to the public. And in Time, Inc. v. Hill, an individual plaintiff was denied the right of recovery for an invasion of privacy that caused injury to his reputation because of his inability to prove that the error was made with "knowing or reckless falsity." [181]

The only time that the name of a confidential informant should possibly be disclosed at a civil trial is in a libel action which falls under the New York Times Co. v. Sullivan doctrine.[182] Here, unlike other civil trial, criminal process or legislative hearing siutations in which the right applies, the reporter or paper is a party to the suit. When a public official sues for libel, he must prove that the allegedly defamatory publication was both false and made with "actual malice."[183] The requirement of actual malice is satisfied if the plaintiff proves that the defamatory statement was made with knowing falsity or with a reckless disregard for the truth.[184] Although the Supreme Court has restricted libel recoveries in cases of good faith error, it has inveighed against the use of the "calculated falsehood":

---

[175] See St. Paul Tide & Marine Ins. Co. v. King, 45 F.R.D. 521 (W.D. Okla. 1968), holding that a party must divulge the names of all persons contacted who had knowledge of relevant facts.

[176] Between July 1 and December 31, 1969, 42,361 civil cases and 18,740 criminal cases were filed in the United States District courts. ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES COURTS, REPORT OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE JUDICIAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES 3 (1970).

[177] See pp. 340–42, 349 supra.

[178] See A. Goldstein, The State and the Accused: Balance of Advantage in Criminal Procedure, 69 YALE L. J. 1149, 1150 (1960); H. M. Hart, The Aims of the Criminal Law, 23 LAW & CONTEMP. PROB. 401, 404 (1958).

[179] See A. Goldstein, supra note 178, at 1150–51.

[180] 376 U.S. 254 (1964).

[181] 385 ULS. 374, 397 (1967).

[182] 376 U.S. 254 (1964). Since the Times case, the privilege of the media to make false statements has been extended to include not only government officials, but also to "public figures," Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130 (1967), and to persons who are involuntarily newsworthy, Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1967). The Supreme Court recently granted certiorari to three cases involving the question of whether the Times rule extends to cases involving the defamation of private individuals as well. Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc., 415 F.2d 892 (3rd Cir. 1969), cert. granted, 397 U.S. 904 (1970) (No. 947, 1969 Term; renumbered No. 66, 1970 Term); Roy v. Monitor Patriot Co., 109 N.H. 441, 254 A.2d 832 (1969), cert. granted, 397 U.S. 904 (1970) (No. 891, 1969 Term; renumbered No. 62, 1970 term); Ocala Star-Banner Co. v. Damron, 221 So.2d 459 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1969), cert. granted, 397 U.S. 1073 (1970) (No. 1373, 1969 Term; renumbered No. 118, 1970 Term). For a discussion of the manner in which the newsworthiness doctrine may eventually extend a protective umbrealla against libel suits over all that ultimately appears in the media, see Cohen. A New Niche for the Fault Principle: A Forthcoming Newsworthiness Privilege in Libel Cases? 18 U.C.L.A. L. REV. 371, 381 (1970).

An evaluation of the correctness of the New York Times rule is beyond the scope of this Note. For purposes of argument, it is assumed that the rule should not be changed or abolished. Mr. Justice Black and Mr. Justice Douglas, however, advocate an "unconditional right to say what one pleases about public affairs." New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, supra at 297.

[183] New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 279–80 (1964).

> "Although honest utterance, even if inaccurate, may further the fruitful exercise of the right of free speech, it does not follow that the lie, knowingly and deliberately published . . . should enjoy a like immunity. . . . For the use of the known lie as a tool is at once at odds with the premises of democratic government and with the orderly manner in which economic, social, or political change is to be effected." [185]

Proof of actual malice is exceedingly difficult under Supreme Court standards because a plaintiff must prove with "convincing clarity" [186] a newspaper's recklessness or its "high degree of awareness of probable falsity." [187] Such a demonstration is usually made by showing that a newspaper has deviated substantially from "standards of good investigation and reporting." [188] Proof of actual malice will often depend on knowing the identity of the newspaper's informant, since a plaintiff will have to demonstrate that the informant was unreliable and that the newspaper violated proper reportorial practices by failing to verify his story. In one of the few cases where the Supreme Court has affirmed a finding of actual malice, the plaintiff proved that a magazine had relied on the affidavit of an informant without checking his character (he had been placed on probation in connection with bad check charges) or the circumstances of his story.[189] Had the plaintiff been unable to obtain the informant's identity (his identity was revealed in the magazine story), proof of actual malice would have been impossible.

Thus, since a plaintiff has the burden of proof in a libel suit that falls under the New York Times Co. v. Sullivan rule, if a newspaper which is a defendant in the suit is given the right to conceal the identity of its confidential informants and if, as this Note recommends,[190] a strong presumption of confidentiality attaches to any transactions between a news gatherer and informant, recovery will frequently be impossible because of the plaintiff's failure to prove actual malice. On the other hand, if disclosure is compelled in every instance where defamatory falsehood has been demonstrated, substantial deterrent effects could result. A source who is not entirely certain about the veracity of his information would be reluctant to reveal it to a reporter, since, if it subsequently were proven to be false, his identity would necessarily be revealed. Such an informer might have made a good faith effort to check his information, but still not be certain; [191] thus a type of communication which the First Amendment should protect could be deterred if disclosure is compelled in all Times situations where defamatory falsehood is shown.

The proper resolution of this dilemma in a Times-type libel case [192] would be the following rule: once enough evidence has been introduced by the plaintiff to establish the probable falsity of the information, the trial judge may order disclosure of the informant's name.[193] However, the defendant may resist disclosure by demonstrating that regardless of the reliability of the informer—even assuming, for example, that the informer was a known congenital liar—it made a good faith effort to check independently the basis and truth of the information. In other words, the defendant may assume the burden of proving lack of malice, rather than revealing an informant's name.[194]

---

[184] Id.

[185] Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 75 (1964).

[186] New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 285–86 (1964).

[187] Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 74 (1964).

[188] Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 138 (1967).

[189] Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130 (1967). The informant stated in his affidavit to the magazine that he had accidentally overheard a telephone conversation in which a college athletic director gave away football secrets to an opponent. When the magazine printed a story containing this information, the athletic director sued the magazine for libel. It was revealed at trial that the magazine had not checked the informant's notes of the conversation, had not checked the value of the information the plaintiff athletic director allegedly gave away, and had not viewed the films of the game that it was asserted plaintiff's college lost because of the breach of secrecy.

[190] See pp. 342–44 and note 116 supra.

[191] The New York Times case explicitly asserted that erroneous statements made in good faith are "inevitable in free debate and . . . must be protected if the freedoms of expression are to have the 'breathing space" that they need . . . to survive.'" New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 271–72 (1964).

[192] This solution will also apply to breach of privacy cases in situations such as that in Time, Inc. v. Hill, for here also a plaintiff must prove either knowing use of falsity or a reckless disregard for the truth. 385 U.S. 374 (1967).

[193] Because great variations are possible in factual circumstances, it is difficult to define in advance exactly how the discretion of the trial court should be exercised in requiring disclosure of the identity of a confidential informant. Since the issue of falsity is decided by the jury, it is clear that the judge cannot make an actual finding of falsity before the jury returns its verdict. Libel trials under the Times rule are not conducted as "split" trials, with the jury first determining falsity and then actual malice. A judge will necessarily have to predict the point at which the plaintiff has introduced enough evidence to prove falsity; he may wish to reserve decision on a motion to com-

The reason for this rule is that, although disclosure must be allowed or else the Times rule would, in effect, be defeated, it may well be possible for a newspaper to prove that it had adequately checked the reliabiilty of a story given by confidential informant and had good faith reason to believe the story true independent of the informer's reliability. The degree of checking on a story would of course vary with the circumstances, but it does not seem unreasonable to encourage the newspaper to follow minimal verification procedures when the story it prints may be defamatory.

Even with such a rule, there may still be some slight deterrent effect. There may be a class of sources whose information cannot be checked and yet whose reliability would justify printing the story. Within such a class, there may be an informer not quite certain of his information who may be deterred from revealing a story. However, the paper can either promise to take a libel judgment or ask him to verify with a greater degree of certainty the information which is being revealed. In such a situation, where by hypothesis there is no way for a paper to check on the information, requiring the informer to have a high degree of certainty about his allegations seems desirable, if the paper wants to avoid the risk of either a libel judgment or forced disclosure of an informant's name.

In a libel case which falls outside the Times rule, the general policy of not compelling disclosure at civil trial applies. The burden of proof would be on the defendant newspaper to prove the truth of the printed story. Thus, it could choose either to reveal the source of its information (perhaps putting the informant on the stand) or to protect its source and suffer a possible adverse judgment if it can prove "truth" in no other way. It should be noted however, that both in cases which fall under the Times rule and in those which do not, courts have increasingly inteposed stringent qualifications limiting the scope of the action for libel,[195] so this civil trial exception to the general newsman's privilege will be very narrow. Of the modern difficulty in maintaining a libel action, a recent commentator has written: "No other formula of the law promises so much and delivers so little."[196]

III. ADMINISTRATION OF THE RIGHT

A. Quashing a Subpoena Requiring Appearance at Criminal Trial

Subsequent to the issuance of a subpoena to appear at a criminal trial, the newsman desiring to protect his confidential relationships may move to quash the subpoena. Under current practice, the judge may "quash or modify the subpoena if compliance would be unreasonable or oppressive." [197] This determination is based on judicial discretion and involves a balancing of the materiality and relevancy of the party's testimony against the burden that would be placed on the party by requiring him to testify.[198] In most situations the subpoena will not be quashed if there is any reason to believe the party possesses information that may be related to the cause of action before the court.[199] However, a stricter standard should be required in order to compel a newsman to testify at criminal trial.

---

pel disclosure of an informant until later in the trial. It would appear that a plaintiff could successfully move for a mistrial if a jury found falsity but was unable to find actual malice because of the identity of an informant was not disclosed.

[194] This test resembles the determination which must be made when a civil defendant moves to dismiss a complaint for failure to state a cause of action: all the allegations in the plaintiff's complaint are assumed to be true and the court decides whether, as a matter of law, the plaintiff could win the suit.

[195] Limitations which make libel recovery difficult include the exclusion of groups and organizations from access to the suit, the absolute immunity granted to judges, legislators, and executive officials in connection with anything remotely connected with their official duty, and the privilege of fair comment. T. EMERSON, THE SYSTEM OF FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION 519 (1970).

[196] Green, The Right to Communicate, 35 N.Y.U. L. REV. 903, 907 (1960).

[197] FED. R. CRIM. P. 17(c).

[198] See, e.g., United States v. Camp, 285 F. Supp. 400 (N.D. Ga. 1967).

[199] See, e.g., State v. Edwards, 68 Wash.2d 246, 412 P.2d 747 (1966).

If reporters could be subpoenaed merely because it appeared that they might possess relevant information, such use of the subpoena power would lead to unnecessary questioning by prosecutors who had no factual reason to believe the reporter possessed information concerning the alleged offense. With the limited criminal trial exception, prosecutors may wish to call reporters at trial in an attempt to investigate other activities under the guise of seeking relevant evidence. Therefore, in order to insure that the subpoena is being used to prosecute the particular crime and not to investigate generally, and to protect the newsman from having to appear unnecessarily, a concomitant of the right to a protected relationship should be the requirement that the party seeking the newsman's testimony show cause that the reporter has reason to know about the defendant and his allegedly criminal acts. Such a showing is difficult to define with precision beyond saying that it should be more rigorous than the current standard. A newsman's general reports about the political party of the accused or the fact that the reporter at some time had written a story about the accused should not constitute sufficient reason to believe he has information concerning the alleged criminal act. Rather, the requisite showing should include specific evidence, such as the reporter's own writings or testimony of government informers, that the reporter has information relating to elements of the alleged crime. Of course, if the requisite showing is made, the reporter would have to appear at trial and disclose all information received from the defendant relating to his alleged criminal behavior, insofar as it is relevant by trial standards.

In the case of an indictment for conspiracy, special caution must be shown in requiring a reporter to testify. Because of the difficulty in proving a secret agreement to conspire, the standard of relevance of testimony is substantially reduced and other rules of evidence are relaxed at conspiracy trials.[200] Under the proposed rule, a substantial danger exists that conspiracy indictments may be used as weapons to require full disclosure of a journalist's communications with alleged conspirators regardless of whether they further the conspiracy charge. This wholesale disclosure could result in a widespread deterrent effect, particularly among radical groups fearful of conspiracy charges. Conceivably, reporters should be exempted from testifying at conspiracy trials altogether.[201] The breadth of inquiry creates dangers to the free news flow similar to those found at grand jury and legislative investigations, and neither the proposed rule, nor other disclosure tests addressing themselves to the "importance" of the inquiry or "relevance" of the testimony sought, are able to curtails such inquiry.[202] However, if no such exemption as conspiracy trials is granted the newsman, the judge should exercise care in requiring a reporter to appear at trial and should not require his testimony unless he believes the reporter's testimony will clearly further the adjudication of the conspiracy charge.

B. Who May Invoke the Right

A key element of the right of nondisclosure is that the person invoking it must be a "reporter" or "newsgatherer." Given the broad proteciton and discretion afforded a "reporter," there may be attempts to avoid compulsory disclosure requirements by those who would pose as news gatherers. In determining the authenticity of persons who claim that they deserve to invoke the right, the following rule should be used:

"The person invoking the right must have intended to use material, gathered through a confidential informer relationship, in a process aimed at disseminating information to the public."

This "process" may eventuate in a newspaper or magazine article, book, broadcast media presentation, pamphlet, or handbill.[203] However, the person claiming the right must have the burden of establishing his specific intent to use the material sought by the subpoenaing party in order to contribute to the public information flow. The general nature of that material will come out at a hearing when the subpoenaing party seeks information and the individual seeks a protective order as a newsman. The person claiming the right must introduce evidence that the information sought was gathered for use in an actual or planned news story or as background information for such a story.[204]

---

[200] See Note, Conspiracy and the First Amendment, 79 YALE L. J. 872, 877 (1970); Note, Developments in the Law—Criminal Conspiracy, 72 HARV. L. REV. 920, 984, 988 (1959).

[201] A precise delineation of the impairment to First Amdnement interests caused by subpoenaing reporters at conspiracy trials or a detailed argument about the extension of the newsman's right to a conspiracy setting is beyond the scope of this Note. The latter analysis would rest on the deterrent theories developed here.

[202] See pp. 348–58, supra.

[203] The First Amendment applies to broadcasting and all forms of publication. See e.g., Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 267 (1969); Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501 (1945).

This rule, in essence, turns on a factual inquiry, going to the question of intent to disseminate, given the breadth of the First Amendment's definition of the press and the presumptions recommended by this Note regarding the confidentiality of the relationship and the communications.[205] It will be considerably easier for a professional journalist to satisfy this showing because of his access to publishing facilities and the frequency with which he contributes to the public news flow. However, a reporter for other forms of publication must be able to invoke the right if he can show that it was "more probable than not" that the information sought was acquired for dissemination purposes. Normally, actual dissemination of information related to the subject of the informer's communication will satisfy this showing. However, even if no publication has occurred, the reporter must be protected if he can introduce evidence, such as the testimony of others, that he was gathering information which was to be disseminated. Of course, even the actual publication of a story may be an insufficient showing if other evidence indicates that public dissemination was not the purpose of a relationship with an informant, but rather a contrivance to escape compulsory disclosure. Otherwise, anyone anticipating a subpoena could write an article relating to information which may be sought and then claim a right of nondisclosure of sources and background information.

Various factors that a judge could use in making the requisite factual determination include: (1) affiliation with an organization engaged in disseminating information to the public; (2) access to publishing or broadcasting facilities; (3) previous journalistic experience—past contributions to the public information flow; (4) proof of intent to publicize the acquired information as evidenced by testimony from others; (5) livelihood earned throug hthe process of disseminating news to the public; and (6) act of public disclosure.

C. Material Covered by the Right

The right of nondisclosure concerning an informer-reporter relationship should be applicable to information and identities of sources acquired in the course of gathering material for public dissemination through publication or radio and television broadcasting. It should apply both to oral testimony by the reporter and to notes, files, and other materials possessing confidential information which may be demanded by a subpoena duces tecum. As noted, the right should be claimed at the discretion of the reporter.[206] Actual public dissemination cannot be required before the reporter may assert a nondisclosure right, for, at the time of the reporter-informant communication, the informant could not be certain of nondisclosure since he has no assurance that his communication will actually be used in a publication. The court may not require proof of confidentiality because of the difficulties in establishing the intent of an undisclosed informant. However, the presumption of confidentiality is rebuttable, and disclosure may be required if the party requesting it is abe to show clearly that confidentiality was not intended by the informant.[207]

There are three obvious situations where no confidential informer-reporter relationship is involved and where a court may therefore require disclosure by a reporter. Two of these relate to news gathering. First, no claim of nondisclosure should be permissible before judicial and legislative bodies concerning materials already published, and the reporter should be subject to subpoena for the purpose of verifying the accuracy of his published articles.[208] This verification should include authentication of published quotations and a representation that the article in question accurately reflected what the reporter observed and was told. If the reporter testifies that his article contained inaccuracies, a highly unlikely event since such testimony would impair his reputation for reliable reporting, the reporter must then be able to assert a First Amendment right of nondisclosure. Otherwise, the court could probe more deeply into the situation, and the effectiveness of any non-disclosure right would be destroyed.[209]

---

[204] See pp. 344–45 supra. A reporter's superiors in the publishing process who need access to confidential sources and materials for editing and verification purposes must also be protected by this right of nondisclosure.

[205] See pp. 343–45 supra.

[206] See p. 344 supra.

[207] See p. 345 supra.

[208] See note 157 supra.

Another instance of verification would occur when a news gatherer is called before a grand jury, civil trial court, or legislative committee to corroborate information revealed at criminal trial. Here, public disclosure has already taken place so there is no confidentiality left to protect, and it would therefore be quixotic to deny this same information to another properly constituted tribunal. Of course, under no circumstances could the reporter be required to reveal more information than he had previously disclosed at criminal trial.

The second situation in which no informer-reporter relationship exists, and thus no right of nondisclosure obtains under the proposed rule, concerns activities witnessed by the newsman in public. The test for the non-applicability of the right of confidential informer-reporter relationships is a determination whether or not the reporter was in a situation in which he could have been excluded. Thus, a newsman would have to testify as to his observations of demonstrations on city streets, but would not be required to disclose information relating to a meeting of a dissident group which could have excluded him from the meeting and which admitted him only because he promised to keep the proceedings off-the-record.[210] This distinction would also apply to all taped and filmed materials. Films and tapes of private interviews, or that concern situations in which the informer's permission was required, should not be subject to disclosure. If films and tapes either have already been made public, or concern events that occurred in public, they cannot be protected under a rule protecting confidential informer-reporter relationships. However, a persuasive constitutional argument could be made that, even though no confidential informer-reporter relationship exists, such materials should be exempted from disclosure because of the impairment to a free news flow caused by compulsory disclosure.[211]

The third situation in which there is no right of nondisclosure occurs when information is sought from reporters concerning their private lives, information which was not acquired for public dissemination purposes. For example, if a reporter were being sued for divorce and, at trial, were asked to account for his activities on a certain evening, he should not be able simply to respond that he was with confidential informants. Rather, he should have to introduce evidence to establish a reasonable relationship between his activities on that night and a story on which he was working. If, in fact, he were on a social engagement, he should not be able to claim a right of nondisclosure.

Although no specific exception is necessary, the reporter would be unable to use a First Amendment nondisclosure right to conceal his own criminal conduct. The right is limited to informer-reporter relationships and does not protect disclosure of a reporter's own activities. If a newsman is a party to an indictment involving others, such as conspiracy, the criminal trial exception would prohibit him from claiming a First Amendment right of nondisclosure of information concerning the others also indicted.[212]

D. Waiver

Recognition of the right of a news gatherer to protect the confidentiality of his relations with informants raises the question whether this right may be waived. Since the major reason for recognizing this right is the deterrent effect of compulsory disclosure on informants, an informant should be able to waive the newsman's right of nondisclosure if confidentiality is no longer desired. Such a situation might occur when a party in a civil trial wishes, at the trial, to corroborate an assertion made by him by showing that he had previously told the reporter the same information. Or, in another situation, an informant might want a reporter to testify before a grand jury or legislative committee as to their communications.

---

[209] The reporter should be under substantial pressure to account for any errors he is willing to admit, for unaccountable error would probably damage his reputation for reliable reporting even more severely than the admission of error.

[210] See In Re Pappas, No. 14,690 (Mass. Sup. Ct. Jan. 29, 1971).

[211] This Note is limited to an analysis of the constitutional right to confidential informer-reporter relationships. However, there is a potential deterrent effect caused by compulsory disclosure of information gathered by reporters at public events. For example, at violent demonstrations photographic equipment may be destroyed if demonstrators believe the film will later be used for government investigatory purposes. Furthermore, demonstrators who might otherwise co-operate with newsmen at later interviews may be deterred if the reporters have aided the government in the past through production of such films. Thus, it could be argued that the threat of this deterrence is sufficient to justify a constitutional right of nondisclosure of all information acquired by reporters while acting in a news gathering capacity.

[212] See pp. 346–47 supra.

In order to waive the newsman's right of nondisclosure, the informant should appear at court or at a hearing brought about by the newsman's motion to quash the subpoena and testify that confidentiality of his communications with the reporter is no longer desired. The could would then determine the voluntariness of the informant's waiver, based on an evaluation of the "totality of circumstances" surrounding it.[213] If it appears that the waiver was made in voluntary fashion by an informant who understood the newsman's right of nondisclosure, the reporter must then be required to disclose all information communicated to him from that informant.

Since the reporter is given the discretion to claim the right of nondisclosure, he has the right to claim nondisclosure of specific information in one action and later disclose the same information in another action. In every situation, the reporter is given the discretion to balance the deterrent effect that would probably occur if he were to disclose confidential information against the interests to be served by disclosure. It has been suggested that once a reporter claims a right of nondisclosure concerning certain information, he shuold not later be able to disclose that information as a defense to a libel action.[214] However, the fact that he has interest in the outcome of the libel action does not appear to be sufficient reason for denying him the right of disclosure in this action if he chooses to risk a deterrent effect and harm to his professional stature in order to defend himself properly.[215]

E. An Evidentiary Problem

For purposes of impeachment, the scope of admissible cross-examination is considerably broader than the scope of testimony given on direct examination.[216] Therefore,, a situation might arise in which a newsman claims a right of nondisclosure to a question asked on cross-examinatin to show the newsman's bias. For example, the cross-examiner might desire disclosure of information concerning the newsman's relationships with third party informants in an attempt to establish the newsman's bias. If the newsman were to claim a right of nondisclosure on cross-examination, the judge could strike the reporter's direct testimony in the exercise of his judicial discretion because the cross-examiner had been denied his right to a full cross-examination.[217] However, a more common practice would be for the judge to caution the jury to take into account the inadequate cross-examination in evaluating the newsman's direct testimony.

IV. CONCLUSION

The values promoted by the free press clause of the First Amendment are of paramount importance to the just functioning of democratic society. These values may only be secured by guaranteeing the newsman the right to gather, to print and to circulate information—and, by necessary implication, to shield a confidential relationship with his source from compulsory disclosure requirements. Recognizing the primary importance of this relationship, the state legislature of New York, in May, 1970, enacted a "Freedom of Information Act for Newsmen."[218] This legislation grants newsmen an absolute privilege to withhold any information (whether obtained in confidence or not) at any judicial, legislative or administrative proceeding without fear of a contempt citation.[219]

---

[213] Prior to Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), "totality of circumstances" was the standard applied to determine the voluntariness of a confession. Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503 (1963). The court, in applying this standard to an informant's waiver, should consider such factors as physical abuse, threats, and ability of the informant to understand his waiver.

[214] NEW YORK LAW REVISION COMMISSION, supra note 159, at 7.

[215] The apparent inconsistency of this position stems from the fact that the reporter, by refusing to disclose in the first case, is presumably acting in the "public interest" by assuring a free flow of information, but in disclosing at the libel action, he is acting in a "self-interested" fashion. The theory for prohibiting disclosure would seem to be that since the newsman had "frustrated the administration of justice" in the first case (albeit in the name of the First Amendment) he should have to pay a penalty in the second. However, whether the administration of justice was frustrated in the first case is uncertain. More important, the basic theory of this Note is that newsmen, of all shades of opinion, are the best judges of how to insure a full flow of information to the public. If disclosure is permitted in the second case, the paper which chooses to so disclose may have its credibility with sources injured and may not be able to function as effectively as a news gatherer. However, this should be the paper's decision. Neither the specific nor general deterrent effects of the kind discussed above would result from disclosure, insofar as they affect the press at large, since only the particular paper in question would have its news gathering function impaired.

[216] See C. MCCORMICK, LAW OF EVIDENCE § 22 (1954).

[217] Id. at §§ 19 and 24.

The First Amendment may not mandate so sweeping an interpretation of the informer-newsman relationship. Yet, if the flow of information to the public is not to be unnecessarily impaired, the relationship between reporters and their sources must be given more protection, as a matter of constitutional right, than is currently afforded by state and federal courts.

[From The Columbia Law Review; Vol. 71:838 (1971)]

THE RIGHT OF THE PRESS TO GATHER INFORMATION

INTRODUCTION

The debate over the proper boundaries of freedom of the press is older than the Constitution itself. Writing in the Federalist Papers, Alexander Hamilton observed:

> "On the subject of the liberty of the press, as much as has been said, I cannot forbear adding a remark or two.... I contend that whatever has been said about it... amounts to nothing. What signifies a declaration that "the liberty of the press shall be in inviolably preserved"? What is the liberty of the press? Who can give it any definition which would not leave the utmost latitude for evasion? I hold it to be impracticable; and from this I infer that its security, whatever fine declarations may be inserted in any constitution respecting it, must altogether depend on public opinion, and on the general spirit of the people and of the government."[1]

Almost two centuries after the adoption of the first amendment, the full scope of the protection afforded the press is still undefined.

The information media serve two principal functions in contemporary American society. First, they expand the boundaries of available knowledge by reporting new factual information; second, they provide critical analyses of events. Of these two functions, the first is clearly as crucial as the second, and perhaps more so. While it is a basic premise of American government that every well-informed, rational adult has the capacity to form his own opinions, no single individual has the time or the resources to gather firsthand all the information he needs to have in order to form intelligent opinions regarding political, social, and economic affairs. The information media have assumed the burden of providing this factual material. Nevertheless, despite the importance of this informing function, it has received scant notice in first amendment litigation.[2]

In the area of critical expression, the boundaries of constituional protection have been outlined in considerable detail. Standards have been established to protect political speech.[3] The definition of obscenity has been narrowed.[4] The substantive law of libel has been reformulated.[5] Procedural obstacles have been erected to magnify the difficulty of stifling expression.[6] Federal equity rules have been remolded to offer greater judicial protection for expression.[7] These changes, and many more, have been undertaken to "allow the widest room for discussion, the narrowest range for its restriction." [8] While these developments have unquestionably aided in the dissemination of information as well as of opinion, their primary focus has been upon freedom of expression.

---

[218] New York Civil Rights Law 79–h (1970).

[219] Id. The statute, however, does not protect all who disseminate information to the public. Rather, it specifically defines such terms as "professional journalist" and "newspaper," in effect limiting a right of confidentiality to those reporters who earn their livelihood through employment with broadcasting stations and publications which appear regularly.

[1] THE FEDERALIST No. 84, 514 (Rossiter ed. 1961) (A. Hamilton).

[2] The closest the Supreme Court has come to finding a first amendment right based solely on the right to disseminate facts as such was in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965). In that case the Court held unconstitutional a statue forbidding the dissemination of birth control information. Yet a careful reading of the case reveals that the Court's holding rested on a penumbral right of privacy, rather than on information dissemination. See id. at 482–84.

[3] See, e.g., Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494, 510 (1951); Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 52 (1919).

[4] See, e.g., Memoirs v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413, 418 (1966).

[5] Greenbelt Cooperative Publishing Ass'n v. Bresler, 398 U.S. 6, 13–14 (1970); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 283 (1964).

As to the informing function, however, and in particular the actual process of gathering information, the Supreme Court has yet to determine the limits of protection under the first amendment.[9] Recent occurrences have raised the question whether that amendment mandates special rights for a newsman subpoenaed to testify in a situation where his cooperation will jeopardize his future access to important sources of information.[10] This situation involves tension between an asserted first amendment protection of information gathering and the law's strong policy that a court has a right to "everyman's evidence." [11] In such conflicts the first amendment does not automatically prevail, since first amendment rights are not absolute.[12] The recognition of a constitutional "right" to gather information is only the threshold step in the analysis.

This Note will argue that the first amendment does indeed include the right of the press to gather information, and that where important governmental or societal interests militate against the right—e.g., where a reporter is called upon to testify, where he is excluded from secret meetings, or where his travel abroad is restricted—existing first amendment standards provide a foundation for devising tests that accommodate these conflicting needs.

I. BACKGROUND ON THE FREEDOM OF THE PRESS AND THE RIGHT TO GATHER INFORMATION

The first amendment provides:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." [13]

It seems clear from the face of the amendment, first, that its primary focus is on freedom of expression, both religious and secular, and second, that even indirect governmental interference is forbidden, since Congress is prohibited from abridging the freedoms. Thus even on first reading the constitutional concept of freedom of the press seems expansive. Despite the Constitution's express protection of that freedom, however, the opinions that have so far been handed down by the Supreme Court have not really dealt with the issue of possible distinctions between speech and press; the Court has generally viewed the freedom of the press as little more than a particularized form of freedom of speech. An example is Patterson v. Colorado,[14] the first Supreme Court case involving the assertion of first amendment rights by a newspaper. Justice Holmes, speaking for the Court, cited both the free speech and free press clauses without distinction in upholding the contempt conviction of a newspaper editor who had criticized, in print only, the conduct of a trial.[15]

Three appeals from convictions under the World War I Espionage Act [16] further demonstrated the Court's tendency to view freedom of speech and freedom of the press as virtually synonymous. In Schenck v. United States,[17] the defendants were convicted for distributing certain pamphlets. In Frohwerk v. United States [18] the offending act was the publication of a newspaper. In Debs

---

[6] Speiser v. Randall. 357 U.S. 513, 526 (1958).

[7] Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479, 486–87 (1965). But cf. Samuels v. Mackell, 401 U.S. 66 (1971); Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37 (1971).

[8] Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 530 (1944).

[9] Cf. International News Service v. Associated Press, 248 U.S. 215 (1918), especially the dissenting opinion of Justice Brandeis, id. at 248–67.

[10] See text accompanying notes 155–92 infra.

[11] 8 J. WIGMORE, EVIDENCE § 2192 at 70 (McNaughton rev. ed. 1961).

[12] New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 283–85 (1964); Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 52 (1919); Brennan, The Supreme Court and the Meiklejohn Interpretation of the First Amendment, 79 HARV. L. REV. 1, 11 (1965).

[13] U.S. CONST. amend. I.

[14] 205 U.S. 454 (1907).

[15] Id. at 461–62.

[16] Espionage Act of June 15, 1917 § 3, ch. 30, 40 Stat. 217, 219.

[17] 249 U.S. 47 (1919).

[18] 249 U.S. 204 (1919).

v. United States[19] the defendant was convicted because of a speech he had made. Though the methods of communication in these three cases were entirely different, the Court in affirming the convictions wrote only a single full-length opinion. Frohwerk and Debs merely cited Schenck,[20] in which Justice Holmes' majority treated the freedom of the press as part of the more general freedom of speech. Although Schenck involved printed matter, Holmes mentioned only free speech,[21] and his famous hypothettical justifying the limitation of freedom of expression was written in terms of speech, not press:

"The most stingent protection of free speech would not protect a man in falsely shouting fire in a theatre and causing a panic." [22]

More recently, the Court has begun to write of a general "freedom of expression" [23] without citing either the freedom of speech or freedom of the press clauses. Even the Court's landmark decision in the law of libel—the most important protection afforded so far to the informing function of the information media—was based on the need for increased expression, rather than information. In New York Times Co. v. Sullvan [24] an Alabama jury had awarded $500,000 to the police commissioner of Birmingham for damages resulting from false statements made in a political advertisement in the defendant's newspaper. The advertisement, paid for by civil rights activists, called for support for Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and in doing so it alleged that civil rights marchers had been abused in specific ways by the Birmingham police. The Supreme Court of Alabama held that the jury could infer the malice required for punitive damages from the falsehood of the publication. The United States Supreme Court reversed, holding that:

> "[t] he constitutional guarantees require . . . a Federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relatinb to his official conduct unless he provides that the statement was made with "actual malice"—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not." [25]

So stated, the rule of the case covers both functions of the information media: critical analysis and the dissemination of information. But the language the Court used in reaching its decision unmistakably demonstrates its reliance on the right of free expression, rather than the right to inform, in reaching its decision. The Court observed:

> "Thus we consider this case against the background of a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open, and that it may well include vehement. caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials." [26]

Citing its first major obscenity case, Roth v. United States,[27] the Court also said:

> "The general proposition that freedom of expression upon public questions is secured by the First Amendment has long been settled by our decisions. The constitutional safeguard, we have said, 'was fashioned to assure the unfettered inter-change of ideas for the bringing about of political and social changes desired by the people.' [28]

The Court has continued to use the rhetoric of Sullivan in instances that involved the informing function of the media. In Greenbelt Cooperative Publishing Association, Inc. v. Bresler [29] it reviewed a libel award against a newspaper for reports made of a public meeting in which a prominent businessman was accused of blackmail. The plaintiff contended that the statements made at the meeting were false, but not that they were reported inaccurately by the defendant; the Court reversed and remanded, holding that the Sullivan doctrine of actual malice was applicable to all public figures. Again, however, the Court spoke in terms of free expression, not freedom to disseminate information. Chief Justice Burger observed in his majority opinion:

---

[19] 249 U.S. 211 (1919).

[20] 249 U.S. at 206–07, 215.

[21] 249 U.S. at 51.

[22] Id. at 52.

[23] See, e.g., Kingsley Books, Inc. v. Brown, 354 U.S. 436, 444 (1957).

[24] 376 U.S. 254 (1964).

[25] Id. at 279–80.

[26] Id. at 270.

[27] 354 U.S. 476 (1957).

[28] 376 U.S. at 269, quoting Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 484 (1957) (emphasis added).

[29] 398 U.S. 6 (1970).

> "This case involves newspaper reports of public meetings of the citizens of a community concerned with matters of local governmental interest and importance. The very subject matter of the news reports is one of particular First Amendment concern. 'The maintenance of the opportunity for free political discussion to the end that government may be responsive to the will of the people and that changes may be obtained by lawful means . . . is a fundamental principle of our constitutional system.' Stromberg v. California [283 U.S. 359, 369 (1931)]. 'Freedom of discussion, if it would fulfill its historic function in this nation, must embrace all issues about which information is needed or appropriate to enable the members of society to cope with the exigencies of their period.' Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 102 [1940]."[30]

In Time, Inc. v. Hill[31] the Court also used free expression language, while holding that constitutional protection extended to factual reports of matters of public interest. Although the Court observed that "[t]he guarantees for speech and press are not the preserve of political expression or comment upon public affairs,"[32] it nevertheless went on to remark:

> "Erroneous statement is no less inevitable in such a case [of one other than a public official] than in the case of comment upon public affairs, and in both, if innocent or merely negligent . . . it must be protected if the freedoms of expression are to have the "breathing space" that they "need . . . to survive". . . .' New York Times Co. v. Sullivan . . . at 271–272."[33]

Despite the lack of a separate body of constitutional law concerning the press' special function of informing the public, society's particular interest in that function has not been unrecognized. Judge Cooley wrote early in this century:

> "The newspaper is . . . one of the chief means for the education of the people. The highest and lowest in the scale of intelligence resort to its columns for information; it is read by those who read nothing else, and the best minds of the age make it the medium of communication with each other on the highest and most abstruse subjects. Upon politics it may be said to be the chief educator of the people; its influence is potent in every legislative body; it gives tone and direction to public sentiment on each important subject as it arises; and no administration in any free country ventures to overlook or disregard an element so pervading in its influence, and withal so powerful.
>
> "And yet it may be doubted if the newspaper, as such, has ever influenced at all the current of the common law, in any particular important to the protection of publishers. . . . [T]he changes accomplished by the public press seem to have passed unnoticed in the law, and, save where modifications have been made by constitution or statute, the publisher of the daily paper occupies today the position in the courts that the village gossip and retailer of scandal occupied two hundred years ago, with no more privilege and no more protection."[34]

If the world is now a "global village,"[35] in Marshall McLuhan's words, the need for information is ever greater. Distant events affect everyone considerably more than in Jefferson's day,[36] and in large cities news even of nearby events can hardly be gathered by every interested individual. In addition, firsthand knowledge often transcends the barriers of class, race, age, and sex only with extreme difficulty. The social costs of the failure to communicate across these lines are perhaps obvious. The fact that freedom of the press has been only coextensive with free speech has meant, however, that only the distributing or publishing aspect of the newspaper's role has been effectively protected.[37] Prior restraints on distribution are forbidden except in special circumstances,[38] criminal or civil penalties after publication are severely limited,[39] and recently there has been express recognition of the recipient's right to perceive the finished product.[40] Yet it seems obvious that the right to gather information is logically antecedent and practically necessary to any effective exercise of these rights, and they cannot be given full meaning unless that antecedent right is recognized.[41]

---

[30] Id. at 11–12 (emphasis added).

[31] 385 U.S. 374 (1967).

[32] Id. at 388.

[33] Id. (emphasis added).

[34] T. COOLEY, CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS 641 (7th ed. 1903) [emphasis added]. The Supreme Court itself has recognized this fact.

"The newspapers, magazines and other journals of the country, it is safe to say, have shed and continue to shed, more light on the public and business affairs of the nation than any other instrumentality of publicity; and since informed public opinion is the most potent of all restraints upon misgovernment, the suppression or abridgement of the publicity afforded a free press cannot be regarded otherwise than with grave concern." Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 250 (1936).

[35] M. MCLUHAN, THE MEDIUM IS THE MESSAGE 63 (1967).

[36] Id. at 72.

An overdrawn example will illustrate the point. Present Supreme Court rules do not allow spectators in the Court's public gallery to take notes.[42] If Congress were to provide a criminal punishment for the violation of this rule, with the intention of preventing the publication of a complete record of the Court's proceedings, here would appear to be no constitutional ground to contest the statute apart from one that recognized the right to gather information. The hypothetical statute would not prevent the publication of a verbatim text of the proceedings once the proscribed transcription were removed from the courtroom. Nor would it call for the punishment of a reporter for what is published. A subsequent publication of a verbatim transcript could, however, make a prima facie case that the statute had been violated.[43] Though in form the publication would merely be serving an evidentiary function, it is undeniable that punishment in this context would have the same effect on expression as if Congress had restrained that expression directly. Yet under existing constitutional standards, Congress could not do the latter.[44] The above example shows, however, that in reality free expression is necessarily interconnected with information gathering.

A less hypothetical example is to be found in the case of New York Times reporter Anthony Ripley,[45] whose coverage of the 1968 convention of the Students for a Democratic Society (S.D.S.) caused him to be subpoenaed to testify before the House Internal Security Committee.

> "The result was not only total destruction of Mr. Ripley's own relationships with militants, and of his ability to cover militant activities . . . . but severe impairment of the ability of other Times reporters to relate to or cover the S.D.S. . . . and the exclusion of the entire 'establishment press' from the 1969 S.D.S convention."[46]

Congress would have had to justify a direct prohibition of the publication of news concerning S.D.S. with a showing of compelling necessity[47]—a showing that is generally difficult to make. But without a first amendment protection for information gathering, Congress is not required to justify the subpoena of the reporter at all; it need merely make a colorable claim that the reporter might have information about a subject within Congress' power to investigate.[48] The practical result in both instances, however, is the same.

---

[37] See, e.g., Lovell v. City of Griffin, 303 U.S. 444, 452 (1938); Ex parte Jackson, 96 U.S. (6 Otto) 727, 733 (1878).

[38] Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, 283 U.S. 697, 708–17 (1931). See Times Film Corp. v. Chicago, 365 U.S. 43 (1961).

[39] See, e.g., Wood v. Georgia, 370 U.S. 375 (1962); Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919).

[40] Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557, 564 (1969). See also A. MEIKLEJOHN, FREE SPEECH AND ITS RELATION TO SELF-GOVERNMENT 88–89, 94 (1948).

[41] Congress itself no doubt had this in mind when it passed the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552 (Supp. III 1968), which provides for non-confidential government records to be made available to any citizen.

As to the constitutional question see Guest & Stanzler, The Constitutional Argument for Newsmen Concealing Their Sources, 64 Nw. U.L. REV. 18 (1969).

[42] See N.Y. Times, April 11, 1971, § 4, at 6, col. 1.

[43] In Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6 (1969), the Supreme Court said in dictum that a criminal statutory presumption would stand up if "it can at least be said with substantial assurance that the presumed fact is more likely than not to flow from the proved fact on which it is made to depend." Id. at 36. As a practical matter, in the case at hand no one could publish a verbatim text of the Court's proceedings without violating the hypothetical statute's prohibition of note-taking.

[44] See, e.g., Greenbelt Cooperative Publishing Ass'n v. Bresler, 398 U.S. 6 (1970); Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1967); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964). See also Pearson v. Dodd, 410 F.2d 701 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 395 U.S. 947 (1969), holding, on non-constitutional grounds, that a public official could not recover for invasion of privacy where the defendant newspaper columnist published material from the official's files that was admittedly borrowed and copied without authorization. The Court naturally voted that it did "not reach the serious constitutional questions suggested by Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 . . . (1967)." 410 F.2d at 703 n.6.

[45] See Brief for Appellant at 23–24, Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 108 (9th Cir. 1970), cert. granted, 39 U.S.L.W. 3478 (U.S. May 4, 1971) (No. 1114).

[46] Id.

[47] See, e.g., Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919); note 44 supra and accompanying text.

The news media might thus invoke a constitutional privilege to gather information in a variety of circumstances: access to public records,[49] expanded foreign travel,[50] unnecessary secret meetings,[51] burdensome restrictions on government press conferences, and no doubt many others. Obviously such a privilege would be mo more absolute than other first amendment rights.[52] The recognition of the right, however, would require that is infringement be justified by a compelling state interest.[53]

Although the Supreme Court has never directly confronted the issue of whether the freedom of the press clause gives the information media a right to gather information, three decisions in the last decade—Zemel v. Rusk,[54] Estes v. Texas,[55] and Sheppard v. Maxwell[56]—have touched on various aspects of the subject. The context in which they arose, however, deprived the Court of the opportunity to reach the central question.

In Zemel v. Rusk[57] the Court came closest to confronting directly an asserted first amendment right to gather information. The plaintiff, a private citizen who had no connection with the press, had asked that his passport be validated for travel to Cuba. After this request was denied, he renewed it, stating that his purpose was "to satisfy my curiosity about the state of affairs in Cuba and to make me a better informed citizen."[58] The Court held that he had demonstrated no first amendment right, and that the Government therefore need not show the compelling interest necessary to justify the invasion of such a right.[59] Agreeing that the inhibition of travel to Cuba "renders less than wholly free the flow of information concerning that country,"[60] the Court observed:

> "For to the extent that the Secretary's refusal to validate passports for Cuba acts as an inhibition (and it would be unrealistic to assume that it does not), it is an inhibition of action. There are few restrictions on action which could not be clothed by ingenious argument in the garb of decreased data flow. . . . The right to speak and publish does not carry with it the unrestrained right to gather information."[61]

The Court's apparent reliance on a distinction between speech and action seems misplaced, as well as questionable in this context. The Court ruled long ago that "action" was not at all inconsistent with a first amendment free expression claim,[62] though different restrictions might be justified than in a pure speech case. And so in the Zemel situation an arguably sounder analysis would be to recognize that travel to Cuba may involve a first amendment right. That a restriction on action can be "clothed by ingenious argument in the garb of decreased data flow"[63] does not, after all, mean that government would have no right to regulate the conduct involved. The only effect of a holding that information gathering is protected by the first amendment is that the state would have to meet first amendment standards for restricting conduct.[64]

---

[48] See Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109 (1959); See also Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273 (1919); Consolidated Rendering Co. v. Vermont, 207 U.S. 541 (1908); Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43 (1906). Indeed, the Supreme Court has noted that a man's fear of injury to himself or his family is insufficient reason for not answering a grand jury's questions. Piemonte v. United States, 367 U.S. 556, 559 n.2 (1961).

[49] See, e.g., Trimble v. Johnston, 173 F. Supp. 651 (D.D.C. 1959).

[50] See, e.g., Worthy v. Herter, 270 F.2d 905 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 361 U.S. 918 (1959).

[51] See, e.g., In re United Press Ass'ns v. Valente, 308 N.Y. 71, 123 N.E.2d 777 (1954) (access to court proceedings).

[52] See text accompanying notes 121–54, infra.

[53] See Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 406 (1963). Cf. Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 634 (1969).

[54] 381 U.S. 1 (1965).

[55] 381 U.S. 532 (1965).

[56] 384 U.S. 333 (1966).

[57] 381 U.S. 1 (1965).

[58] Id. at 4.

[59] Id. at 16–17.

[60] Id. at 16.

[61] Id. at 16–17.

[62] Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88 (1940).

[63] 381 U.S. at 17.

[64] See text accompanying notes 121–54 infra, and cases cited in note 53 supra.

Zemel's helpfulness is further limited in that it did not involve a claim by a member of the information media, and thus did not reach the question of special press rights. The claimant's position would have been different if he had been a newsman gathering information on Cuba for publication rather than a citizen wishing to satisfy his personal curiosity.

In Estes v. Texas[65] the Court, facing the question of permissible publicity surrounding criminal trials, held that the televising of portions of Billy Sol Estes' trial and pretrial hearing over his objection violated due process despite the absence of a showing of actual prejudice.[66] The Court reasoned:

> "It is said, however, that the freedoms granted in the First Amendment extend a right to the news media to televise from the courtroom, and that to refuse to honor this privilege is to discriminate between the newspapers and television. This is a misconception of the rights of the press.
>
> ". . . While maximum freedom must be allowed the press in carrying on this important function [informing the public] in a democratic society its exercise must necessarily be subject to the maintenance of absolute fairness in the judicial process. . . . '[T]he life or liberty of any individual in this land should not be put in jeopardy because of the actions of any news media. . . .'
>
> "Nor can the courts be said to discriminate where they permit the newspaper reporter access to the courtroom. The television and radio reporter has the same privilege. All are entitled to the same rights as the general public."[67]

In Sheppard v. Maxwell[68] the Court expanded on this theme in reversing a conviction because of prejudicial publicity before and during the trial. The Court observed:

> "The carnival atmosphere at trial could easily have been avoided since the courtroom courthouse premises are subject to the control of the court. . . . Bearing in mind the massive pretrial publicity, the judge should have adopted stricter rules governing the use of the courtroom by newsmen. . . . The number of reporters in the courtroom itself could have been limited at the first sign that their presence would disrupt the trial. They certainly should not have been placed inside the bar. Furthermore, the judge should have more closely regulated the conduct of newsmen in the courtroom. For instance, the judge belatedly asked them to handle and photograph trial exhibits lying on the counsel table during recesses."[69]

On the surface the Estes and Sheppard decisions would seem to raise clear questions regarding the nature and extent of journalistic access to trials; they are not, however, dispositive of the issue of first amendment protection for gathering information. Estes[70] really concerned the effect on trial fairness of the dissemination of information, the actual broadcasting of trial excerpts by television stations. The right to gather information was not directly involved, since the Court assumed that all news media had an equal opportunity to report the proceedings verbally, and the Court seemed to decide the case on the ground that the right of the defendant to a fair trial overrode the right of a television station to broadcast,[71] a standard sort of decision under the "balancing" test.[72] The case rests in large part on the especially prejudicial nature of television coverage, as well as the disruptive effect that cameras have on courtroom proceedings. No doubt the result would be the same if the right to a fair trial were balanced against the right to gather information, and indeed Estes is an indication of how the Court would effect that balance. The Court did not analyze the problem in terms of information gathering, however, so the case sheds little light on the substantive content of that right.

Sheppard[73] is also not really on point. Again, under traditional first amendment standards freedom of expression is limited upon a proper showing of justification under the proper test.[74] The trial court could have prohibited the information media from such abuses as handling trial exhibits even if the Court found a first amendment right to gather information, and even though permitting such handling of exhibits might, in some way, have aided the media's gathering of information. The defendant's right to a fair trial would outweigh the right of the press to handle the exhibits. The dictum in Estes that all media are "entitled to the same rights as the general public" [75] misstates the issue. The question is whether, and in what instances, the general public when engaged in the task of gathering new information for dissemination through "the press" may claim constitutional protection for its activities. The Supreme Court has failed to decide this issue, and it is therefore open for determination as a question of first impression in that Court.

---

[65] 381 U.S. 532 (1965).

[66] Id. at 542–44. The Court was ostensibly following the rule of Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723 (1963), which held "That the televising of a defendant in the act of confessing to a crime was inherently invalid under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment even without a showing of prejudice or a demonstration of the nexus between the televised confession and the trial." 381 U.S. at 538.

[67] 381 U.S. at 539–40, quoting Brief for NAB and RTNDA as Amici Curiae at 3–4.

[68] 384 U.S. 333 (1966).

[69] Id. at 358.

[70] Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532 (1965).

[71] Id. at 540.

[72] See text accompanying notes 132–41 infra.

[73] Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333 (1966).

Lower federal courts and the state courts, however, have directly confronted the issue of whether the first amendment protects the gathering of information. The Seventh and Ninth Circuits have stated plainly that it does,[76] and the Second and Fifth Circuits have been willing to assume so arguendo.[77] The District of Columbia Circuit once explicitly stated that there was a constitutional right to gather information,[78] although a later decision has cast some doubt on that statement.[79] Four federal district courts [80] and state courts in Hawaii,[81] Illinois,[82] and Ohio [83] have also stated that the right exists.

On the other hand, the Third Circuit has ruled against the right,[84] and the District Court for the District of Columbia has expressed a similar view,[85] as have the state courts of Arizona,[86] Colorado,[87] Florida,[88] Kentucky,[89] Missouri,[90] Maryland,[91] Nevada,[92] New York,[93] Oregon,[94] Pennsylvania,[95] and West Virginia.[96] No case on either side of the issue, however, has given adequate consideration to the difficulties involved: the holdings or dicata have tended to be terse statements, citing little or no authority.

Tribune Review Publishing Co. v. Thomas,[97] decided by the Third Circuit, is a typical example. A newspaper moved to enjoin enforcement of a court rule barring the taking of photographs in certain areas of the courthouse. The court of appeals affirmed the district court's denial of the injunction, and said:

---

[74] See text accompanying notes 121–48 infra.

[75] 381 U.S. at 540.

[76] Schnell v. City of Chicago, 407 F.2d 1084 (7th Cir. 1969); Associated Press v. KVOS, 80 F.2d 575 (9th Cir. 1935) (dictum), rev'd on other grounds, 299 U.S. 269 (1936); See also Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 1081 (9th Cir. 1970), cert. granted, 39 U.S.L.W. 3478 (U.S. May 4, 1971) (No. 1114).

[77] Seymour v. United States, 373 F.2d 629, 631–32 (5th Cir. 1967); Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910 (1958).

[78] Worthy v. Herter, 270 F.2d 905, 908 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 361 U.S. 918 (1959).

[79] Shelton v. United States, 280 F.2d 701, 707 (D.C. Cir. 1959), rev'd on other grounds, 369 U.S. 749 (1961).

[80] In re Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358, 360 (N.D. Cal.), rev'd on other grounds sub nom. Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 1081 (9th Cir. 1970), petition for cert. filed, 39 U.S.L.W. 3273 (U.S. Dec. 12, 1970) (No. 1114); Adams v. Associated Press, 46 F.R.D. 439, 440 (S.D. Tex. 1969); United States v. Peck, 154 F. Supp. 603, 605 (D.D.C. 1957) (dictum); Providence Journal Co. v. McCoy, 94 F. Supp. 186, 195–96 (D.R.I. 1950), aff'd on other grounds, 190 F.2d 760 (1st Cir. 1951).

[81] In re Appeal of Goodfader, 45 Hawaii 317, 324–26, 367 P.2d 472, 478 (1961).

[82] People v. Dohrn, No. 69–3808 (Cook County Circuit Ct., Illinois, Criminal Divison 1969).

[83] State v. Clifford, 162 Ohio St. 370, 123 N.E.2d 8 (1954), cert. denied, 349 U.S. 929 (1955).

[84] Tribune Review Publishing Co. v. Thomas, 254 F.2d 883, 884–85 (3d Cir. 1958).

[85] Trimble v. Johnston, 173 F. Supp. 651, 655–56 (D.D.C. 1959). But cf. United States v. Peck, 154 F. Supp. 603, 605 (D.D.C. 1957) (dictum).

[86] State v. Meek, 9 Ariz. App. 149, 152, 450 P.2d 115, 118, cert. denied, 396 U.S. 847 (1969).

[87] In re Canon of Judicial Ethics, 132 Colo. 591, 593–94, 296 P.2d 465, 467 (1956).

[88] Firstamerica Dev. Corp. v. Daytona Beach News-Journal Corp., 196 So. 2d 97, 99 (Fla. 1966); Brumfield v. State, 108 So. 2d 33, 35 (Fla. 1958).

[89] Courier-Journal & Louisville Times Co. v. Curtis, 335 S.W. 2d 934 (Ky. 1959), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 910 (1960); Riley v Lee, 88 Ky. 603, 612–613, 11 S.W. 713, 714 (1889).

[90] State v. Shepherd, 177 Mo. 205, 244–45, 76 S.W. 79, 91 (1903).

[91] Ex parte Sturm, 152 Md. 114, 118–21, 136 A. 312, 314–15 (1927).

[92] Azbill v. Fisher, 84 Nev. 414, 417, 442 P.2d 916, 918 (1968).

[93] In re United Press Ass'ns v. Valente, 308 N.Y. 71, 77, 123 N.E.2d 777, 778 (1954).

[94] State v. Buchanan, 250 Ore. 244, 248–49, 436 P.2d 729, 731, cert. denied, 392 U.S. 905 (1968).

[95] Taylor & Shelby Appeals, 412 Pa. 32, 39–40, 193 A.2d 181, 184 (1963).

[96] Bailey v. Charleston Mail Ass'n, 126 W. Va. 292, 27 S.E.2d 837 (1943).

[97] 254 F.2d 883 (3d Cir. 1958).

> "Realizing that we are not dealing with freedom of expression at all but with rules having to do with gaining access to information on matters of public interest, can it be argued that here there is some constitutional right for everybody not to be interfered with in finding things out about everybody else? We suppose it would not be contended that a newspaper reporter or any other citizen could insist upon entering another's land without permission to find out something he wanted to know. In the same way, merely because someone's private letters might be interesting as gossip or as models of English composition it would hardly be argued that one could open another's desk and read through what he finds there. . . . We think that this question of getting at what one wants to know, either to inform the public or to satisfy one's individual curiosity is a far cry from the type of freedom of expression, comment, criticism so fully protected by the first and fourteenth amendments to the Constitution." [98]

While the Third Circuit thus treated the problem as almost frivolous, the District of Columbia Circuit a year later thought it equally obvious that "a newspaperman's right to travel is a part of the freedom of the press." [99] Yet in both cases the issue was the newsman's right to gather information.

The court's analysis of the issue in Tribune Review hardly does justice to the interests involved. The hypothetical of a reporter trespassing on private property or gaining entry to private desk drawers, merey because he wants to know something or to obtain "gossip," seems destined to distract from the real issue, which is the right of a reporter to invade areas that have little claim to privacy, to gather information of public interest, particularly in regard to governmental operations. Though the public may have little or no claim to private letters, it has a substantial claim to letters written by public officials concerning decisions made in their official capacity.[100] If that claim is recognized, the special role of the press in vindicating it logically follows. The principle was well stated by the late Justice Musmanno of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania:

> "Freedom of the press is not restricted to operation of linotype machines and printing presses. A rotary press needs raw material like a flour mill needs wheat. A print shop without material to print would be as meaningless as a vineyard without grapes, an orchard without trees, or a lawn without verdure.
>
> "Freedom of the press means freedom to gather news, write it, publish it, and circulate it. When any of these integral operations is interdicted, freedom of the press becomes a river without water." [101]

Implicit in Justice Musmanno's statement is the understanding that "freedom of the press" is a more expansive right than "freedom of speech." To be sure, free expression, the essence of the free speech guarantee, is also a sine qua non of a free press; the right of a free press must go further, however, and embrace the right to disseminate new information and the antecedent right to gather that information.

The proper analysis when such claims are asserted would seem to be recognize that the first amendment protects the gathering of new information by the information media and, since first amendment rights are not absolute,[102] to evaluate the claim in its particular context according to the appropriate tests for restricting the exercise of first amendment rights.

The remaining problem, then, is to examine how the press' right to gather information will work in concrete cases.

II. THE RIGHT TO GATHER INFORMATION IN PRACTICE

A. Defining "The Press"

A threshold question is which media will enjoy the information gathering right. Obviously, in many circumstances in which the right could operate, a flood of first amendment claims would be administratively unmanageable and would not necessarily further the policies of the right. For example, if a reporter's privilege not to disclose a confidential source could be invoked by anyone who could claim that he planned to disseminate his findings via placards or leaflets, the right of compulsory process of witnesses would be reduced virtually to nothing.

---

[98] Id. at 885.

[99] Worthy v. Herter, 270 F.2d 905, 908 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 361 U.S. 918 (1959).

[100] Cf. FLA. STAT. ANN. § 286.011 (Supp. 1970), which provides that virtually all meetings at which public officials make decisions are public meetings. See N.Y. Times, Feb. 28, 1971, § 1, at 71, col. 1.

[101] In re Mack, 386 Pa. 251, 273, 126 A.2d 679, 689 (dissenting opinion of Musmanno, J.), cert. denied, 352 U.S. 1002 (1956).

[102] See note 12 supra.

Throughout the course of first amendment adjudication, the Supreme Court has defined the phrase "the press" expansively. As noted above,[103] however, the Court has up to the present considered first amendment rights as a guarantee of freedom of expression, and therefore it is only natural that it would view many different media as enjoying the protection of that guarantee. Thus it has held pamphlets,[104] leaflets,[105] signs,[106] books,[107] motion pictures,[108] and non-commercial advertisements[109] to be constitutionally protected, in addition to the more journalistic media of newspapers,[110] magazines,[111] radio,[112] and television.[113]

At the same time, however, the Court has recognized that there are genuine differences among the various media that might call for different constitutional standards. When it held motion pictures to be protected by the first amendment, the Court observed:

"Nor does it follow that motion pictures are necessarily subject to the precise rules governing any other particular method of expression. Each method tends to present its own peculiar problems. But the basic principles of freedom of speech and the press, like the First Amendment's command, do not vary." [114]

---

[103] See text accompnaying notes 14–33 supra.

[104] See, e.g., Lovell v. City of Griffin, 303 U.S. 444 (1938), where the Court held that "The liberty of the press is not confined to newspapers and periodicals. It necessarily embrances pamphlets and leaflets." Id. at 452. The Court went on to strike down a city ordinance vesting the city manager with absolute discretion to prohibit the distribution of pamphlets on the streets. It is clear from such decisions that the Court had in mind only the critical expression function of the press, since pamphlets rarely ever serve as a conduit of disinterested, new information. "[P]amphlets and leaflets . . . have been historic weapons in the defense of liberty." Id. (emphasis added). Since such publications are merely corporeal forms of speech, it would seem fitting that they be included under the first amendment term "speech."

[105] See, e.g., Schneider v. New Jersey, 308 U.S. 147 (1939).

[106] Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88 (1940).

[107] Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 488 (1957) (dictum).

[108] Joseph Burstyn, Inc., v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 502 (1952).

[109] New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 266 (1964). Cf. Valentine v. Chrestensen, 316 U.S. 52, 54–55 (1942).

[110] Greenbelt Cooperative Publishing Ass'n v. Bresler, 398 U.S. 6, 11 (1970).

[111] Time, Inc., v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 388–89 (1967).

[112] Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367, 386–90 (1969) (dictum); National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 226–27 (1943) (dictum).

[113] Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532, 538–40 (1965) (dictum).

[114] Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 503 (1952). This principle has been applied on several occasions. In Times Film Corp. v. City of Chicago, 365 U.S. 43 (1961), the plaintiff film distributor refused to allow a Chicago censoring board to view a movie. The board then refused a license to show the film in Chicago. The film distributor exhausted his administrative appeals, while continuing to refuse to show the film to the board. The film was not made part of the record in the court below, where the distributor had instituted a suit seeking to enjoin the enforcement of the ordinance on the ground that it was unconstitutional on its face. In affirming the lower court's denial of relief, the Supreme Court held that not all forms of prior restraint were invalid. The Court expressly limited its holding to movies, however:

"At this time we say no more than this—that we are dealing only with motion pictures and, even as to them, only in the context of the broadside attack presented on this record."

Id. at 50.

The significance of this statement became apparent in Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U.S. 58 (1963), where the plaintiff book distributor sought to enjoin an informal Rhode Island review board practice of informing book distributors of books it considered unfit for juveniles. The review board's only authority was to recommend to the state attorney general the prosecution of anyone it considered to be selling obscene books to juveniles, obviously a milder form of regulation than that employed in Times Film, since the Rhode Island board—unlike the Chicago board—had no right to ban distribution outright. Yet the Court held the Rhode Island scheme unconstitutional, noting that the "Commission deliberately set about to achieve the suppression of publications deemed 'objectionable' and succeeded in its aim." Id. at 67. Referring to Times Film, the Court remarked in a footnote:

"The only question tendered to the Court in that case was whether a prior restraint was necessarily unconstitutional under all circumstances. In declining to hold prior restraints unconstitutional per se, the Court did not uphold the constitutionality of any specific such restraint. Furthermore, the holding was expressly confirmed to motion pictures."

Id. at 70 n.10. Thus the Court seemed to imply that the safeguards surrounding books must be stronger than those surrounding motion pictures. The Court changed its posi-

The federal government's regulation of the airwaves presents a similar case. Despite the traditional view that the freedom of the press means at least freedom from prior restraint,[115] Congress has undertaken precisely such restraint in the Communications Act of 1934.[116] The Supreme Court upheld the Act because of the especially limited resources available for broadcasting.

> "Freedom of utterance is abridged to many who wish to use the limited facilities of radio. Unlike other modes of expression, radio inherently is not available to all. That is its unique characteristic, and that is why, unlike other modes of expression, it is subject to governmental regulation. Because it cannot be used by all, some who wish to use it must be denied." [117]

Similar distinctions may reasonably be made in deciding which media constitute "the press" for purposes of the right to gather information. Since the policy behind such a right is the ultimate dissemination of new information to the public, the right may logically be restricted to those engaged in such dissemination. For those media, such as placards and leaflets, which are used primarily to express opinion, the constitutional guarantee of free expression already provides adequate safeguards.[118]

In concrete cases this rule, for example, would bring a journalist's refusal to divulge the confidential sources of information used in his news stories, or a scholar's travel to North Korea in contemplation of a book about that country,[119] within the ambit of the first amendment, and would deny such protection to persons preparing placards or leaflets with the aim of publicizing their opinions. There will obviously be unusual cases, often where minority groups or unpopular causes are involved, in which placard-bearers or leafleteers will be disseminating new information; in these cases the function served should be controlling. In most cases, however, the interest of minorities or unpopular persons to have their views known, and the public interest in learning of them, will be better served by according fuller protection to more traditional organs of the press.[120]

B. Constitutional Limitation on the Freedom of the Press

Once the right of the press under the first amendment to gather information has been granted in the abstract, and the media that will be able to claim it have been ascertained, existing first amendment standards must be applied to that right to delimit its extent in practice.[121] The Supreme Court has consistently held that rights protected under the first amendment are not absolute,[122] and it has therefore had to fashion tests to determine when other interests of society are to prevail over those rights.

Three major tests have evolved in the course of first amendment litigation. The first test devised was the "clear and present danger" doctrine, articulated by Justice Holmes in Schenck v. United States.[123] At first, the Cort attempted tion somewhat in Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51 (1965), where it set out standards for prior restraint of motion pictures that were substantially similar to those required for books. See Note, Prior Adversary Hearings on the Question of Obscenity, 70 COLUM. L. REV. 1403, 1410–12 (1970). The distinction is not likely to disappear, however, since it is undeniable that films have unique characteristics. See id. at 1417–18.

---

[115] 4 W. BLACKSTONE, COMMENTARIES *151. See also Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, 283 U.S. 697, 716–17 (1931).

[116] 47 U.S.C. § 301 et seq. (1964).

[117] National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 226 (1943). See also Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

[118] See text accompanying notes 14–40 supra.

[119] Such rights, of course, would always be subject to more compelling societal interests. See text accompanying notes 121–48 infra.

[120] An excellent example is Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 1081 (9th Cir. 1970), cert. granted, 39 U.S.L.W. 3478 (U.S. May 4, 1971) (No. 1114), where a reporter for the New York Times was able to win the confidence of members of the Black Panther Party and thus publish information about it to more people than would ever learn of it from leaflets or placards. The case is discussed in text accompanying note 155 infra.

[121] Though the very fact that these standards have been developed in free expression cases means that they are not logically binding in the area of unique press functions, the placement of the speech and press freedoms in the first amendment implies that the nature and degree of pdotection afforded to each should be substantially similar. Furthermore, the problems involved in balancing interests are analogous in each case; the use of the old tests in a new context would take maximum advantage of whatever accumulated wisdom they contain; and their flexibility is essential to the adaptation of press freedom to changing needs. See text accompanying note 141 infra.

[122] See, e.g., Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919).

[123] 249 U.S. 47 (1919).

> "The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent."

Id. at 52.

to apply this test to all cases in which an enroachment on first amendment rights was claimed,[124] but since it was primarily appropriate to cases of direct punishment of mere utterances, it was unsuited for evaluating some of the more indirect infringements that the Court was holding to be within the ambit of the first amendment. In American Communications Association v. Douds [125] the Court recognized some of the difficulties of using the doctrine:

"[T]he attempt to apply the term, 'clear and present danger,' as a mechanical test in every case touching First Amendment freedoms, without regard for the context of its application, mistakes the form in which an idea was cast for the substance of the idea. . . . It is the considerations that gave birth to the phrase, 'clear and present danger,' not the phrase itself, that are vital in our decision of questions involving liberties protected by the First Amendment." [126]

In Dennis v. United States [127] Chief Justice Vinson, announcing the decision of the Court and writing an opinion in which three Justices joined, restated the familiar Holmes epigram:

"In each case courts must ask whether the gravity of the "evil," discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger." [128]

Even in cases involving criminal sanctions imposed directly for the crime of uttering or publishing exhortations or thoughts deemed to be injurious, however, the Court has never really relied on this restated version of the test. In Mills v. Alabama,[129] for example, a newspaper editor was convicted under a statute prohibiting, among other activities, the publication of editorials on behalf of political candidates on election day. The Supreme Court of Alabama upheld the statute as a "reasonable" exercise of the state's right to regulate elections.[130] In reversing the conviction, the Supreme Court refused to discuss what test must be applied to statutes punishing pure speech. It was content to dismiss the state's arguments by saying:

"That no test of reasonableness can save a state law from invalidation as a violation of the First Amendment when that law makes it a crime for a newspaper editor to do no more than urge people to vote one way or another in a publicly held election." [131]

The implication of this and similar pure speech cases is that the "clear and present danger" test is probably of more historical than practical significance.

The balancing test is by far the most common test for determining first amendment rights;[132] it is used principally in cases in which freedom of expression is inhibited, rather than directly prohibited, by governmental action. In theory, the Court balances the importance of a particular activity to the exercise of first amendment rights, and the degree of restraint of that activity, against the governmental interest in having a particular law. In practice, of course, the weight given each of these factors is largely a personal determination by each Justice, though the doctrine has the advantage of flexibility. Most importantly, perhaps, balancing is a fact of life; the Supreme Court in effect applies the doctrine in first amendment cases whether it acknowledges that fact or not, and for that reason alone the theory is useful for the analysis of such cases.

NAACP v. Button [133] exemplifies the balancing process at work. The NAACP maintained a staff of lawyers under its control to litigate civil rights cases, sought out individuals subjected to discrimination, and offered them free legal assistance in bringing test cases, on the condition that it would exercise complete control over the case, thus assuring that each case would further its national goals. This practice was counter to a Virginia statute prohibiting the "soliciting" of business by attorneys.[134] The purpose of the statute, which was based on the common law's abhorrence of the bar's enticing litigants into court,[135] long antedated the civil rights struggle. The Supreme Court considered the conflicting interests in a textbook example of the balancing process, first determining that the NAACP's litigation efforts were entitled to the strongest possible protection of the first amendment:

---

[124] See, e.g., Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 530 (1944); Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569, 574 (1941); Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 104–05 (1940).

[125] 339 U.S. 382 (1950).

[126] Id. at 394.

[127] 341 U.S. 494 (1951).

[128] Id. at 510. Chief Justice Vinson quoted this reformulation from the opinion of Judge Learned Hand in the case below, 183 F.2d 201, 212 (2d Cir. 1950).

[129] 384 U.S. 216 (1966).

[130] Mills v. State, 278 Ala. 188, 176 So. 2d 884 (1965).

[131] 384 U.S. at 220.

[132] For a critical analysis of balancing, compare Frantz, First Amendment in the Balance, 71 YALE L. J. 1424 (1962), with Mendelson, First Amendment and the Judicial Process: A Reply to Mr. Frantz, 17 VAND. L. REV. 479 (1964).

[133] 371 U.S. 415 (1963).

[134] Chs. 31, 32, 33, 35 and 36 Va. Acts of Assembly (1956), amending VA. CODE 1950, §§ 54–74, 54–78, 54–79 (Repl. Vol. 1958).

"In the context of N.A.A.C.P. objectives, litigation is not a technique of resolving private differences; it is a means fo achieving the lawful objectives of equality of treatment by all government . . . for the members of the Negro community in this country. It is thus a form of political expression." [136]

The Court then considered the degree of inhibition caused by the statute and found that legislation:

"Broadly curtailing group activity leading to litigation may easily become a weapon of oppression, however even-handed its term appear. Its mere existence could well freeze out of existence all such activity on behalf of the civil rights of Negro citizens." [137]

Against these two criteria the Court balanced the importance of the state's purpose in passing the legislation. It noted that the purpose was "to insure high professional standards" [138] and that "for a lawyer to reap gain by urging another to engage in private litigation has also been condemned." [139] The Court concluded:

"That although the petitioner has amply shown that its activities fall within the First Amendment's protections, the State has failed to advance any substantial regulatory interest, in the form of substantive evils flowing from petitioner's activities, which can justify the broad prohibitions it has imposed." [140]

The imprecision of the balancing method was highlighted by Justice Harlan's dissent, in which Justices Clark and Stewart joined. They also balanced the competing interests, but found that the state's purposes were substantial enough to justify the statute.[141] Thus, the case demonstrates both the ability of the balancing test to accommodate old common-law concepts to present day needs, and the pitfalls inherent in using an imprecise, flexible standard to accomplish this result.

A third test is used by the Court where expression takes the form of conduct, and the conduct, rather than the expression, is prohibited. When a regulation aimed at traffic control, for example, incidentally interferes with expression, it will be upheld on a mere showing that it is a permissible exercise of the police power.[142] As the Court has observed,

"[t]he authority of a municipality to impose regulations in order to assure the safety and convenience of the people in the use of public highways has never been regarded as inconsistent with civil liberties but rather as one of the means of safeguarding the good order upon which they ultimately depend." [143]

An example of this principle of regulating conduct is United States v. O'Brien,[144] where the defendant was convicted of burning his draft card as a general protest against the Selective Service System and the Vietnam war. Assuming arguendo that the act of burning a draft card was symbolic expression, the Supreme Court stated:

> "This Court has held that when 'speech' and 'nonspeech' elements are combined in the same course of conduct, a sufficiently important governmental interest in regulating the non-speech element can justify incidental limitations on First Amendment freedoms. . . . [W]e think it clear that a government regulation is sufficiently justified if it is within the constitutional power of the Government; if it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest." [145]

---

[135] See 4 W. BLACKSTONE, COMMENTARIE 134-36.

[136] 371 U.S. at 429.

[137] Id. at 436.

[138] Id. at 438-39.

[139] Id. at 441.

[140] Id. at 444.

[141] Id. at 455-65.

[142] See, e.g., Adderley v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39 (1966); Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536, 554-56 (1965); Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569, 574-75 (1941).

[143] Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569, 574 (1941).

[144] 391 U.S. 367 (1968).

[145] Id. at 376-77 (citations omitted).

Justice Harlan, in a concurring opinion, added an important caveat:

> "I wish to make explicit my understanding that this passage [quoted above] does not foreclose consideration of First Amendment claims in those rare instances where an 'incidental' restriction upon expression, imposed by a regulation which furthers an 'important or substantial' governmental interest and satisfies the Court's other criteria, in practice has the effect of entirely preventing a 'speaker' from reaching a significant audience with whom he could not otherwise lawfully communicate. This is not such a case, since O'Brien manifestly could have conveyed his message in many other ways than by burning his draft card." [146]

Justice Harlan's statement would seem to be applicable to the entire field of "speech plus action" activities. If the result even of traffic regulations is to deny an individual any right to express himself, it would seem necessary that they be subjected to a more stringent standard of justification to be constitutionally acceptable.

In addition to these three tests, the doctrine of overbreadth has been developed as a standard which, while not amounting to a substantive test of permissible activity, nevertheless requires that the legislature not choose an unconstitutionally broad method of eliminating an evil it might have the power to eliminate by a more narrowly drawn statute:

"Broad prophylactic rules in the area of free expression are suspect. Precision of regulation must be the touchstone in an area so closely touching our most precious freedoms.[147]

"The Supreme Court has stated the rule in fairly explicit terms:

> " '[E]ven though the governmental purpose be legitimate and substantial, that purpose cannot be pursued by means that broadly stifle fundamental personal liberties when the end can be more narrowly achieved. The breadth of legislative abridgement must be viewed in the light of less drastic means for achieving the same basic purpose.' " [148]

The application of the foregoing tests and standards to the gathering of information, or to other essential press activities, can be illustrated by a hypothetical case of a newspaper reporter wishing to gain access to the deliberations of a government budgetary committee that meets regularly in city hall. If it were made a crime to gather information on the committee's decisions and deliberations by any means whatsoever (such as by interviewing committee members after meetings), a direct curtailment of the right to gather information would be involved, and something akin to "clear and present danger' would be required to uphold the statute.[149] If the committee merely held closed door meetings, the right to gather information would be seriously inhibited, rather than prohibited, and the balancing test would apply.[150] Closing the meetings to all persons because city hall had been put under quarantine to confine a smallpox epidemic would be a regulation of the media representatives in their capacities as private citizens; it would only incidentally restrict information, and it would be justified by a showing of governmental justification to quarantine buildings under the police power.[151] In all three situations the doctrine of overbreadth would invalidate any governmental regulation that accomplished a lawful goal in a manner that unnecessarily interfered with protected activities.[152]

The holding of a closed meeting under ordinary circumstances cannot be viewed as the incidental regulation of media representatives as private citizens, since normally the only purpose of holding such meetings is to maintain secrecy, thus inhibiting the right to gather new information. The balancing test will therefore be appropriate in the vast majority of cases, and the most problematic issue under that test is whether the governmental interest in curtailing press activity outweighs the right of the press to obtain information. Cases involving the national security are one area where governmental interests will often prevail, though they should not do so automatically, but rather only if a particular restraint is essential to protecting that security.

---

[146] Id. at 388–89 (concurring opinion).
[147] NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 438 (1963).
[148] Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479, 488 (1960) (footnotes omitted).
[149] See text accompanying notes 123–41 supra.
[150] See text accompanying notes 132–41 supra.
[151] See text accompanying notes 142–46 supra.
[152] See text accompanying notes 147–48 supra.

There are practical limits to press freedom as well. For example, where a courtroom is not large enough to accommodate all the reporters who wish to attend a trial, the state must obviously be allowed to adopt reasonable, nonarbitrary criteria for limiting the number that will attend. Preference could legitimately be given to such large organizations as the Associated Press, on the ground that their presence will result in a wider dissemination of news. The rules in such cases, as well as their underlying justification, are naturally very much like those already in existence for the broadcast media, which must use scarce airwaves.[153] In all cases where press freedom is curtailed, however, the burden must be on the state to justify its acts, lest the press' constitutional rights be vitiated by insupportable burdens of proof.[154]

The foregoing general discussion has suggested several factual situations in which a member of the press might claim a constitutional right, such as the right to governmental confidences and the right to foreign travel. It will be useful to conclude with a more extended analysis of the principles developed as applied to a specific case.

C. The Journalist's Testimonial Privilege

One of the more common occasions on which the right to gather informations has been invoked, even though it is not directly restrained, occurs when a reporter is called upon to disclose sources of information, or to testify in closed hearings. Earl Caldwell,[155] for example, was able to overcome the suspicion of Black Panther Party officials, view the organization first hand, and give readers of the New York Times a unique opportunity to understand the Panthers' political ideas, but when he was subpoenaed to testify, in closed session, before a grand jury investigating the Party, its leaders told him that if he were even to go into the hearing room he would forfeit his confidential relationship with the Party.

Another recent case shows a different aspect of the problems raised by a reporter's privilege. During the murder trial of Charles Manson, the state introduced evidence that the crime was committed at about 12:30 A.M. A newspaper report quoted an unidentified witness has having heard a shot and screams at 2:00 A.M., but the reporter refused to divulge her source on the ground that that she had guaranteed anonymity in return for the story.[156]

These two examples suggest that there may be a substantial conflict between the constitutional right to gather information and the state's need for testimony. Clearly the reporter in either of the above cases would be inhibited in his future ability to gather information if he were forced to testify. Walter Cronkite has observed:

> "In doing my work, I . . . depend constantly on information, ideas, leads and opinions received in confidence. Such material is essential in digging out newsworthy facts and equally important, in assessing the importance and analyzing the significance of public events. Without such materials, I would be able to do little more than broadcast press releases and public statements." [157]

On the other hand, testimonial privileges hinder the ascertainment of truth and, according to Wigmore, have a deleterious effect on the administration of justice:

> "The vital process of justice must continue unceasingly. A single cessation typifies the prostration of society. A series would involve its dissolution." [158]

---

[153] See text accompanying notes 115–17 supra.

[154] In Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513 (1958), for example, the Supreme Court held unconstitutional a California practice of denying war veterans' tax benefits to men who refused to sign a loyalty oath. Noting that the procedure placed a burden on the men to prove themselves not subversive, the Court held:

"Where the transcendent value of speech is involved, due process certainly requires in the circumstances of this case that the State bear the burden of persuasion to show that the appellants engaged in criminal speech. . . .

". . . [W]here particular speech falls close to the line separating the lawful and the unlawful, the possibility of mistaken factfinding—inherent in all litigation—will create the danger that the legitimate utterance will be penalized. The man who knows he must bring forth proof and persuade another of the lawfulness of his conduct necessarily must steer far wider of the unlawful zone than if the State must bear these burdens." Id. at 526 (citation omitted).

[155] See Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 1081 (9th Cir. 1970), cert. granted, 39 U.S.L.W. 3478 (U.S. May 4, 1971) (No. 1114). See also note 120 supra.

[156] NEWSWEEK, August 31, 1970, at 66.

[157] Brief for Appellant at 20. Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 1081 (9th Cir. 1970), cert. granted, 39 U.S.L.W. 3478 (U.S. May 4, 1971) No. 1114).

[158] 8 J. WIGMORE, supra note 11, § 2192, at 73.

Since both these interests are substantial, the problem of the reportorial privilege offers an excellent opportunity to test the workability of the broader right to gather information. As the law now stands, the position of a journalist claiming that right it not secure. There is no common-law testimonial privilege, either qualified or absolute, for newsmen.[159] They must respond to compulsory process exactly as any other citizen,[160] and when testifying they must answer all inquiries put to them, unless the court rules otherwise on generally applicable rules of evidence, investigation, or discovery.[161] For example, a journalist can be compelled to submit to discovery and to answer questions under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure if he has information "relevant to the subject matter involved in the pending action." [162] The only means of avoiding compulsory deposition is to apply to the court under rule 30(b) for a protective order limiting the discovery proceedings; the issuance of such orders is discretionary, and applications for them are not often granted. In Garland v. Torre,[163] for example, the Second Circuit held that a finding that the deposition was "a necessary step in the due and proper preparation for trial" [164] was a sufficient reason to deny a newspaper reporter a protective order as long as the purpose (as distinguished from the result) of the deposition process was not to oppress the witness.

The common law protects the journalist even less in the area of investigations by a grand jury or a legislative committee. As long as the investigating body is functioning within its jurisdiction, it may force him to answer any questions relevant to its inquiry.[165] The Supreme Court has held that even a valid fear for one's life will not justify a refusal to answer grand jury questions.[166] Refusal to answer constitutes contempt of court,[167] and many newsmen have elected the penalty for that offense in preference to the revealing of confidences.[168]

Sixteen states [169] have felt a need to ameliorate this situation and have passed statutes granting newsmen some form of testimonial privilege, ranging from absolute immunity to an extremely qualified privilege. Most of the statutes protect only the journalist's confidential sources of information, however, not the information itself. In twelve states[170] a reporter would be privileged not to reveal the name of a potential witness in a murder case;[171] in only three[172] would a reporter covering the Black Panthers be able to claim a privilege from revealing confidential information, and in none could he avoid being forced to attend a secret grand jury hearing.[173]

---

[159] See Subcomm. on Admin. Prac. and Proc., Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 89th Cong., 2b Sess., The Newsman's Privilege (Comm. Print 1966) for an excellent collection of cases. The only American case in which a newsman's testimonial privilege has ben held to exist is In re Nat Caldwell, reported in N.Y. Law Revision Comm., Report on Newsman's Privilege Bill 63 (Legis. doc. 65(A) 1949). In that case, the Anderson County, Tennessee court made the following observation dismissing an action against Caldwell for refusing to testify before a grand jury:

"The press must get its information through others, of necessity much is given in confidence, and I am unable to hold the witness in contempt in this matter. It's true it is hard to have serious charges made against a public official on hearsay evidence but at times much good has been done this way. It puts us all on guard, and to ask ourselves: 'Lord is it I?' "

[160] 8 J. Wigmore, supra note 11, § 2286, at 528–30.

[161] Id. at 529.

[162] Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b).

[163] 259 F.2d 545 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910 (1958).

[164] 259 F.2d at 551. The court also noted that the information sought "went to the heart of the plaintiff's claim." Id. at 550.

[165] See Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Comm., 372 U.S. 539, 557–58 (1963); United States v. Bryan, 339 U.S. 323, 331 (1950); Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273 (1919); Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 65 (1906).

[166] Peimonte v. United States, 367 U.S. 556, 559 n.2 (1961).

[167] See, e.g., Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910 (1958); People ex rel. Mooney v. Sheriff of N.Y. County, 269 N.Y. 291, 199 N.E. 415 (1936); Ex parte Lawrence, 116 Cal. 298, 48 P. 124 (1897).

[168] In fact, very few newsmen have elected to comply with the law and reveal their sources. Of course, a prime reason for this has been the reluctance of the courts to hand out stiff penalties for failure to testify. In Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910 (1958), for example, the penalty was 10 days. See also Subcomm. on Admin. Prac. and Proc., Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 89th Cong., 2d Sess., The Newsman's Privilege (Comm. Print 1966).

[169] Ala. Code tit. 7, § 370 (1960); Alaska Stat. §§ 09.25.150–.220 (Supp. 1970); Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 12–2237 (Supp. 1970); Ark. Stat. Ann. § 43–917 (1964); Cal. Evid. Code § 10170 (West 1966); Ind. Ann. Stat. § 2–1733 (1968); Ky. Rev. Stat. § 421.100 (1969); La. Rev. Stat. tit. 45, §§ 1451–53 (Supp. 1971); Md. Code Ann. art. 35, § 2 (1965); Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. § 767.5a (1968); Mont. Rev. Code §§ 93–601–1 to 93–601–2 (1964); N.J. Stat. Ann. §§ 2A–84A–21, 2A–84A–29 (Supp. 1970); N.M. Stat. Ann. § 20–1–12.1 (Supp. 1970); N.Y. Civil Rights Law § 79-h (McKinney 1970); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. §§ 2739.04, 2739.12 (1966); Pa. Stat. Ann. tit. 28, § 330 (Supp. 1970).

Judge-made and statutory law thus provide only limited protection for newsmen subjected to compulsory process, and the ability of the information media to gather new information is hindered as a result. In the framework of a recognized constitutional right to gather information, the journalist's protection would much more accurately reflect his and society's needs.

The analysis of the reportorial privilege in light of the constitutional freedom of the press begins with the recognition that newsmen serve the media included in the proposed constitutional protection for the gathering of new information,[174] and while performing that function they are therefore afforded some protection by the freedom of the press clause. It is then necessary to ascertain which test must be applied to determine the scope of the protection. Since the subpoenaing of newsmen is not a direct prohibition of information gathering, the "clear and present danger" test does not apply.[175] Nor is compulsory testimony a form of conduct that is subjected to incidental police regulation.[176] Forced testimony restrains the gathering of information indirectly, however, and therefore the balancing test must be applied.[177] For analytical purposes it can be assumed that the effect of compelling testimony on information gathering will remain constant in different legal contexts, though in reality it will vary in individual cases and will be weighed against the state's need for the testimony. The problematic variable is the state interest to be balanced against the right to gather information.

Discrete testimonial problems usually arise in four legal contexts: general investigations, such as by a grand jury or a legislative committee; criminal trials; civil litigation between third parties; and civil litigation where a member of the news media is a party, most often a libel case.

In the context of a general investigation, there is usually no immediate threat to either the safety of the community or individual liberty, and unless the failure to testify does pose a serious threat, journalists should receive an almost absolute privilege from testifying when they can show that their information gathering is likely to be inhibited. When a newsman is forced to testify under this standard, the doctrine of overbreadth will require that the inquiry be directly relevant to the danger.[178]

Criminal trials, when a newsman is called by the defense, present the most appealing case for mandatory testimony. The Supreme Court in Estes v. Texas[179] applied the principle that "[t]he life or liberty of any individual in this land should not be put in jeopardy because of the actions of any news media,"[180] and this principle seems applicable when a journalist fails to disclose the name of a source that might exonerate an accused. This concealment may also conflict with a defendant's sixth amendment right "to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor," which the Court in Washington v. Texas[181] held to include the right to have a witness testify despite certain state "procedural statutes."[182] There is a problem in that the Court was careful to limit Washington to the particular state statute before it,[183] saying in a footnote:

---

[170] Alabama, Arizona, California, Indiana, Kentucky, Maryland, Michigan, Montana, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, cited note 169 supra.

[171] See text accompanying note 156 supra.

[172] Michigan, Pennsylvania, and New York, cited note 169 supra. The Pennsylvania statute by its terms protects only the "source," but it has been judicially construed to protect the information as well. Taylor & Selby Appeals, 412 Pa. 32, 40, 193 A.2d 181, 184–85 (1963).

[173] See text accompanying note 155 supra.

[174] See text accompanying notes 103–20 supra.

[175] See text accompanying notes 123–31 supra.

[176] See text accompanying notes 142–46 supra.

[177] See text accompanying notes 132–41 supra.

[178] See text accompanying notes 147–48 supra.

[179] 381 U.S. 532 (1965). See text accompanying notes 65–67, 70–75 supra.

[180] 381 U.S. at 540.

[181] 388 U.S. 14 (1967).

[182] Id. at 15. The "procedural statutes" provided that "[p]ersons charged as principals, accomplices or accessories . . . cannot be introduced as witnesses for one another. . ." Id. at 16–17 n.4.

> "Nothing in this opinion should be construed as disapproving testimonial privileges, such as the privilege against self-incrimination or the lawyer-client or husband-wife privileges, which are based on entirely different considerations from those underlying the common-law disqualifications for interest." [184]

From this it would be logical to conclude that if the Court recognized the press' constitutional right not to disclose confidential sources of information, it would not require that right to yield to the defendant's desire to summon witnesses. The reporter's privilege is distinguishable from the privileges mentioned in the Court's footnote above, however, in that it is not a privilege that protects important individual or personal interests. Unlike the right against self-incrimination, or the attorney-client or husband-wife privileges, the press privilege exists largely to further the community's need for information.[185] Despite the importance of that interest it should yield when the community also seeks to prosecute a man, and his defense is blocked by the reportorial privilege.

When the prosecution seeks to discover a reporter's confidential sources, the fifth and sixth amendment rights of defendants are not at stake, and there is no more state interest sufficient to override the newsman's privilege than there is for any other privilege.

In the context of civil litigation between third parties, there is a strong state interest in compelling a reporter to tesify where his testimony is essential and relevant to the dispute. As Wigmore points out, civil litigation is crucial to the order of society, since, at its best, it demonstrates that violence is not necessary to redress private wrongs.[186] The balancing process will naturally weigh the degree of restraint on information gathering; and the overbreadth doctrine should narrow the otherwise broad limits of pretrial discovery to what is essential to a party's case.

The newsman's right not to testify is least appealing in a libel action against a member of the media, where it will usually be invoked in an attempt to remove the burden of proving a defense.[187] It would obviously be unsatisfactory to allow a defendant to attempt to prove the defense of truth, for example, by testifying to undisclosed confidential information, which his adversary would be foreclosed from attacking by the defendant's claim of privilege.[188] Such testimony would contain all the worst sins of hearsay,[189] and would tempt a member of the media to defeat any libel action by falsely testifying that he has confidential information. If the member of the news media must protect its sources, it can admit the libel and join issue only on the measure of damages. A more difficult problem occurs when the journalist pleads that an admittedly false defamatory statement was not caused by malice, in order to negative either punitive damages, in the case of a private individual,[190] or the entire libel action itself, in the case of a public figure.[191] The most reasonable solution is to force the defendant to waive its constitutional privilege if it attempts to introduce testimony to rebut malice and then refuses to elaborate on cross-examination by claiming an interference with future news gathering.[192]

The foregoing analysis of the right to gather information applied in the particular context of a reporter's testimony reflects the tension between societal interests that any court must contend with in specific cases. Though an absolute reportorial privilege would no doubt maximize the flow of information, it would frustrate other individual and community rights in the process, and therefore a proper balance among these needs must be struck.

---

[183] See note 182 supra.

[184] 388 U.S. at 23 n.21.

[185] See text accompanying notes 34–36 supra; A. MEIKLEJOHN, FREE SPEECH AND ITS RELATION TO SELF-GOVERNMENT 88–89, 94 (1948).

[186] 8. J. WIGMORE, supra note 11, § 2192(2) at 72–73.

[187] The plaintiff's case-in-chief, which consists only of establishing publication, defamatory meaning, and actionable character, W. PROSSER, HANDBOOK OF THE LAW OF TORTS 795 (3d ed. 1964), is not likely to require a defendant to reveal confidences, unless he wishes to show malice. See text accompanying notes 190–91 infra.

[188] The defendant has the affirmative burden of proving truth in a libel case. Id. at 823–26.

[189] See 5 J. WIGMORE, EVIDENCE § 1362, at 3–7 (3d ed. 1940).

[190] Id. at 826–28.

[191] Greenbelt Cooperative Publishing Ass'n v. Bresler, 398 U.S. 6 (1970); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 283 (1964).

[192] This was the approach of the New Jersey Supreme Court in a case decided under a state statute protecting newsmen from revealing confidential sources of information. Brogan v. Passaic Daily News, 22 N.J. 139, 152, 123 A.2d 473, 480 (1956).

CONCLUSION

Throughout the course of first amendment adjudication, the Supreme Court has tended to view freedom of the press as a particularized instance of freedom of speech.[193] It has thus confined its holdings in this area to the protection of freedom of expression. The news media's most important function in contemporary society, however, is to serve as a conduit of information. Freedom of the press should therefore be expanded to include protection for essential and unique functions of the information media, especially the gathering of information. To outline the protected areas, the Court's tests for freedom of expression can logically be carried over to their analogous situations within the area of press functions.

[From the California Law Review; Vol 58: 1198 (1970)]

THE NEWSMAN'S PRIVILEGE: GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATIONS, CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS, AND PRIVATE LITIGATION

(By Margaret Sherwood)

The recent widespread use of governmental and defense subpoenas for newsmen's testimony and films has posed a grave threat to the ability of the press to gather and disseminate the news. This Comment explores the need for a newsman's privilege and the legal precedent upon which such a privilege would be based. The possible scope of the privilege is examined in connection with governmental and defense subpoenas and court orders in private litigation.

Legal commentators and appellate courts have long debated the advisability of a newsman's privilege. Most of these discussions bear only limited relevance to the contemporary problem of defining the press's role in litigation and governmental investigation, for the issue in the past has been the duty of the newsman to reveal the source of his information. Today newsmen are more often asked to reveal the contents of that information. Furthermore, a new question is now before the courts: the duty of the news media to produce their films in compliance with subpoenas duces tecum. Finally, whereas subpoenas or court orders were traditionally employed, usually by private litigants, to elicit particular pieces of information aimed toward the disposition of specific questions, subpoenas are now being used by federal, state and local governments as aids to large-scale investigatory and prosecutorial activities.[1] These subpoenas, employing the shotgun approach,[2] are often aimed at eliciting everything the newsman may know or all the films he may have concerning the subject matter or persons under investigation. Conversely, because of the rash of recent prosecutions for loosely defined crimes arising from political protect activity, the press has been serve dwith an equal number of broadly worded subpoenas from numerouss defendants.[3] Because the subject matter under investigation or the alleged offense is often extremely broad and ill defined, the information sought from the newsman may be correspondingly unlimited.

Today an analysis of the newsman's privilege without a careful examination of its factual context is no longer sufficient. To ignore the impact of the aggregate of subpoenas and court orders is to fail to perceive the problem altogether. When newsmen were called upon only occasionally to testify, the courts could dismiss any impairment to freedom of the press as slight or as "some limitation"[4] on the availability of news. Today, the impairment and the corresponding limitation upon the availability of news is increasing.

---

[193] See text accompanying notes 14–33 supra.

[1] See note 17 infra and accompanying text.

[2] The subpoena issued in one recent case, for example, called for production of notes and tape recordings of interviews with "officers and spokesmen for the Black Panther Party," covering a period of over a year. In re Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970), aff'd in part and rev'd in part, No. 26,025, (9th Cir. Nov. 18, 1970) [39 U.S.L.W. 2281], petition for cert. filed 39 U.S.L.W. 3273 (U.S. Dec. 6, 1970) (No. 1114). See text accompanying notes 46–77 infra. In another instance, Newsweek received a subpoena duces tecum from a federal grand jury, directing it to appear through a member or agent and to produce "all photographs of and interviews with members of Students for a Democratic Society taken during the period October 4 through October 13, 1969." Brief for Newsweek as Amicus Curiae at 2, In re Caldwell, supra [hereinafter cited as Brief for Newsweek].

[3] See note 21 infra.

The United States Supreme Court has never ruled on the question of newsman's privilege.[5] Such a ruling is needed; the series of recent subpoenas and court orders necessitates formulation of guidelines to protect not only the rights of those directly involved, but more important, society's interest in a free and vigorous press. For when numerous subpoenas are issued by an administration avowedly and openly hostile to the news media,[6] the possibility arises that putting a gag on the press may be as much an objective as eliciting information from it.[7]

This Comment explores the issue of newsman's privilege. Part I sets forth the factual context in which the issue arises, focusing on the recent case of In re Caldwell.[8] Part II discusses the privilege cases decided to date, evaluating the factual and analytical conceptions on which various courts have relied. Part III suggests a theory for the constitutional protection of the interests asserted by the newsman, examining Supreme Court decisions dealing with these interests in other contexts. Part IV analyzes the form and scope the privilege should take.

I. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

A. The press and legal compulsion past and present

The problem of the newsman's privilege is not a new one. Newsmen have been asked to divulge their information in the past. However, until recently only a relative handful of cases arose in which the issue of the privilege was raised,[9] and only a few of these cases involved governmental subpoena.[10]

---

[4] The Supreme Court of Hawaii, considering the privilege issue in 1961, brushed aside the impairment:

> We will assume, for the purposes of this case, that the forced disclosure of a reporter's confidential source of information may, to some extent, constitute an impairment of freedom of the press. We nevertheless conclude . . . that such an impairment may not be considered of a degree sufficient to outweigh the necessity of maintaining the court's fundamental authority to compel the attendance of witnesses. . . .

In re Goodfader, 45 Hawaii 317, 329, 367 P.2d 472, 480 (1961). Three years earlier, in 1958, the Second Circuit had described the impairmant in a similar manner: "[C]ompulsory disclosure of a journalist's confidential sources of information may entail an abridgment of press freedom by imposing some limitation upon the availability of news." Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545, 548 (2d Cir. 1958), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910 (1958) (emphasis added).

[5] The Court has denied certiorari three times. State v. Buchanan, 392 U.S. 905, denying cert. to 250 Ore. 224, 436 P.2d 729 (1968); Murphy v. Colorado, 365 U.S. 843 (1961) (state court proceedings unreported); Garland v. Torre, 358 U.S. 910 (1958), denying cert. to 259 F.2d 545 (2d Cir. 1958).

[6] See, e.g., N.Y. Times, Nov. 21, 1969 at 22, col. 1; id. Nov. 14, 1969 at 24, col. 1.

[7] In In re Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970), an affidavit submitted to the district court by one of the government attorneys explained, or perhaps complained, that "leaders and spokesmen of the Black Panther Party and their associates reportedly make full use of coverage by the press and the facilities of commercial and educational radio and television to disseminate their messages to a wide audience." Affidavit of Francis L. Williamson, attached to the Government's Memorandum in Opposition to Motion to Quash Grand Jury Subpoenas at 4 [the memorandum is hereinafter cited as Opposition Memo]. The government in its Second Supplement to Memorandum in Opposition to Motion to Quash Grand Jury Subpoenas explained at greater length:

> The Black Panthers, a small violence-prone group of persons . . . , has gained nation-wide and world-wide prominence through the published utterances of their spokesmen.
>
> . . . [P]ublished utterances of spokesmen of the Black Panther Party, when disseminated in their official publication, reach only a relatively small audience. However, when disseminated in the mass media, such as Newsweek, Time Magazine, the New Pork Times, and CBS, the statements reach a vastly more numerous audience.

Id. at 1–2.

[8] 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970), aff'd in part and rev'd in part, No. 26,025 (9th Cir. Nov. 18, 1970) [39 U.S.L.W. 2281), petition for cert. filed 39 U.S.L.W. 3273 (U.S. Dec. 6, 1970) (No. 1114).

[9] There were 17 reported cases betwen 1911 and 1968: Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545 (2d Cir. 1958), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910 (1958); In re Cepeda, 233 F. Supp. 465 (S.D.N.Y. 1964); Deltec, Inc. v. Dun & Bradstreet, Inc., 187 F. Supp. 788 (N.D. Ohio 1960); Rosenberg v. Carroll, 99 F. Supp. 629 (S.D.N.Y. 1951); Brewster v. Boston Herald-Traveler Corp., 20 F.R.D. 416 (D. Mass. 1957); In re Howard, 136 Cal. App. 2d 816, 289 P.2d 537 (3d Dist. 1955); Clein v. State, 52 So. 2d 117 (Fla. 1950); Plunkett v. Hamilton, 136 Ga. 72, 70 S.E. 781 (1911); In re Goodfader, 45 Hawaii 317, 367 P.2d 472 (1961); In re Wayne, 4 Hawaii 475 (U.S.D.C. 1914); Beecroft v. Point Pleas-

While the reason for this paucity is unclear, one can conjecture several explanations. In the first place, since most courts imposed only minimal penalties on recalcitrant newsmen,[11] a newsman adjudged in contempt may not bother to demand a hearing; hence, many incidents may have gone unreported. Second, and perhaps more important, while private litigants or criminal defendants would rarely hesitate trying to force information from a reluctant newsman, both local and federal government must maintain a working relation with the press. Consequently, government traditionally turned to the press only as a last resort.[12] In the past when government found it necessary to resort to the press, it usually entered into negotiations with the party from whom the information was sought in order to reach "a compromise acceptable to both parties." [13] Conversely, newsmen, and especially those employed by local newspapers, radio and television stations which do not have the power or prestige of the national press media, often complied with requests for information, even without the issuance of a subpoena, and sometimes still do.[14]

The various representatives of the press are not usually willing to discuss how often they have cooperated with government requests, with or without the legal compulsion of a subpoena.[15] Thus, the frequency and scope of past governmental requests for a newsmen's information, and the press's response thereto, is unclear. However, whatever the situation in the past, it is clear that both federal and local governments are now making frequent demands for wholesale disclosure of information and films, and at least the national press is not uniformly complying.[16] There have been dozens, and probably hundreds of such subpoenas in the last two years, most of which were issued in connection with investigations or prosecutions of dissident political groups.[17] The reasons for this sudden rash of subpoenas are only partially apparent. Government agencies issue subpoenas because a subpoena is necessary to insure that the newsman or his films appear in court or in front of the grand jury or legislative investigating committee.[18] The question is why, for the first time, is ant Print. & Pub. Co., 82 N.J. Super. 269, 197 A.2d 416 (1964); Brogan v. Passaic Daily News, 22 N.J. 139, 123 A.2d 473 (1956); State v. Donovan, 130 N.J.L. 130, 30 A.2d 421 (1943); In re Grunow, 84 N.J.L. 235, 85 A. 1011 (1913); People ex rel. Mooney v. Sheriff, 269 N.Y. 291, 199 N.E. 415 (1936); State v. Buchanan, 250 Ore. 244, 436 P.2d 729, cert. denied, 392 U.S. 905 (1968); In re Taylor, 412 Pa. 32, 193 A.2d 181 (1963).

---

[10] Clein v. State, 52 So.2d 117 (Fla. 1950); Plunkett v. Hamilton, 136 Ga. 72, 70 S.E. 781 (1911); In re Grunow, 84 N.J.L. 235, 85 A. 1011 (1913); People ex rel. Mooney v. Sheriff, 269 N.Y. 291, 199 N.E. 415 (1936); State v. Buchanan, 250 Ore. 244, 436 P.2d 729 (1968); In re Taylor, 412 Pa. 32, 193 A.2d 181 (1963).

[11] In State v. Buchanan, 250 Ore. 244, 436, P.2d 729 (1968), for example, the editor of a university newspaper who had refused to reveal the names of seven drug users whom she had previously interviewed was fined 300 dollars. An association of newspaper publishers and editors paid the fine. See N.Y. Times, June 29, 1966, at 23, col. 1. Fines are almost always paid by the newsman's employer, who may be able to deduct the relatively small amount as a cost of doing business. The newsman himself, however, will have to serve any jail sentence. Sentences have been as long as ten days. See, e.g., Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545 (2d Cir. 1958).

[12] Interview with Tom Reddin, former Chief of Police of Los Angeles, California, in Los Angeles, California, July 23, 1970. Mr. Reddin explained that city officials usually had other sources of information and rarely found it necessary to turn to the press. When it was necessary, they did so only with the greatest reluctance.

[13] Statement of Attorney General John N. Mitchell, Feb. 5, 1970, N.Y. Times, Feb. 6, 1970, at 40, col. 4.

[14] Two sources were willing to admit and discuss this fact. One is legal counsel for a large and nationally prestigious newspaper. The other is a member of a law firm that represents a smaller publication, part of a large chain of newspapers. Both sources were emphatic that neither their names nor the name of their client papers were to be used. Most press representatives will not even discuss this topic on a confidential basis. See note 15 infra.

[15] On three separate occasions, editors asked by this writer to discuss cooperation given by their newspapers to government agencies flatly refused and when pressed, terminated the conversation.

[16] See note 45 infra.

[17] The number of recent subpoenas is virtually impossible to document or even estimate accurately. The subpoenas have been issued by numerous different governmental agencies to numerous press organizations in various parts of the country, and there is no central file available containing all the subpoenas. Compiling a complete list would involve polling every court or press organization in the country. A partial list, documenting the issuance of several dozen subpoenas, is on file with the California Law Review.

[18] The formality of a subpoena is at times apparently dispensed with. According to her attorney, a newswoman recently forced to appear in a San Francisco murder trial received before her first appearance only a post card from the District Attorney's Office instructing her to be in court on a certain date. A subpoena was, however, issued for her second appearance.

government finding it necessary to use the newsman's testimony or films in these proceedings so often? Several answers are possible. First, government for the first time since the labor disturbances of the 1930's is facing large scale social turmoil, and in its haste to restore order is trying to gather evdience from any available source.[19] Second, the advent of subpoenas duces tecum issued for newsmen's film results from the fact that television coverage is a relatively recent phenomenon, and the cameraman's film is the most graphic—if not always the most accurate—record of what actually occured. Third, in many cases the press itself is apparently no longer complying with discreet pre-subpoena governmental requests for information and films.[20] The press's reasons for noncompliance at the pre-subpoena stage are, again, a matter of conjecture. A press that has been the subject of hostile verbal abuse from the current Administration may be hesitant to cooperate in any way with the Federal Government. Furthermore, the press, because of the current social disorder, may be bombarded with pre-subpoena requests, and hence may believe some sort of stand is necessary. Moreover, the press may fear that if compliance results in any useful disclosures, federal and local government agencies will then not hestiate to subpoena the newsman or his films and force him to make a public appearance in court. Finally, the pressure on the press has been compounded by the increased demand for films by criminal defendants,[21] who may be either the protestors or police officers themselves under indictment for violation of federal civil rights statutes.[22]

Thus, although newsmen have always faced demands for disclosure of information, the problem today is of a different magnitude. Since government traditionally used restraint in the issuance of subpoenas, and since any demands government did make were met, on the whole, with quiet and inconspicuous compliance (or resistance), usually at the pre-subpoena stage, the public became aware of the pressure on newsmen only on those infrequent and usually non-political occasions when the newsman showed up in court. On those occasions, the newsman usually took the contempt citation in order to uphold the ethics of his profession [23] and accepted fine or imprisonment rather than disclose his source.[24] Thus the public might rely on the newsman's integrity, unaware that the newsman did at times indeed turn over at least some of his information. With the recent rash of subpoenas and court orders, and the newsman or his films regularly showing up in court, the public can no longer remain unaware of the pressure to which the press is subjected or of the likelihood that any given newsman may be forced to reveal his information and sources.

---

[19] The Southern states were, of course, faced with large scale civil rights demonstrations in the late '50's and early '60's. The national press gave these demonstrations great coverage and obtained numerous interviews with the leaders of the movement. The Southern states instigated frequent prosecutions against both the leaders of and the participants in the demonstrations. See, e.g., Shuttlesworth v. City of Birmingham, 394 U.S. 147 (1969); Adderly v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39 (1966); Brown v. Louisiana, 383 U.S. 131 (1966); Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 (1965). These states, however, apparently never attempted to subpoena any of the national press media. Had these states issued any subpoenas, the national press media, hostile to the segregationalist position of Southern officials, would almost certainly have resisted the subpoenas and appealed any contempt citations. There are no recorded cases of any such incidents.

[20] For example, in In re Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970), the FBI made six separate attempts to question the newsman involved. Affidavit of Raymond N. Byers (Special Agent of the Fedeal Bureau of Investigation), attached to the Government's Second Supplement to Memorandum In Opposition to Motion to Quash Grand Jury Subpoenas at 1.

[21] Newspaper counsel and editors are unanimous in stating that defense subpoenas are probably more numerous than governmental ones. The San Francisco Examiner, for example, has received eleven defense subpoenas duces tecum since 1969. A list of these subpoenas is on file with the California Law Review. Individual Examiner reporters may have also received subpoenas ad testificandum, which would not be in the Examiner's records.

The press may find itself subpoenaed by both sides in a criminal case. For example, in one recent trial in which six youths were accused of killing a police officer, Defense Attorney R. J. Engel subpoenaed the San Francisco Examiner for production of its back files. Apparently, an examination of these files turned up nothing of use to the defense because no further action was taken. However, Deputy District Attorney Thomas Norman did subpoena an Examiner newswoman to testify regarding an interview with one of the defendants. The newswoman appeared in court, but refused to answer any questions and was cited for contempt. See S.F. Chronicle, Oct. 20, 1970, at 5, col. 6.

[22] See note 222 infra.

[23] In 1934 the American Newspaper Guild adopted the following as part of the newsman's code of ethics: "[N]ewspapermen shall refuse to reveal confidences or disclose sources of confidential information in court or before other judicial or investigating bodies. . . ." G. BIRD & F. MERWIN, THE NEWSPAPER AND SOCIETY 567 (1942).

[24] In re Wayne, 4 Hawaii 475 (U.S.D.C. 1914), is the only reported case in which a reporter revealed his source. Recently there have been several instances of reporters testifying under compulsion of governmental subpoena. See, e.g., N.Y. Times, June 4, 1969, at 16, col. 3 (New York Times reporter testifying about SDS before House Internal Security Committee).

B. The chilling effect of forced disclosure

The press relies heavily on "confidential," off the record," and "not for attribution" information. In a study taken in 1969[25] 27 out of 32 newspapers surveyed reported publishing stories stemming from confidential information. Newsmen unanimously stress the importance of such information to their work.[26] For example, a noted correspondent explains that in the course of reporting on diplomatic affairs:

> I depend extensively on information which comes to me in confidence from sources whose anonymity must be maintained. Diplomacy is conducted as a private business. In my experience, diplomats detest publicity.[27]

A prominent news commentator agrees on the importance of confidential information:

> I regularly talk with government officials, former officials, military people and a wide spectrum of others who possess special information of expertise on public issues.
>
> A great deal of this talk is of the 'off the record' or 'not for attribution' kind. It is for my own information.[28]

Threat of exposure or disclosure of his confidential information dries up a previously talkative source. The source's motivation in talking to the newsman may be spite, money, a desire to improve his own public image or to justify his official actions, or an altruistic desire to be of public service. But whatever his motivation is it clear that in many cases his main concern is keeping his identity and, in some cases, confidential information secret: were he willing to have either made public, he would have held a public press conference in the first place. Hence, he is willing to talk to a newsman he knows and trusts, but only because he can rely on that reporter's integrity.[29]

Most confidential information comes to newsmen from informants with whom they have had previous dealings.[30] The communications are, in other words, the product of a certain relationship between informant and newsman, the crux of which is the source's confidence in the newsman.[31] The recent rash of subpoenas and the resulting pressure on newsmen has apparently destroyed much of this confidence. Many noted journalists report specific instances of former sources now declining to talk to them, expressly on the grounds of fear of forced disclosure.[32] The newsmen are unanimous in stating that an actual instance of a newsman's disclosure would cost that newsman all his remaining sources.[33]

---

[25] Guest & Stanzler, The Constitutional Argument for Newsmen Concealing Their Sources, 64 Nw. U.L. Rev. 18, 57 (1969).

[26] See text accompanying notes 165–73 infra. The government also relies heavily on confidential information—but in a slightly different way. Government officials are notorious for their 'off-the-record' and 'not for attribution' remarks. This tendency has become so pronounced recently that one news columnist was prompted to write the following tongue-in-cheek account:

> Settling back in his chair the Anonymous High Official breathes heavily, glances around the oblong table, notes the poised pencils and makes his decision: will his information be—on-the-record; off-the-record; half-and-half; background; deep background; very deep background; formula attribution ("usually well-informed sources")—?
>
> . . . .
>
> There's always the question whether it's "on or off"—the record, that is. . . . The Women's National Press Club put on a recent whingding where the Attorney General commented easily about "these stupid bastards who are running our educational institutions," and declared that with campus violence "this country is going so far right you are not even going to recognize it."
>
> A reporter from Women's Wear Daily said she identified herself at the start of the conversation for an interview. . . . What she heard she reported.
>
> A protest exploded instantly from the Department of Justice. Who issued it? "A Justice Department spokesman."

T.R.B. from Washington. The Off-the-Record Administration, S.F. Examiner & Chronicle, Oct. 11, 1970, Sunday Punch, at 3, col. 1.

[27] Affidavit of Marvin Kalb at 1, attached to Brief for CBS as Amicus Curiae. In re Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970) [the brief is hereinafter cited as Brief for CBS].

[28] Affidavit of Eric Sevareid at 1, attached to Brief for CBS.

[29] Walter Cronkite, a well known news analyst, states:

> The material that I obtain in privacy and on a confidential basis is given to me on that basis because my news sources have learned to trust me and can confide in me without fear of exposure. In nearly every case their position, perhaps their very job or career, would be in jeopardy if this were not the case.

Affidavit of Walter Cronkite at 2, attached to Brief for CBS.

[30] Id. at 2. See also Affidavit of Jon Lowell at 1, and Affidavit of Min S. Yee at 2, both attached to Brief for Newsweek.

[31] See, e.g., Affidavit of Walter Cronkite and Affidavit of Eric Sevareid, attached to Brief for CBS.

In the case of dissident minority groups, the importance of the confidential relationship is accentuated. Dissident groups often feel oppressed by the 'establishment.' They therefore distrust outsiders generally and newsmen in particular.[34] Members of these groups refuse to talk freely with any newsman until he as an individual has satisfied them that he is a trustworthy and safe repository of their confidence.[35] When a newsman has gained the dissidents' confidence, their practice is to rely on his judgment and a sense of mutual understanding to determine which, among the disclosures made to him, he may publish, rather than to announce formally that something is "off the record." [36] The drying up of sources due to recent government pressure on the news media has been especially pronounced in the case of these dissident minority groups. Numerous newsmen report, for example, that Black Panther or Students for a Democratic Society sources previously open to them are no longer accessible for interview.[37]

The newsman faces a vexing dilemma. Much information is no longer available to him, and that which is, he may be forced to reveal on pain of fine or imprisonment. If he gives in to the pressure to divulge his information, he faces, at best, the loss of confidence in him by his remaining sources, and at worst, physical retaliation by the source whose information he has revealed.[38]

Newsmen relying on confidential information and relationships are not the only ones in trouble. The situation has become equally untenable for newsmen covering public protest activity. It is common for reporters, photographers and television cameramen to operate amidst race riots, protest demonstrations, strikes, campus confrontations and other events which could later give rise to civil or criminal inquiry. Widespread use of newsmen's testimony and films in legal proceedings has exposed the newsmen covering these events to physical abuse from both police and dissidents. Aware of the possibility of the films or testimony later being used against them, law enforcement officers are in many cases no longer willing to cooperate with newsmen covering the protest activities, and indeed often attempt to prevent coverage altogether.[39] The dissidents have reacted similarly. In recent months, newsmen have been stoned, clubbed and beaten, and it has become commonplace for photographers and cameramen to have their cameras smashed by individuals—and police—accusing them of "working for the other side." [40]

---

[32] See, e.g., Affidavit of Jon Lowell at 2–3, Affidavit of Frank Morgan at 2–3, attached to Brief for Newsweek; Affidavit of Dan Rather at 2, attached to Brief for CBS; Affidavit of Gerald Fraser at 3, attached to Brief for Petitioner, In re Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970) [the brief is hereinafter cited as Brief for Petitioner].

[33] See, e.g., Affidavit of Eric Sevareid at 1, Affidavit of Walter Cronkite at 3, attached to Brief for CBS; Affidavit of Earl Caldwell at 4, attached to Brief for Petitioner. Several reporters who have testified under the compulsion of a subpoena explain that after their testimony their former sources severed all relations with them. See, e.g., Affidavit of Anthony Ripley at 2–3, attached to Brief for Petitioner; Affidavit of Min S. Yee at 2–3, attached to Brief for Newsweek.

[34] This point was stressed in a conversation with this author by Black Panther Attorney Charles Garry, October 15, 1970 in San Francisco. See also Affidavit of Earl Caldwell at 2, attached to Brief for Petitioner; Affidavit of Thomas A. Johnson at 2, Affidavit of Wallace Turner at 2, attached to Brief for Petitioner.

[35] Mr. Garry explained that Panther leaders will not talk with any newsman without first verifying the newsman's reputation and integrity with him. See also Affidavit of Gerald Fraser at 2, and Affidavit of Earl Caldwell at 2, attached to Brief for petitioner.

[36] Affidavit of Earl Caldwell at 3, attached to Brief for Petitioner.

[37] See, e.g., Affidavit of Thomas A. Johnson at 2, Affidavit of John Kifner at 2–3, attached to Brief for Petitioner; Affidavit of Nicholas Charles Proffitt at 3, attached to Brief for Newsweek.

[38] All of the affidavits in the Caldwell case from newsmen who have covered radical groups emphasize the possibility of physical retaliation. One reporter explained:

> Based on my own experiences, being black and knowing the black community, I can say with certainty that any appearance by a black journalist behind closed doors, such as the appearance that Earl Caldwell . . . has been subpoenaed to make . . ., could be personally dangerous to him. . . . A reporter covering the black community . . . [is] dealing with a much smaller community than the white community and this smaller community contains a far greater percentage of activists.

Affidavit of Thomas A. Johnson at 3, attached to Brief for Petitioner. Another newsman explained that members of the Venceremos Brigade, whom he had accompanied to Cuba, threatened him with remarks such as "we're not worried. . . We know where to find you." Affidavit of Min S. Yee at 4, attached to Brief for Newsweek.

[39] In one typical incident, a photographer on assignment for the San Francisco Chronicle attempted to photograph Berkeley police officers arresting a young man. As the photographer approached the arrest scene, a sheriff's deputy ran toward him and blocked

Newsmen do not function well in this atmosphere. Perhaps equally important, the number of subpoenas and court orders to testify are becoming prohibitive in terms of sheer time and inconvenience.[41] The newsman and especially the cameraman who covers any public confrontation can plan on spending a good many hours before the grand jury or in court. The newsman who establishes a relationship with any dissident group can expect a similar fate. These court and grand jury appearances may cut significantly into the newsman's working hours.[42]

Such circumstances must inevitably hinder the ability of the press to gather the news. They apparently may also have a detrimental effect on some newsmen's willingness to disseminate the news. Reporters, because of their awareness of the risk of subpoena and the consequences ensuing therefrom, sometimes, and perhaps often, now hesitate to include in their articles or broadcasts certain types of information which they believe will induce a subpoena.[43] Similarly, it has become common for newspapers and television stations to destroy all their unpublished film in order to avoid having it available for production under compulsion of subpoenas duces tecum.[44]

Thus, the greatly expanded use of subpoenas and court orders to testify has significantly impaired the press's ability to gather and disseminate the news. This is perhaps why, for the first time, the news media have mounted organized and massive resistance to the pressure upon them.[45] him from going any closer. The photographer identified himself as a member of the press and displayed his credentials. The deputy told him that "he didn't give a damn," and warned the photographer in abusive, obscene language not to take any more pictures. Bay Guildsman, Aug. 1970, at 1, (newsletter of the San Francsico-Oakland Newspaper Guild).

---

[40] The problem of physical assaults on newsmen, and especially cameramen, has become so significant that San Francisco newsmen have organized to demand that newspaper and television station management provide helmets to all newsmen sent to cover public confrontations and that management assign a reporter to stay with each photographer, to keep an eye out for "bricks, police clubs and attacks by militants." Bay Guildsman, Feb. 1969, at 1, col. 5. The newsmen are also requesting management to provide self-defense training for reporters and cameramen. Id. An account of physical assault is given by a San Francisco Chronicle photographer: "I was standing . . . where the demonstrators built a bonfire, and I heard someone yell 'Get the pig photographer' and there was a hail of rocks. I turned and ran like hell. Luckily, I was only hit a couple of times in the leg." Bay Guildsman, May 1970, at 1 col. 1.

[41] The legal counsel for a large and nationally prestigious newspaper [see note 14 supra] explained that his newspaper's main objection to the subpoenas is probably the great amount of time and inconvenience ensuing therefrom. He said that because of the great number of recent subpoenas, the paper's records department, (the newspaper's library) was spending many of its working hours going back through old files to find clippings and photographs for compliance with subpoenas duces tecum, and that the paper's legal department and individual newsmen were spending a great many hours either in court or before grand juries, or preparing for these appearances.

[42] A reporter for the San Francisco Examiner, subpoenaed by the prosecution in a recent San Francisco murder trial, spent four full days in court before being sentenced to five days in jail for refusal to testify. See S.F. Chronicle, Oct. 20, 1970 at 5, col. 6.

[43] Two of the courts recently recognizing a privilege have taken account of the possibility of self-censorship. An Illinois court explained:

> The indiscriminate serving of such subpoenas necessarily has a chilling effect upon the operation and functioning of media in the City of Chicago. . . . Members of media necessarily become conscious in their news gathering activities of a potential later questioning concerning their conduct and the contents of their stories in relation to what was published and what was not published. In sum, the necessary consequences of indiscriminate subpoenaing could result in the evils inherent in self-censorship.

Order Quashing Subpoenas, People v. Dohrn, No. 69–3808 (Cir. Ct. of Cook County—Crim. Div. June 12, 1970). Similarly, the Ninth Circuit recognized that "it is not unreasonable to expect journalists everywhere to temper their reporting so as to reduce the probability that they will be required to submit to interrogation." In re Caldwell, No. 25,025 (9th Cir. Nov. 18, 1970).

[44] The St Louis Post-Dispatch, for example, on June 25, 1970), dropped its appeal of a district court decision requiring it to turn over unpublished photographs of a demonstration at Washington University because of a compromise reached with the Justice Department. The paper, however, immediately ordered all its photographers henceforth to destroy all unpublished prints after one week. See The Guild Reporter, July 10, 1970 at 5, col. 5, (official organ of the American Newspaper Guild).

[45] The media's decision to fight the pressure on a collective basis is quite apparent. For example, in In re Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358, (N.D. Cal. 1970), Earl Caldwell, a New York Times reporter, and the Times itself were parties at the district court; the Times, however, participated only as an amicus curiae at the Ninth Circuit. Newsweek, CBS and the Associated Press filed Amici Curiae briefs in the district court and on ap-

C. The Caldwell case: The problem in microcosm

In re Caldwell,[46] arising out of a San Francisco federal grand jury investigation of the Black Panther Party, typifies the events surrounding the recent series of government subpoenas. The New York Times had assigned Earl Caldwell, a black journalist, to cover certain militant and dissident groups including the Black Panthers.[47] Caldwell was given this assignment when it appeared that the Times' resident San Francisco correspondents, both of whom were white, were unable adequately to cover the activities and views of the black militants. The militants distrusted them, as whites, and refused to talk freely to them.[48] Caldwell had covered the Panthers almost since the Party's beginnings. Having grown to trust Caldwell, Panthers would discuss Party views and activities freely with him.[49] With this information, Caldwell had written a series of articles, based on material for the most part unavailable to other newsmen. Whenever he had felt that disclosures made to him were intended for publication, he had used them in his articles. Many disclosures were not used because he realized they were meant to be confidential.[50]

Since the summer of 1969, if not earlier, a San Francisco federal grand jury had been conducting an investigation into various Black Panther activities. During the summer several subpoenas were served on Party members and records in connection with an investigation of possible criminal activity.[51] In December the Black Panther Chief of Staff, David Hilliard, was indicted on a charge of threatening to kill President Richard Nixon.[52] The alleged threat was uttered by Hilliard in a public speech broadcast on local radio and television stations.[53] On February 5, 1970, the Government filed a Notice of Motion to Compel Compliance with subpoenas served on several Party leaders, including one Raymond 'Masai' Hewitt, requiring the production of certain documents which related to publication of a number of issues of The Black Panther, a weekly paper published by the Party.[54] The Government informed the court "that threats to kill President Nixon had been published and disseminated in the aforesaid issues of The Black Panther, and the Grand Jury was inquiring into a possible violation of 18 U.S.C. 1751, captioned 'Presidential assassination, kidnapping and assault,' as well as other matters."[55]

On December 14, 1969, Caldwell published an article in The New York Times in which he quoted David Hilliard as saying to him: "We are special. We advocate the very direct overthrow of the Government by way of force and violence. . . . The only solution . . . is armed struggle."[56] According to the Government. "[t]his statement, coming after the threat of the Panthers to kill President Nixon, . . . appeared relevant to an inquiry or investigation of a possible violation in connection with the publication of these statements and repeal to the Ninth Circuit, attaching to the briefs affidavits from many eminent newsmen. Each was represented in both the trial and appellate proceedings by counsel from prominent New York and San Francisco law firms. The willingness of CBS, Newsweek and the Associated Press to incur the expense of this legal work in an action to which they were not parties is some evidence of how strongly the media feel the need for a privilege.

---

This feeling is also apparent at the level of the individual newsman. For example, the Seattle Convention of the American Newspaper Guild (the AFL–CIO union representing newsmen) recently, in response to requests from its membership, adopted a demand for employers to join in newsmen's defense, meet all their legal expenses and indemnify them against any monetary loss, including fines and loss of pay. The convention also called on the American Civil Liberties Union to convene a nation-wide conference to establish a legal-aid fund to help newsmen who choose to resist subpoenas. See The Guild Reporter, July 10, 1970 at 1, col. 1.

[46] 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970).

[47] Affidavit of Earl Caldwell at 1, attached to Brief for Petitioner.

[48] Affidavit of Wallace Turner at 2, attached to Brief for Petitioner.

[49] Affidavit of Earl Caldwell at 1–2, attached to Brief for Petitioner.

[50] Id. at 3.

[51] According to the Justice Department, the grand jury was investigating possible violations of 18 U.S.C. §§ 2101, 231 ("Riots" and Civil Disorders") & 1341 ("Frauds and Swindles"). Affidavit of Francis L. Williamson at 2, attached to Opposition Memo, supra note 7.

[52] Affidavit of Francis L. Williamson at 2, attached to Opposition Memo.

[53] Id. at 5.

[54] Id. at 2.

[55] Id. at 3.

[56] N.Y. Times, Dec. 14, 1969 at 64, col. 1.

lated activities of the responsible individuals."[57] Between December 23, 1969 and January 12, 1970, the FBI made six attempts to contact Caldwell, failing each time.[58] On January 30, 1970, a subpoena was issued to Caldwell requiring him to appear before the grand jury. The schedule attached to the subpoena ordered production of:

> Notes and tape recordings of interviews covering the period from January 1, 1969, to date, reflecting statements made for publication by officers and spokesmen for the Black Panther Party concerning the aims and purposes of said organization and activities of said organization, its officers, staff, personnel and members, including specifically, but not limited to, interviews given by David Hilliard and Raymond "Masai" Hewitt.[59]

After negotiation with Caldwell's attorney the Government continued indefinitely the return date of this subpoena, issuing instead a subpoena ad testificandum, stating that "[i]f Mr. Caldwell's personal testimony before the grand jury turns out to be sufficient for the needs of the grand jury, it may not be necessary for the grand jury to examine the tapes and documents."[60] Caldwell and the Times moved to quash the subpoenas. The district court refused to grant the motion, but issued a protective order limiting the scope of permissible inquiry. This order provided that Caldwell "need not reveal confidential associations that impinge upon the effective exercise of his First Amendment right to gather news for dissemination to the public through the press or other recognized media until such time as a compelling and overriding national interest which cannot be alternatively served has been established. . . ."[61]

Despite the protective order, Caldwell continued in his refusal to appear before the grand jury and was held in contempt.[62] On appeal,[63] the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit upheld the protective order but vacated the order requiring Caldwell to appear before the grand jury.[64] Affirming the district court's finding of a privilege in the absence of an overriding national interest,[65] the Ninth Circuit held that mere attendance at secret grand jury proceedings would, in this case, violate that privilege because such an appearance, even under the shield of the protective order, would cause Caldwell's Black Panther sources to sever their relationship with him.[66] The court explained that the "question is whether the injury to First Amendment liberties which mere attendance threatens can be justified by the demonstrated need of the Government for appellant's testimony as to those subjects not already protected by the privilege."[67] Because Caldwell could testify to nothing that was not either protected by the district court protective order or already disclosed in his published articles, his testimony would be superfluous. The court reasoned that since Caldwell's "response to subpoena would be a barren performance—one of no benefit to the Grand Jury,"[68] destroying his "capacity as a news gatherer for such a return hardly makes sense."[69] There was, in other words, "no public interest of real substance"[70] in competition with the jeopardized first amendment freedoms.[71]

The court explained that if such a public interest were ever to arise, it would be on an occasion where a witness even with the protection of the privilege would still serve a useful purpose before the grand jury,[72] The court indicated that such occasions would probably be rare[73] and held that: "[W]here it has been shown that the public's First Amendment right to be informed would be jeopardized by requiring a journalist to submit to secret Grand Jury interrogation, the Government must respond by demonstrating a compelling need for the witness' presence . . . ."[74] The court expressly declined to specify the requirements of such a governmental showing,[75] and then, in an apparent contradiction of its earlier broad rule, carefully cautioned that the holding was a narrow one, confined to a "newsource that is as sensitive as the Black Panther Party,"[76] and a "reporter who so uniquely enjoys the trust and confidence of his sensitive news source.[77]

---

[57] Affidavit of Francis L. Williamson at 3, attached to Opposition Memo.

[58] Affidavit of Raymond N. Byers at 1, attached to the Second Supplement to Opposition Memo.

[59] Schedule attached to subpoena issued by the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, on application of the United States, January 30, 1970. Raymond Hewitt was one of the Black Panther leaders served with an earlier subpoena. See note 54 supra and accompanying text.

[60] Opposition Memo at 1.

[61] 311 F. Supp. at 360.

[62] Caldwell appeared in court on June 5, 1970 and made a formal statement that he would not testify before the grand jury, despite the protective order. He was cited for contempt, but sentence was stayed pending appeal. See N.Y. Times, June 6, 1970 at 20, col. 2.

[63] The Times did not join Caldwell in taking the appeal, but rather participated only as an amicus curiae.

[64] No. 26,025 (9th Cir. Nov. 18, 1970) (slip opinion).

[65] Id. at 8.

[66] Id. at 11.

[67] Id. at 12.

[68] Id.

[69] Id.

[70] Id.

[71] Id.

[72] Id.

II. PRECEDENT AND THE PRIVILEGE

Except in jurisdictions where a privilege is granted by statute,[78] the courts until very recently have rejected both the common law and the constitutional claims of privilege, and with a single exception[79] even these courts in statutory-privilege jurisdictions have shown their disapproval of the privilege by construing the statutes as narrowly as possible.[80] The earlier cases presented only the question of the confidential source. With one exception,[81] the privilege issue traditionally arose where the newsman published an explosive article and then refused to identity the source of his information. In the last year, however, questions involving the content of a newsman's information and of films have also reached the courts. Some courts have begun to recognize a qualified constitutional privilege.

A. Precedent: the common law claims

Until the fifties, the proponents of a newsman's privilege raised only common law claims.[82] They argued that their pledges of confidentiality should be respected either because their means of livelihood would be in jeopardy were they to break the pledge[83] or because the same policies underlying the establishment of the existing common law privileges[84] dictated recognition of a newsman's privilege.[85] The courts brusquely disposed of these contentions. Stressing that disclosure is required of all witnesses "in order that justice may prevail"[86] and that a newsman's privilege would be "detrimental to the due administration of law,"[87] the courts uniformly rejected the privilege, often citing Professor Wigmore:

> In general, then the mere fact that a communication was made in express confidence, or in the implied confidence of a confidential relation, does not create a privilege. . . .
>
> Accordingly . . . a confidential communication . . . to a journalist . . . is not privileged from disclosure.[88]

---

[73] Id.

[74] Id.

[75] Id. at 13.

[76] Id.

[77] Id.

[78] Fourteen states have adopted a statutory privilege. See ALA. CODE, tit. 7, § 370 (1958); ARIZ. REV. STAT. ANN. § 12-2237 (1956); ARK. STAT. ANN. § 43-917 (1964); CAL. EVID. CODE § 1070 (West 1966); IND. ANN. STAT. § 2-1733 (Supp. 1966); KY. REV. STAT. § 421.100 (1962); LA. REV. STAT. §§ 45:1351-54 (Supp. 1952); MD. CODE ANN., art 5 § 2 (1957); MONT. REV. CODES ANN. §§ 93-601-1 to -601-2 (1964); N.J. STAT. ANN. § 2A:81-10 (1951); N.M. STAT. ANN. § 20-1-12-1 (Supp. 1967); N.Y. CIV. RIGHTS LAW, § 79-H (McKinney Supp. 1970); OHIO. REV. CODE ANN. §§ 2739.04, 2739.12 (Supp. 1966); PA. STAT. ANN., tit. § 330 (Supp. 1965).

[79] In re Taylor, 412 Pa. 32, 193 A.2d 181 (1963).

[80] See, e.g., In re Cepeda, 233 F. Supp. 465 (S.D.N.Y. 1964) (California statute); Deltec, Inc. v. Dun & Bradstreet, Inc., 187 F. Supp. 788 (N.D. Ohio 1960) (Ohio statute); State v. Donovan, 130 N.J.L. 130, 30 A.2d 421 (1943).

[81] In re Taylor, 412 Pa. 32, 193 A.2d 181 (1963).

[82] The first reported case to raise the constitutional claim was Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545 (2d Cir. 1958), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910 (1958).

[83] See, e.g., Plunkett v. Hamilton, 136 Ga. 72, 70 S.E. 781 (1911).

[84] Common law recognized an attorney-client and a marital privilege. See 8 J. WIGMORE, EVIDENCE (McNaughton rev. 1961) §§ 2285, 2290–92, 2294–304, 2306–18, 2320–24 (attorney-client), 2227–28, 2230–32, 2334–36, 2239–43, 2245, 2332–41 (marital).

[85] See, e.g., People ex rel. Mooney v. Sheriff, 269 N.Y. 291, 199 N.E. 415 (1936).

[86] Id. 190 M.K. at 416.

[87] In re Ornow, 84 N.J.L. 235, 236, 85 A. 1011, 1012 (1913).

[88] J. Wigmore, supra note 84, § 2286.

Wigmore's conclusion followed from his four requirements for the traditional establishment of a common law privilege: First, the communications must originate in a confidence that they will not be disclosed; second, the element of confidentiality must be essential to the full and satisfactory maintenance of the relation between the parties; third, the relation must be one which in the opinion of the community ought to be sedulously fostered; and finally, the injury that would inure to the relation by the disclosure of the communications must be greater than the benefit thereby gained for the correct disposal of litigation.[89] Wigmore did not specify why he found the four conditions lacking in the case of the journalist; rather, he dismissed the journalist's claim on the basis of a 1938 report of the American Bar Association Committee on Improvement of the Law of Evidence:

> Of recent years, there have appeared on the statute books of several legislatures certain novel privileges. . . . [T]hey bear the marks of having been enacted at the instance of certain occupational organizations. . . . The demand for these privileges seems to have been due, in part to a pride in their organization and a desire to give it some mark of professional status, and in part to the invocation of a false analogy to the long-established privileges for certain professional communications.
>
> The analogies are not convincing. . . .[W]e recommend against any further recognition of . . . privilege for information obtained by journalists.[90]

Wigmore and the courts which cited him as authority assumed that journalists could satisfy only the requirement of confidentiality. They did not undertake seriously to consider whether the other requirements could be met. Failing in most cases to recognize the existence of continuing newsman-source relationships, they did not inquire whether forced disclosure resulted in any injury to that relationship or whether that relationship was one which the public interest dictated fostering. Part of this failure stems from the limited context in which the privilege issue usually arose. In earlier years the question presented usually concerned the newsman's duty to reveal the identity of his source of already published information, and the courts focused on the flow of information from source to newsman for publication. Since these early cases did not present a newsman's refusal to reveal the contents of information which the source did not intend be published, the courts were never exposed to the quality of the relationship at all. It is significant that the single early case which presented the question of privilege in regard to the contents of the information was the only case to approve and broadly construe an existing statutory privilege.[91] This court recognized that "tips . . . will dry up . . . unless newsmen are able to fully and completely protect their sources of information." [92] Since the courts rejecting the common law privilege failed to recognize the existence of any relationship, they did not have to deal with the third and fourth of Wigmore's requirements. They perceived no injury arising from the forced disclosure of communications.[93] Even had they seen such an injury, they probably would have concluded nevertheless that it was outweighed by the fundamental common law duty of every citizen to testify.[94]

The reasoning of these courts seems deficient in several respects. It is curious that courts, and Wigmore himself, who zealously defended law enforcement's privilege to keep secret the identity of its informants [95] failed to see the parallel between the police-informant relationship and that of the newsman and his source. Courts have stressed the confidential nature of the police-informant relationship, emphazing that a police informant relies on the disrection of the police officer to keep his identity secret, and justifying this secrecy on the grounds of the public interest in the flow of information.[96] This public interest is sufficient to overcome any duty to testify that the informant might have. Yet these courts have rejected out of hand the possibility that a similar confidential and continuing relationship is necessary to the effective gathering and reporting of news or that the public interest in the flow of news might be sufficient to outweigh the newsman's duty to testify. The courts seemed to attribute to this duty to testify a certain startling variability: it was a fundamental absolute for newsmen, but was only at times applicable to doctors, lawyers or ministers.[97] This dichotomy is an odd one, for the public interest in the dissemination of news is served by the communications made by source to newsman, while only a private interest is served when an individual communicates to his doctor, lawyer or priest. Furthermore, a newsman's informant is much more likely to be deterred by the threat of forced disclosure than is the individual who makes communications to this doctor or lawyer. This argument was recently expounded by Dean Goldstein of the Yale Law School.[98] patients or clients communicate to a doctor or a lawyer because they need the benefit of the other's skill. Even if they were aware of the possibility of forced disclosure, they would probably still make the communication because their fear of disclosure is outweighed by the need for immediate aid. The newssource, on the other hand, is not motivated by the urgency of his own need for medical or legal advice; rather, he acts because of the usually less compelling motives of spite, hope of financial reward or a desire to be of public service. Hence, his communication is probably the result of a calculation and more likely to be deterred by the risk of exposure.

---

[89] Id. § 2285.

[90] ABA COMM. ON IMPROVEMENT OF THE LAW OF EVIDENCE (1938), cited in 8 J. WIGMORE, supra note 84, § 2286.

[91] In re Taylor, 412 Pa. 32, 193 A.2d 181 (1963).

[92] Id., 193 A.2d at 185.

[93] None of the courts considering the common law claim even mentioned that any injury might occur. See, e.g., Plunkett v. Hamilton, 136 Ga. 72, 70 S.E. 781 (1911).

[94] The courts had little patience with the newsman, brushing aside his claims as frivolous. One court, for example, dismissed the newsman's argument as follows: "A promise not to testify when so required is substantially a promise not to obey the law." Plunkett v. Hamilton, 136 Ga. 72, 84, 70 S.E. 781, 786 (1911). It is unlikely that these courts would have been swayed by any detailed sophisticated analysis showing compliance with Wigmore's four requirements.

[95] Wigmore exhorted that "A genuine privilege . . . must be recognized for the identity of persons supplying the government with information concerning the commission of crimes. . . . That the government has this privilege is well established, and its soundness cannot be questioned." 8 J. WIGMORE, supra note 84, § 2374(f). See also Morgan v. State, 211 Ga. 172, 84 S.E.2d 365 (1954) (official communications statute interpreted as including privilege not to disclose informer's identity); In re Langert, 5 App. Div. 2d 586, 173 N.Y.S.2d 665 (1958) (commissioner not required to disclose informer's identity or communications); First Nat'l Bank v. Williams, 142 Ore. 648, 20 P.2d 222 (19 (privilege based upon Treasury Department regulations recognized).

B. The constitutional claims

Beginning with Garland v. Torre[99] in 1958, newsmen began claiming a constitutional privilege. Marie Torre was a newspaper columnist who had quoted in her column an unnamed CBS executive as making certain statements about the actress Judy Garland. Miss Garland brought suit against CBS for breach of contract and libel and sought to force Miss Torre to reveal the source of the statements. Miss Torre refused, claiming that to compel newspaper reporters to disclose confidential sources of news would encroach upon the freedom of the press guaranteed by the first amendment, because "it would impose an important practical restraint on the flow of news from news sources to news media and would thus diminish pro tanto the flow of news to the public."[100] Mr. Justice Stewart, then sitting on the Second Circuit, rejected this contention. He accepted the hypothesis that forced disclosure might entail an encroachment of press freedom, but reasoned that since freedom of the press is not absolute, the question to be determined was "whether the interest to be served by compelling the testimon of the witness in the present case justifies some impairment of this First Amendment freedom."[101] He concluded that freedom of the press had to give way to the "paramount public interest in the fair administration of justice."[102] > ommunications of this kind ought to receive encouragement. They are discouraged if the informer's identity is disclosed. Whether an informer is motivated by good citizenship, promise of leniency or prospect of pecuniary reward, he will usually condition his operation on an assurance of anonymity. . . . The government also has an interest in nondisclosure of the identity of its informers. Law enforcement officers often depend on professional informers to furnish them with a flow of information about criminal ivities. Revelation of the dual role played by such persons ends their usefulness to government and discourages others from entering into a like relationship.

---

[96] Wigmore explained:

J. WIGMORE, supra note 84, § 2374(f). See also In re Langert, 5 App. Div. 2d 586, 3 N.Y.S.2d 665, (1958).

[97] The common law and statutory privileges are extremely broad in terms of the communications they protect. An attorney, spouse or physician would have to testify only if client, other spouse or patient waived the privilege [8 J. WIGMORE, supra note 84, 2327–29, 2242, 2340, 2388–91], or if the communication fell within a few narrow eptions. For example, an attorney must testify concerning communications made to m where his services had been sought or obtained in the commission of a crime. See, ., CAL. EVID. CODE § 956 (West 1966).

[98] Goldstein, Newsmen and Their Confidential Sources, THE NEW REPUBLIC, Mar. 21, 70, at 13–15.

[99] 259 F.2d 545 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910 (1958).

[100] 259 F.2d at 547–48.

[101] Id. at 548.

[102] Id. at 549.

In 1961, the constitutional claim was again invoked. In In re Goodfader,[103] plaintiff, who was seeking damages against the Civil Service Commission of the City of Honolulu for wrongful ouster from her job, sought to force a newsman to reveal the source of his information that the Commission had been contemplating the ouster. Refusing to comply with the court order to disclose his source, the newsman claimed that the court order was an unconstitutional abridgment of freedom of press, since the interest served by compelling disclosure did not justify any impairment of press freedom. On appeal the Supreme Court of Hawaii recognized that the first amendment freedoms were to be given broad scope and that the forced disclosure may constitute an impairment of freedom of the press, but concluded that "such an impairment may not be considered of a degree sufficient to outweigh the necessity of maintaining the court's fundamental authority to compel attendance of witnesses and to exact their testimony. . . ." [104]

In 1968 in State v. Buchanan [105] the Oregon supreme court also rejected the constitutional privilege. The editor of a campus newspaper who had published an interview with seven unnamed drug users was subpoenaed by the local District Attorney to appear before the grand jury. She refused to reveal the names of the drug users and was cited for contempt. On appeal she argued that freedom of the press necessarily includes freedom to gather the news, and that since certain news stories cannot be obtained unless the reporter can promise anonymity to a confidential informer, forced disclosure abridges a protected freedom. The court rejected this contention on the grounds that the newsman has no constitutional right to information which is not accessible to the public generally and that to give the newsman such special privileges would conflict with the equal protection clause of the Federal Constitution.[106]

Where the courts dealing with the claims of a common law privilege brusquely dismissed the privilege, as the Buchanan court did in the constitutional context, the Torre and Goodfader courts made some attempt to analyze the claims asserted. Reluctantly willing to assume that forced disclosure may hinder the flow of news and hence constitute an impairment of freedom of the press, these courts nevertheless arrived at the same conclusion previous courts had: any rights or interests the newsman may have must give way to his duty to testify. The courts purported to reach this conclusion through a process of balancing the interests involved. However, the balancing process they employed was deficient in several respects. In the first place, they disregarded the Supreme Court's dictate to balance the interests and weigh the circumstances in each particular case.[107] Mr. Justice Stewart, in Torre, went as far as determining that he was not faced with "a case where the identity of the news source is of doubtful relevance" [108] and that "[t]he question asked of the appellant went to the heart of the plaintiff's claim," [109] but he also used general language about the "right of a litigant to enlist judicial compulsion of testimony" [110] and the "paramount public interest in the fair administration of justice." [111] He never did examine the actual consequences of disclosure to the newswoman involved. Hence, in the Torre case the newswoman Torre's interest was never weighed against the litigant Garland's actual needs and interests; rather, the general press interest in the availability of news was weighed against some general lofty interest in the aministration of justice. Goodfader, while beginning with a statement that in the area of first amendment rights a balancing of the interests must be undertaken, never went on to explore those interests. The Goodfader court "readily perceive[d] the disadvantages" [112] to a newsman of forced disclosure, but denied that such disadvantages constituted an impairment of constitutional rights and concluded that even if constitutional rights were being impaired, the impairment was not sufficient to outweigh "the necessity of maintaining the court's fundamental authority to compel the attendance of witnesses and to exact their testimony. . . ."[113] Thus the court weighed in the abstract the press's interest in non-disclosure against the necessity of maintaining the court's authority.

---

[103] 45 Hawaii 317, 367 P.2d 472 (1961).

[104] Id. at 329, 367 P.2d at 480.

[105] 250 Ore. 244, 436 P.2d 729, cert. denied, 392 U.S. 905 (1968).

[106] Id. at 248–49, 436 P.2d at 731.

[107] Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109, 126 (1959); Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513, 520 (1958); American Communications Ass'n v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382, 399 (1950).

[108] 259 F.2d at 549.

[109] Id. at 550.

[110] Id. at 549.

[111] Id.

[112] 45 Hawaii at 327, 367 P.2d at 479.

Second, in their balancing processes the Torre and Goodfader courts overestimated the weight of the interest in compelling testimony and underestimated the interest asserted by the press. The interest in compelling testimony has never been as "fundamental" or "paramount" as these courts assumed. Both common law and statute have long recognized numerous privileges against compelled testimony,[114] and if these same cases had arisen in a statutory newsman's privilege state, the courts would have applied the privilege, any fundamental or paramount interest notwithstanding. Moreover, these courts labelled the litigant's right to compelled testimony a 'public' interest and the newsman's interest in non-disclosure a 'private' one.[115] Logically this categorization makes little sense. In the case of civil litigation, the public has no interest in the outcome; only the litigants have anything at stake, and hence compelled testimony serves only their private interests. Conversely, the public has every interest in the newsman-source relationship, because from this relationship comes much of the flow of news.[116] Hence, the question is not whether the newsman's private interest is sufficient to overcome the public's interest in compelled testimony, but rather, whether the litigant's private interest is sufficient to overcome the public interest in the flow of news.

A series of Supreme Court cases[117] indicates that a private litigant's interests are normally subordinate to those of the press. In these cases, beginning with New York Times v. Sullivan,[118] the Court severely restricted the power of the state to award damages in libel and invasion of privacy suits against the press because of the chilling effect of such damages. Plaintiffs in these suits can now recover only where actual malice or highly unreasonable conduct is shown. The interests of private litigants, then, must give way to those asserted by the press. New York Times was decided several years after Torre and Goodfader, and was apparently unanticipated by them. But whatever the validity of a pre-New York Times holding that the press's first amendment rights must give way to the litigant's must give way to the litigant's interest in compelled testimony, such a holding, in light of the subsequent Supreme Court decisions, can no longer stand without some serious re-examination.

The interest in compelled testimony was apparently seen by the Torre and Goodfader courts to represent not only the litigant's interest in the outcome of the suit, but also the state's interest in the prestige or authority of its judiciary.[119] However, this interest, in the absence of a clear and present danger to judicial proceedings, is still insufficient to override the press' first amendment claims, for the Supreme Court has consistently held that it must give way to freedom of the press. In 1941 in Bridges v. California,[120] a case involving a highly publicized and controversial trial, the Court upheld the right of a newspaper to publish, while sentences and a motion for a new trial were under consideration, virulent criticism of and political threats against the judge. The Court also upheld the right of one of the defendants to publish threats of a nationwide labor strike if the new trial were not granted. Six years later, in Craig. v. Harney,[121] the Court upheld, because of the absence of a clear and present danger to the proceedings, the right of a newspaper to publish highly critical and threatening editorials against a judge considering a motion for a new trial. In Wood v. Georgia [122] the Court upheld the right of a county sheriff to publish harsh criticism of local judges who had just ordered a grand jury investigation into alleged vote-buying activities. The sheriff's campaign against the investigation included delivery of a letter repeating the criticism to members of the jury. In Garrison v. Louisiana [123] the Court denied to the state the right to punish by criminal libel, false, muckracking and demogogic statements made by a district attorney about the conduct of local judges.

---

[113] Id. at 329, 367 P.2d at 480.

[114] See note 84 supra. The common law privileges have been codified in almost all American jurisdictions. Numerous new privileges have also been statutorily recognized. See, e.g., CAL. EVID. CODE §§ 994 (physician-patient), 1033-34 (priest-penitent) (West 1966).

[115] The Goodfader court, for example, discussed the interests as follows:

> However, despite the broad scope and protective status of First Amendment freedoms and privileges, it is clear that none of them is absolute, and that whether, in any given case, an asserted right under that amendment will prevail or not depends upon the particular circumstances involved and the weighing and balancing of the protection afforded by the right asserted against the purposes that would be defeated or denied by recognition of the freedom or privilege. The private or individual interest involved must, in each case, be weighed in balance against the public interest affected.

45 Hawaii at 324–25, 367 P.2d at 478 (emphasis added).

[116] See notes 25–31 supra and 185-92 infra and accompanying text.

[117] New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964); Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130 (1966); Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75 (1966); Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1967); Greenbelt Coop. Publishing, Ass'n v. Bresler, 398 U.S. (1970).

[118] 376 U.S. 254 (1964).

[119] The Torre court spoke of the obligation to testify and the right of a litigant to compel testimony as "incidents of the judicial power of the United States." 259 F.2d at 549. The Goodfader court mentioned the necessity of maintaining "the court's fundamental authority to compel the attendance of witnesses and to exact their testimony. . . ." 45 Hawaii at 329, 367 P.2d at 480.

[120] 314 U.S. 252 (1941).

In light of these cases, the question arises why both the Torre and Goodfader courts chose to subordinate the newsman's interest in nondisclosure to the not-so-hallowed 'public' interest in compelled testimony. The answer seems to be that neither court had any strong conviction that newsgathering is a constitutionally protected incident of freedom of the press.[124] Bridges, Craig, Wood, New York Times and Garrison concerned the right to publish, which is the core of the first amendment freedom of press; there was, on the other hand, no precedent for the protection of newsgathering, rather only several lower court cases holding that newsgathering (or "access to the news") is not constitutionally protected.[125] The Torre and Goodfader courts were willing to proceed on the assumption that newsgathering could find some protection—but not enough constitutional protection to make any impairment of newsgathering a significant encroachment on freedom of the press. Thus, in the balancing process they were not willing to attribute any great weight to the interest asserted by the newsman. Because these courts saw in forced disclosure only a slight impairment to an unprotected—or penumbra—incident of freedom of the press, they reasoned that the interest in compelled testimony must prevail.

The factual context in which privilege cases arise has changed. Because of the recent widespread use of subpoenas and court orders, with the ensuing 'drying up' of sources and physical assaults on newsmen, the impairment—to both the aggregate flow of news and to the ability of the individual newsman to gather news—is no longer slight.[126] In consequence, newsgathering must be protected if the benefits of freedom to publish are to be realized. Perceiving this necessity, four courts have now recognized a qualified constitutional privilege. In Alioto v. Cowles Communications, Inc.[127] the Mayor of San Francisco brought a libel action in federal court for a magazine article causing him of having Mafia connections. When the authors of the article refused to answer questions relating to the identity of their source, the Mayor filed a motion to hold them in contempt. The district court refused to grant the motion, affirming a "First Amendment claim of privilege and sustaining it in this case under these circumstances, because . . . there is a lack of reasonable necessity at this time, and . . . there are other available methods of handling the situation." [128] In People v. Dohrn [129] an Illinois circuit court quashed six subpoenas duces tecum served on local newspapers and television stations by members of the militant Weatherman faction of the SDS, under indictment for harges stemming from a violent rampage in the streets of Chicago. This court recognized the privilege because "[t]he indiscriminate serving of such subpoenas necessarily has a chilling effect upon the operation and functioning of [the] media."[130] The court required the party issuing the subpoena to show: First, probable cause that the film sought contained relevant evidence; second, that the use of subpoenas was the only method available of obtaining that evidence; and, third, that the evidence was so important that non-production thereof would cause a miscarriage of justice.[131] in the Caldwell case,[132] the district and circuit courts perceived that the availability of news is not the only interest asserted by the newsman; rather the courts recognized that when a newsman refuses to reveal the identity of his source or the contents of that source's information, he may also be asserting the source's interests in freedom of speech and association.[133]

---

[121] 331 U.S. 367 (1947).

[122] 370 U.S. 375 (1962).

[123] 379 U.S. 64 (1964).

[124] The Goodfader court was only willing to "assume, for the purposes of this case, that the forced disclosure of a reporter's confidential source of information may, to some extent, constitute an impairment of the freedom of the press." 45 Hawaii at 329, 367 P.2d at 480. Judge (now Justice) Stewart, in the Torre case, took a firmer stand, but still seemed to hold some reservations; he accepted "the hypothesis that compulsory disclosure . . . may entail an abridgment of press freedom by imposing some limitation upon the availability of news." 259 F.2d at 548 (emphasis added). By 1965 Mr. Justice Stewart had apparently completely accepted newsgathering as a protected incident. Dissenting in Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532 (1965), in which the majority held that the televising of trials is a violation of a defendant's right to due process, he wrote that "[t]he suggestion that there are limits upon the public's right to know what goes on in the courts causes me deep concern. The idea of imposing upon any medium of communications the burden of justifying its presence is contrary to where I had always thought the presumption must lie in the area of First Amendment freedoms." Id. at 614–15.

[125] See, e.g., Tribune Review Publishing Co. v. Thomas, 254 F.2d 883 (3d Cir. 1958); United Press Ass'ns v. Valente, 308 N.Y. 71, 123 N.E.2d 777 (1954); cf. Seymour v. United States, 373 F.2d 629 (5th Cir. 1967).

[126] See text accompanying notes 32–44 supra.

[127] C.A. No. 52150 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 4, 1969).

[128] Transcript of Proceedings at 167, id.

[129] Order Quashing Subpoenas, No. 69–3308, (Cir. Ct. of Cook County—Crim. Div., June 12, 1970).

The balancing process employed by Alioto, Dohrn and Caldwell differed in two major respects from the process earlier employed by the Torre and Goodfader courts: First, the degree of impairment to both the flow of news and the individual newsman; and, second, the protection to be accorded to newsgathering. In addition, the Caldwell courts weighed a new set of interests—the source's freedoms of speech and association—in the balance. When a source confides to a newsman, for whatever reasons he finds it advantageous or desirable to do so, his first amendment right of freedom of speech may come into play; when the source chooses to serve whatever objective he may have by putting his trust in the newsman and making the confidential communication to him, the source may be exercising his right of freedom of association. The Goodfader and Torre courts had not grappled with these contentions—probably because they were never argued to them. Whatever the accuracy in 1958 and 1961 of the Torre and Goodfader courts assessment of the impairment to the flow of news as slight, it is clear that the impairment in 1970 has become great.[134] The remaining questions, then, are first, whether it was the earlier courts, or the more recent ones, who used the more correct method to judge the weight of the interest of the press, and second, whether there is any constitutional basis for the Caldwell courts' recognition of a privilege based partially on the source's freedoms of speech and association.

III. SUGGESTED THEORY FOR THE CONSTITUTIONAL PROTECTION OF INTERESTS ASSERTED BY THE NEWSMAN

In the process of gathering, publishing or broadcasting[135] the news, three sets of interests come into play:[136] the interest of the source of the informa-

---

[130] Id. at 2.

[131] Id. at 3.

[132] 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970); see notes 46–77 supra and accompanying text.

[133] "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech. . . ." U.S CONST. amend. I. The district court in Caldwell recognized that the relief sought by petitioner presented "issues that go to the very core of the First Amendment, the resolution of which may well be determinative of the scope of the journalist's privilege in sensitive areas of freedom of speech, press and association. . . ." 311 F. Supp. at 360. The court explained that when "the exercise of the grand jury power of testimonial compulsion . . . may impinge upon . . . First Amendment rights of freedom of speech, press and association . . ., such power shall not be exercised in a manner likely to do so until there has been a clear showing of a compelling and overriding national interest. . . ." Id. at 360. The Ninth Circuit agreed that "the First Amendment requires this qualified privilege. . . ." No. 26,025 (9th Cir. Nov. 18, 1970) (slip opinion) at 8.

[134] See notes 32–44 supra and accompanying text.

[135] Television has become probably a more important medium for the distribution of news than the newspapers. The New York Times, the most prestigious publication in the country, has a daily circulation of approximately 890,000. Time Magazine has a circulation of approximately 3.9 million, 1970 WORLD ALMANAC 250, 351. The nationally televised network news programs have, on the other hand, audiences in the tens of millions. Hence, any discussion of the press must today include broadcasting as well as publishing.

[136] A fourth set of interests also arises: that of the subject of the information. This subject—who may also be the source—is the person or group that the information concerns, for example, a rioter whom the newsman films, or a government official whom a confidential source accuses of accepting bribes. The interests of the subject of the information do not belong in a discussion of newsman's privilege. His interests are protected by the laws against libel, or invasion of privacy, or both; or if he will be subject to criminal prosecution, by the fourth, fifth, sixth and fourteenth amendments. If the subject happens also to be the criminal defendant or private litigant seeking to force disclosure or production of films, his interests may override the newsman's, but they have no bearing on the original determination of whether or not the interests asserted by the newsman are of constitutional stature.

tion, if there is one, in making his information known to the newsman, the public, or both; the interest of the newsman in being free to gather and publish what information he chooses; and the interest of society in the dissemination and receipt of news. These interests are inseparable. Society receives news when the newsman gathers and disseminates it by publication or broadcast. The source, who normally does not have his own means of dissemination, reaches the public through the newsman's publication. The Supreme Court in discussing the goals of the constitutional guarantees of freedom of the press has succintly recognized the inseparability of these interests: "Those guarantees are not for the benefit of the press so much as the benefit of all of us." [137] Mr. Justice Murphy, concurring in Craig v. Harney,[138] had earlier expounded in greater detail: "A free press lies at the heart of our democracy and its preservation is essential to the survival of liberty. Any inroad made upon the constitutional protection of a free press tends to undermine the freedom of all men to print and to read the truth." [139] This part analyzes these interests in three contexts: First, the constitutional protection of newsgathering, examined independently of the question of whether or not there is a confidential source; second, the constitutional protection of a news source's interests when he intends his communication to be published, but his identity kept secret; and, third, the constitutional protection of a confidential communication where the source intends that the contents of the communication be kept secret.

A. The constitutional protection of newsgathering

The Supreme Court has held that both the dissemination and the receipt of information are constitutionally protected. In holding the Sherman Antitrust Act applicable to a news distribution association which prevented non-member newspapers from using information gathered by member newsmen, the Court said that the first amendment "rests on the assumption that the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources is essential to the welfare of the public." [140] In Martin v. Struthers [141] the Court struck down a city ordinance forbidding the door to door distribution of handbills because the "[f]reedom to distribute information to every citizen wherever he desires to receive it" is protected by the first and fourteenth amendments.[142] In Lamont v. Postmaster General [143] the Court held that a post office regulation requiring the Postmaster General to detain and deliver only upon the addressee's request certain communist propaganda abridged the addressee's right to receive the material. Hence, dissemination and receipt of news are squarely within the protection of the first amendment. This protection would seem to extend to newsgathering, and not merely as a penumbra right, for unless the news is gathered, it cannot be disseminated and received.

Other Supreme Court cases support this conclusion. The dissemination and receipt of news is usually accomplished through the act of publication, the core of the first amendment guarantee—or, in the case of television or radio news, through the act of broadcasting which is also protected by the first amendment.[144] Restrictions on publication are traditionally recognized as encroachments on freedom of the press.[145] However, insisting that freedom of the press be broadly defined,[146] the Court has extended the first amendment protection to invalidate other types of restrictions where these restrictions would have an eventual chilling effect on publication. In Grosjean v. American Press Co.[147] the Court struck down a Louisiana statute placing a tax on newspapers. In New York Times v. Sullivan,[148] Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, and Walker

---

[137] Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 389 (1967).

[138] 331 U.S. 367 (1947).

[139] Id. at 383 (emphasis added).

[140] Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1. 20 (1944). See also Associated Press v. KVOS, 80 F.2d 575 (9th Cir. 1935).

[141] 319 U.S. 141 (1943).

[142] Id. at 146. In 1968 in Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1968), the Court reaffirmed that freedom of speech and press "necessarily protects the right to receive." Id. at 564.

[143] 381 U.S. 301 (1964).

[144] Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367, 386 (1969).

[145] See Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, 283 U.S. 697 (1931).

[146] See, e.g., Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 389 (1967); Martin v. Struthers, 318 U.S. 141, 143 (1942).

[147] 297 U.S. 233 (1936).

[148] 376 U.S. 254 (1964).

v. Associated Press,[149] and Time, Inc. v. Hill[150] the Court severely limited the power of the states to award damages for libel and invasion of privacy because of the chilling effect of such damages.

These cases were concerned with the chilling effect on future publication. Newspapers that are taxed may go out of business; papers that are held liable on one story may fear to publish a similar one in the future. Restrictions on newsgathering, however, have a chilling effect on present publication—what is not gathered cannot be published.[151] Furthermore, the chilling effect of a tax or civil liability is speculative. A newspaper may survive a tax, and it may risk liability if it believes a story will increase its circulation. The chilling effect of restrictions on newsgathering is, on the other hand, certain and measurable: the press can only publish what information it can gather; what it cannot obtain will not be published. Because of the direct cause-and-effect relationship between restrictions on newsgathering and restrictions on publication or broadcasting, the argument for first amendment protection from limitations on newsgathering is far stronger than the one for protection from taxation or civil liability. If the Court has granted the latter, presumably when presented with an appropriate case, it would also grant the former. In the absence of other overriding interests, such protection would today necessarily have to include freedom from forced disclosure or production of films, because the omnipresent threat of forced disclosure or production of films is now a great hindrance to the newsman's ability to gather the news.[152]

The Court has, in another context, indicated some limitation on the right of the press to gather news, and several lower courts have expressly denied any constitutional protection to newsgathering (or "access to the news").[153] However, this precedent is not determinative of the question of privilege. The lower courts' express denials of any constitutional protection of newsgathering are unsupported by any Supreme Court dicta or holdings, and the two Supreme Court cases indicating some limitations are easily distinguishable. In Estes v. Texas[154] the Court granted a new trial to a convicted defendant on the grounds that pre-trial publicity and the highly disruptive presence of numerous reporters, cameras, and microphones in the courtroom during the trial constituted a denial of due process. The Court indicated that such distracting press presence and the televising of trials is not to be permitted. In Sheppard v. Maxwell[155] the Court reversed a conviction on similar grounds, and again indicated that some control of press newsgathering activity is necessary.

These cases should not be taken as a rejection of constitutional protection for newsgathering. In the first place, the behavior of the press in both cases was patently outrageous,[156] and beyond legitimization on constitutional—or any other—grounds. Second, the thrust of the Court's language—and outrage—was at the state officials who encouraged the publicity and circus atmosphere for their own political purposes.[157] Third, and most important, the explicit fifth,[158] sixth[159] and fourteenth[160] amendment guarantees of a criminal defendant's right to a fair trial and an impartial jury were at stake. The Court did not reject a right to gather news; it never considered the right. Rather, the Court focused on and upheld a defendant's right to a fair trial. Because this same right is at stake when a criminal defendant seeks to compel the newsman's testimony or production of his films, the Estes and Sheppard limitation on the right of the press to gather news is relevant to the proper scope of the privilege. However, this limitation does not defeat the privilege in such cases altogether. The rule laid down by the Court in Estes and Sheppard was that "the presence of the press must be limited when it is apparent that the accused might otherwise be prejudiced or disadvantaged."[161] Hence, where a defendant could show prejudice or disadvantage by non-disclosure of information or non-production of films, there is presumably no grounds for a newsman's claim of privilege. On the other hand, the question of privilege where there is no showing of prejudice or disadvantage is not illuminated by anything in the Estes or Sheppard opinions.

---

[149] 388 U.S. 130 (1966) (companion cases).

[150] 385 U.S. 374 (1967).

[151] To this extent restrictions on newsgathering may be similar to forbidden prior restraints. For a discussion of these restraints see Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, 283 U.S. 697, 713-20 (1931) (invalidating as an unconstitutional previous restraint a state statute providing for the abatement, as a public nuisance, any any "malicious scandalous and defamatory newspaper, magazine or other periodical").

[152] See notes 32-44 supra and accompanying text.

[153] See Tribune Review Publishing Co. v. Thomas, 254 F.2d 883 (3d Cir. 1958); United Press Ass'ns v. Valente, 308 N.Y. 71, 123 N.E.2d 777 (1954); State v. Buchanan, 250 Ore. 244, 436 P.2d 729 (1968); cf. Seymour v. United States, 373 F.2d 629 (5th Cir. 1967).

[154] 381 U.S. 532 (1965).

[155] 384 U.S. 333 (1966).

[156] For example, in the Sheppard case, involving the murder of a prominent socialite and the trial of her osteopath husband, the press had broadcast live the coroner's inquest complete with the five and one-half hour interrogation of the defendant about his married life and a love affair with his nurse. The press covered the trial in such great numbers that the movement of reporters in and out of the courtroom made testimony almost impossible to hear, despite the installation of loud speakers. Reporters hovered so closely over the defense table that Sheppard and his lawyer had to leave the courtroom to speak confidentially. The newspapers repeatedly published out-of-court statements of witnesses concerning matters which were not admissible evidence. 384 U.S. at 339, 340, 344, 356-57.

[157] The Sheppard case, for example, came on for trial two weeks before the November general election at which the chief prosecutor was a candidate for judge and the presiding judge was a candidate to succeed himself. Id. at 342.

Furthermore, Estes and Sheppard throw no light on the question of privilege in relation to government prosecutions and private litigants. Non-disclosure of information or non-production of films may work to the disadvantage of civil litigants, but their right to compel testimony, unlike the criminal defendant's sixth amendment right, and their right to a fair trial, unlike the criminal defendant's fifth and fourteenth amendment rights, lack constitutional stature and are, according to New York Times[162] and the series of cases following it,[163] subordinate in any event to freedom of the press. Similarly, Estes and Sheppard are not helpful in relation to a privilege from government subpoena. The proposition that a defendant's fifth, sixth and fourteenth amendment rights override both the state's interest in convicting criminals and the press' interest in gathering news, gives no clue to the outcome when the press asserts its interest in gathering news against the state's interest in convicting criminals. Thus, with the exception of the privilege in relation to the prejudiced criminal defendant, there is no precedent dictating rejection of newsgathering as a constitutionally protected function of the press.

B. The constitutional protection of a source's interests where he intends his identity be kept secret

Threat of forced disclosure adversely affects the interests of a confidential source as well as the interests of the public. When the source communicates information to a newsman, intending that the information be published but his identity be kept secret, he too has an interest in the publication: whatever his reasons, he desires that information disseminated to the public and publication through the newsman is his means of dissemination. His communication to the newsman is an exercise of his right of freedom of speech, but he exercises that right only on condition that his anonymity be respected. The greater the threat of disclosure, the less his willingness to risk communicating to a newsman.[164] Therefore, the question is whether there is any constitutional basis for recognition of a right to anonymity as an incident of freedom of speech. Supreme Court precedent provides ample authority for such a right. The Court has recognized the right of the recipient of printed matter to remain anonymous. In Lamont v. Postmaster General[165] the Court held that the Post Office could not compromise the anonymity of recipients of "communist propaganda" by requiring them to request in writing that the material be delivered to them. In United States v. Rumely[166] the Court held that a witness could not be held in contempt for refusing to answer questions put to him by a house investigating committee pertaining to the identities of bulk purchasers of political lobbying material.

---

[158] "[N]or shall any person be . . . deprived of life, liberty, or property. witnesses in his favor. . . ." U.S. CONST. amend. VI.

[159] "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury . . . [and] to have compulsory process for obtaining witness in his favor. . . ." Id. amend. VI.

[160] "[N]or shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law. . . ." Id. amend. XIV.

[161] 384 U.S. at 358.

[162] New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964).

[163] Greenbelt Coop. Pub. Ass'n v. Bresler, 398 U.S. 6 (1970); Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130 (1967); Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 1967); Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75 (1966).

[164] See text accompanying notes 29–37 supra.

[165] 381 U.S. 301 (1965).

[166] 345 U.S. 41 (1953).

The Court has extended this right to anonymity to the author and the distributor of printed matter In Talley v. California[167] the Court struck down a city ordinance making it a misdemeanor to distribute any handbill which did not identify its author. The Court held the ordinance void on its face because "identification and fear of reprisal might deter perfectly peaceful discussions of public matters of importance."[168] The Talley ordinance prohibited any handbill distributed in any place under any circumstances and was thus void for overbreadth. The Court specifically declined to pass on the validity of an ordinance limited in purpose to identifying those responsible for fraud, false advertizing and libel. Hence whether the Talley rule protects anonymity in all circumstances was left an open question, but it would seem to extend at least to all political expression and information about "public matters of importance." Since the Court in other contexts had admonished that "[t]he guarantees for speech and press are not the preserve of political expression or comment upon public affairs,"[169] the areas of speech unprotected by the Talley rule are probably limited to those specifically mentioned by the Talley court: fraud, false advertizing and libel.

Talley provides a strong basis for the newsman's privilege to refuse to identify his source. Talley protects the anonymity of the news sources who choses to print and distribute his information himself. This right to anonymity should not be denied simply because the source chooses to publish through an established press medium. To do so would penalize those who have not the means to print and distribute or broadcast themselves—and few sources do, at least on a large scale. A recent Supreme Court case seems to indicate that such penalization would be unconstitutional. In Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC[170] the Court upheld FCC regulations, promulgated under the "fairness" doctrine, which required radio and television broadcasters to allow equal times to advocates of each side of a public issue. The Court discussed the necessity, due to the shortage of air frequencies, of requiring licenses to broadcast and of limiting the number of licensees.[171] The Court went on to hold that although the technological necessity of limiting the number of broadcasters made constitutional the government practice of requiring licenses and thereby giving control of the airwaves to a limited group of persons, neither the government nor the broadcasters themselves could constitutionally bar non-licensees from access to the air waves for the expression of their views.[172] Under the holding of this case, those who do not themselves have the means to broadcast cannot be denied the right to disseminate through the established broadcasting media. This holding may indicate that the Talley right of anonymity cannot be limited to those who have the means to print and distribute or broadcast themselves.

The Supreme Court cases establishing the right of freedom of association further support the conclusion that newsmen should be free to protect the anonymity of their newssources. The Court has recognized a constitutional right of individuals who would be ineffectual acting separately to associate in order to assert their interests collectively. In NAACP v. Button[173] the Court held a state statute barring "improper solicitation of any legal . . . business" unconstitutional as applied to the activities of the NAACP because "[i]n the context of NAACP objectives, litigation is not a technique of resolving private differences; it is a means for the achieving of lawful objectives of equality of treatment by all government . . . ."[174] Similarly, in Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Virginia ex rel. Virginia State Bar[175] and United Mine Workers v. Illinois Bar Association[176] the Court struck down state regulations against the solicitation of legal business as unconstitutional as applied to the labor union practice of retaining lawyers and referring to them union members' injury claims. The Court explained that "the First Amendment's guarantees of free speech, petition and assembly give railroad workers the right to gather together for the lawful purpose of helping and advising one another in asserting the rights Congress gave them in the Safety Appliance Act and the Federal Employers' Liability Act, statutory rights which would be vain and futile if workers could not talk together freely as to the best course to follow."[177] An important incident to this right of association is the right to privacy of association, which confers on members of protected associations the right to anonymity. In Sweezy v. New Hampshire[178] six members of the Court[179] upheld the right of a witness in front of a state investigating committee to refuse to answer questions about the membership of the Progressive Party in New Hampshire. In a later series of cases[180] the Court struck down various state attempts to force disclosure of NAACP membership lists because "[i]nviolability of privacy in group association may in many circumstances be indispensable to preservation of freedom of association."[181]

---

[167] 362 U.S. 60 (1960).
[168] Id. at 65.
[169] Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 388 (1967).
[170] 395 U.S. 367 (1969).
[171] Id. at 387–89.
[172] Id. at 400–01.
[173] 371 U.S. 415 (1963).
[174] Id. at 429.
[175] 377 U.S. 1 (1964).
[176] 389 U.S. 217 (1967).

The Trainmen, United Mine Workers and NAACP cases provide a compelling argument for the news source's right to anonymity—either as an incident of his right of freedom of speech, or as an incident of a separate and distinct right of freedom of association.[182] Since the news source lacks the means to exercise his right of freedom of speech because he has not the means to print and distribute, he associates with the newsman. Since his goal is the dissemination of information, an interest protected by the first and fourteenth amendments, his association with the newsman should be within the protection of these amendments. Since "inviolability of privacy" is indispensable to the preservation of this association, the newssource, as a party to a protected association, should have the right to remain anonymous.[183] Alternately, the right may also be an incident of freedom of speech: Talley recognized a right of anonymity as an incident of freedom of speech in order to encourage public discussion of matters of importance. To limit this right to the few who have the means to print and distribute or broadcast themselves, makes the right futile for the majority who do not have the means themselves and effectively nullifies any encouraging effect on freedom of speech that Talley was intended to create.

---

[177] Brotherhood of R.R. Trainmen v. Virginia ex rel. Virginia State Bar, 377 U.S. 1, 5–6 (1964).

[178] 354 U.S. 234 (1957).

[179] There was no majority opinion. Justices Black, Douglas and Brennan joined in the opinion of Chief Justice Warren, upholding the witness' right to silence. Justices Frankfurter and Harlan concurred.

[180] Gibson v. Florida Legislative Comm., 372 U.S. 539 (1963); Louisiana v. NAACP, 366 U.S. 293 (1961); Bates v. City of Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516 (1960); NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson 357 U.S. 449 (1958). See also Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479 (1960) (holding unconstitutional a state statute compelling every teacher, as a condition of employment, to file annually an affidavit listing all organizations to which he has belonged or contributed).

[181] Bates v. City of Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 523 (1960); NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449, 462 (1958). In striking down a state statute imposing criminal sanctions on persons using contraceptives, the Court in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), discussed the NAACP cases and concluded: "In other words, the First Amendment has a penumbra where privacy is protected from governmental intrusion." Id. at 483.

[182] Freedom of association was implied to be a separate and distinct right as early as Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234 (1957). Four Justices explained that [e]qually manifest as a fundamental principle of a democratic society is political freedom of the individual. . . . Exercise of these basic freedoms in America has traditionally been through the media of political associations. Any interference with the freedom of a party is simultaneously an interference with the freedom of its adherents.

Id. at 250 (opinion of Chief Justice Warren; Justices Black, Douglas and Brennan joining). In NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449 (1958), the Court for the first time isolated the right: "these [are] indispensable liberties, whether of speech, press or association. . . ." Id. at 461. By 1960, in Bates v. City of Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516 (1960), it was "now beyond dispute that freedom of association for the purpose of advancing ideas and airing grievances is protected by . . . the Fourteenth Amendment." Id. at 523.

[183] The source and the newsman may not have identical interests, but identity of interest has not been a requirement of the freedom of association. In the Trainmen and United Mine Workers cases, the right was upheld even though the parties to the association, the workers and the attorneys, may not have had identical interests.

The newsman would have standing to assert the source's right to anonymity. In the first of the NAACP cases the Court explained that if the members of the NAACP were constitutionally entitled to withhold their connection with the Association, the Association would have standing to assert this right for them, because "[t]o require that it be claimed by the members themselves would result in nullification of the right at the very moment of its assertion." NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449, 461 (1958). This reasoning would apply with equal force to the newsman asserting his source's right to privacy of association.

The states in Trainmen and United Mine Workers could not defeat the statutory rights of workers by prohibiting them from associating; a fortiori, the state should not be able to discourage free speech by defeating the source's right of anonymity merely because he chooses to disseminate his information in association with the newsman.[184]

C. The constitutional protection of a confidential communication where the source intends the contents of the information be kept secret.

Where a newssource communicates to a newsman, desiring the contents of his communication be kept secret, the source can claim no interest in the dissemination of the information nor can the newsman assert society's interest in the receipt of that information. However, non-published confidential communications should still derive constitutional protection because of their indirect effect on the dissemination of news. The importance of these non-published, confidential communications cannot be overemphasized. Although this confidential information will not directly reach the public, it has a vital impact on that which is published. This information gives the newsman a wealth of background, enabling him to assess events as they happen, track down newsworthy stories and analyze and interpret the information which is given to him for dissemination.[185]

A noted diplomatic correspondent explains that "[s]ecrecy, privacy, off-the-record, background, deep background—these are the words which describe the kind of work involved in the reporting of diplomatic nuance and detail and the building of a pattern which ultimately emerges as a story."[186] Another prominent newsman adds that:

> [m]y work, and that of reporters generally, requires more than merely assembling facts. A reporter can know all the facts and still not know the truth. In order to understand the facts, reporters must constantly appraise the accuracy and meaning of words and the significance of deeds. In that effort, reporters require a background of confidential judgements and observations obtainable only in privacy and in trust.[187]

Mike Wallace, a well known reporter for the Columbia Broadcasting System, gives two examples of the role of his confidential background information. In the first instance, in preparing a broadcast on the production of a motion picture, the filming of which involved the use of large numbers of ships, airplanes and personnel, all supplied at great cost by the United States Navy, Wallace obtained a list of ten "particularly embarassing questions" which certain officials within the Defense Department "believed the Navy should have been prepared to answer satisfactorily before permitting the use without charge of its facilities and equipment by the movie's producer."[188] Wallace explains that:

> Those questions, which could not have been published without a breach of confidence, were nonetheless of great value in interviewing the officials responsible for that decision. The interviews in turn were critical in developing a report on the use of public property and funds for private purposes—a story which resulted in congressional investigation and remedial action by the Navy Department.[189]

---

[184] Since the source would have the right to anonymity, citing the newsman for contempt when he refused to identify the source would be an unconstitutional form of state action. See Barrows v. Jackson, 346 U.S. 249 (1953); Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948).

[185] Walter Cronkite describes the importance of these communications as follows:

> My work involves the preparation, through reading and talking with news sources, of the considerable volume of material necessary for such extemporaneous broadcasts as political conventions, elections and space missions, and for analytical broadcasts such as my daily radio program. It also involes participation in the determination of which stories should be covered on daily television news broadcasts and how they should be covered and participation in the selection of the news items to be broadcast and reading and correcting and, in some cases rewriting those items. All of this work entails the exercise of editorial judgment based on an extensive background of information and ideas gathered from a wide variety of sources.
>
> In doing my work, I (and those who assist me) depend constantly on information, ideas, leads and opinions received in confidence. Such material is essential in digging out newsworthy facts and, equally important, in assessing the importance and analyzing the significance of public events.

Affidavit of Walter Cronkite at 1–2, attached to Brief for CBS, supra note 27.

[186] Affidavit of Marvin Kalb at 1, attached to Brief for CBS.

[187] Affidavit of Dan Rather at 1, attached to Brief for CBS.

[188] Affidavit of Mike Wallace at 2, 3, attached to Brief for CBS.

[189] Id. at 3. Wallace also describes a series of informal conversations with President Nixon during the early stages of the 1968 campaign:

> Because of the informality of such discussions the language used was more casual than the candidate would use in public. Moreover, ideas were discussed which were ten-

Similarly, confidential information contributed to an informative and balanced series of articles published by the New York Times about the Black Panthers [190] During the year preceeding these articles, Earl Caldwell, the Times man assigned to cover the Panthers, had developed a close relationship with them, as a result of which he received great amounts of information in confidence. With this backlog of confidential information to sharpen his understanding, and probably his skepticism, of the information given to him for publication, Caldwell could attempt to explain the attitude of the Panthers, and more important, the reasons for that attitude.[191] Without such background information Caldwell could have done "little more than broadcast press releases and public statements." [192]

Broadcasting press releases and public statements is not the role assigned to the press by the constitution. Underlying every freedom of the press case yet decided has been the belief that an informed and informative press is the mainstay of a democratic society. For example, in Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, [193] while striking down a state statute allowing the state to enjoin publication of certain 'malicious, scandalous and defamatory' publications, the Court recognized the abuses of such publications, but refused to allow prior restraints because: [t]he administration of government has become more complex, the opportunities for malfeasance and corruption have multiplied, crime has grown to most serious proportions, and the danger of its protection by unfaithful officials and of the impairment of the fundamental security of life and property by criminal alliances and official neglect, emphasizes the primary need of a vigilant and courageous press. . . .[194]

Similarly, in Grosjean v. American Press Co.[195] the Court struck down a state tax on newspapers because: The newspapers, magazines and other journals of the country, it is safe to say, have shed and continue to shed, more light on the public and business affairs of the nation than any other instrumentality of publicity, and since informed public opinion is the most potent of all restraints upon misgovernment, the suppression or abridgement of the publicity afforded by a free press cannot be regarded otherwise than with grave concern.[196]

The theme running through these and all other freedom of the press cases is the vital role of the press in informing the public.[197] Because of the impor-tative and would later be refined or rejected. Had there been any thought at the time that I could be compelled to divulge a full report of some of these meetings, my presence would never have been permitted. As it was, I was able in the course of those sessions to acquire an understanding of the candidate which contributed significantly to my coverage of the campaign and, perhaps more important, an understanding of the President which has been invaluable in attempting to assess and analyze the present Administration.

---

Id. at 4.

[190] See, e.g., N.Y. Times, Jan. 21, 1969 at 20, col. 1; id., June 6, 1969 at 22, col. 4; id., June 15, 1969 at 57, col. 2; id., June 18, 1969 at 23, col. 1; id., July 20, 1969 at 43, col. 2; id., July 22, 1969 at 21, col. 1; id., July 27, 1969, § E, at 6, col. 5; id., Dec. 14, 1969 at 64, col. 1.

[191] See, e.g., Caldwell's article, N.Y. Times, Dec. 14, 1969 at 64, col. 1. See also Affidavit of Earl Caldwell at 3, attached to Brief for Petitioner, supra note 33.

[192] This phrase is Walter Cronkite's. It is an apt one. Cronkite used it in explaining that without a backlog of confidential information to enable him to track down stories and assess and interpret events as they happen, he would only be able to mouth the official version of the news. See Affidavit of Walter Cronkite at 2, attached to Brief for CBS.

[193] 283 U.S. 697 (1931).

[194] Id. at 719 20.

[195] 297 U.S. 233 (1936).

[196] Id. at 250.

[197] It would be difficult to find a case where this idea is not expressed. In Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1 (1945), the Court held the provisions of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act applicable to a new distribution syndicate because the first amendment "rests on the assumption that the widest possible dissemination of information . . . is essential to the welfare of the public." Id. at 20. In New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), the Court in limiting the right of the state to award damages in libel actions, considered the issue against "the background of a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide open. . . ." Id. at 270. In the companion cases, Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts and Associated Press v. Walker, 388 U.S. 130 (1966), involving libel actions brought by public figures, the Court reiterated and approved the New York Times rule as "an important safeguard for the rights of press and public to inform and be informed on matters of legitimate interest." Id. at 169. In Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532 (1965), in reversing a criminal conviction on due process grounds because of pre-trial publicity and chaotic courtroom conditions, the Court said that "[t]he free press has been a mighty tance assigned to this role, the Court has protected the press from most encroachments upon it.[198] It is an obvious proposition that the press cannot inform the public until and unless it itself is informed. Confidential, not-for-publication communications may never directly reach the public, but they are a crucial factor in making a knowledgeable, informed press, capable of gathering, assessing and interpreting information that is for publication. The greater the threat of forced disclosure, the less this confidential information is available to the press.[199] To the extent that such information is withheld from the press, the public is indirectly but necessarily less well informed. The body of case law designed to protect the press because of the importance of the press' role in informing the public is of little value if the courts withhold protection from one of the key elements necessary to the press' ability to perform in that role. If the reason for constitutional protection of the press is a well informed public, confidential communications from source to newsman should fall within the scope of the protection.

IV. THE SCOPE AND EXTENT OF THE PRIVILEGE

If there is to be a privilege, the question arises: what kind of privilege and what scope is it to have? Various distinctions have been suggested: No privilege where the information sought goes "to the heart of the inquiry"; [200] no privilege where the government can show an overriding state interest; [201] no privilege where the information is unavailable or not readily available elsewhere; [202] privilege limited to information imparted under a promise of confidence; [203] privilege limited to information which has been published, or alternately, to information which has not been published.[204] In light of the interests and considerations previously discussed, it is apparent that the kind of privilege and its scope must depend on the situation in which it is asserted.

A. The privilege against governmental subpoena

The Supreme Court has required inter alia that an overriding state interest be demonstrated before a state may encroach upon protected first amendment rights.[205] This standard may, however, be inapposite in newsman's privilege cases. In the first place, the government usually cannot make enough of a factual showing for a court to determine if such an interest is involved. Second, catalyst in awakening public interest in governmental affairs, exposing corruption among public officers and employees and generally informing the citizenry of public events and occurrences. . . ." Id. at 539. In Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969), upholding FCC regulations promulgated under the "fairness doctrine," the Court extolled "the First Amendment goal of producing an informed public capable of conducting its own affairs. . . ." Id. at 392.

---

[198] In only two cases has the Court upheld restrictions on the press. Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333 (1966); Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532 (1965). Both of these cases involved the right of criminal defendants to a fair trial. See notes 154–60 supra and the accompanying text. The Court has also indicated that the press is subject to the clear and present danger test. See Craig v. Harney, 331 U.S. 367 (1947); Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252 (1941). But the Court has yet to find such a danger in any case involving the professional press.

[199] See text accompanying notes 29–37 supra.

[200] Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545, 549–50 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910 (1958).

[201] The Caldwell district court granted the reporter Caldwell a protective order, but reserved jurisdiction to "entertain a motion for modification . . . at any time upon a showing by the Government of a compelling and overriding national interest in requiring Mr. Caldwell's testimony which cannot be served by alternative means. . . ." 311 F. Supp. 358, 362 (N.D. Cal. 1970). The Ninth Circuit affirmed this part of the lower court ruling. No. 26,056 (9th Cir. Nov. 18, 1970). See text accompanying notes 46–77 supra.

[202] The court in People v. Dohrn, No. 69–3808, (Cir. Ct. of Cook County—Crim. Div. June 12, 1970) would allow defendants to subpoena news films "where the use of subpoenas was the only method available of obtaining that evidence." Order Quashing Subpoenas, id. at 3. See text accompanying notes 129–31 supra. The Caldwell court also allowed for the possibility of the government not being able to obtain its evidence elsewhere. See note 201 supra.

[203] See text accompanying notes 230–31 infra.

[204] Four of the statutory privileges are limited to information actually published or broadcast, See CAL. EVID. CODE § 1070 (West 1966); KY. REV. STAT. § 421.100 (1963); MD. ANN. CODE, art 35 § 2 (1957); N.J. STAT. ANN. § 2A:81-10 (1952). The privilege in the Caldwell case, on the other hand, was limited to unpublished information. See text accompanying note 231 infra.

[205] See, e.g., Brotherhood of R.R. Trainmen v. Virginia ex rel. Virginia State Bar, 377 U.S. 1 (1964); Bates v. City of Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516 (1960); NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449 (1958); Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88 (1940).

even if the government can show the presence of an overriding state interest in the individual case, forced disclosure or production of film is, in the long run, detrimental to the state's interest. Third, if the privilege can be defeated for any reason, it will not serve to alleviate the chilling effect on the flow of news and is little better than no privilege at all. These reasons, which suggest that an absolute privilege against governmental subpoena may be appropriate, merit detailed examination.

The Supreme Court, in first amendment cases, has consistently required a careful examination of the state interest asserted to determine whether it justifies the abridgment of the first amendment rights. Such an examination, however, is often impossible in newsman's privilege cases. For example, in the Caldwell case,[206] the record of events available to all participants except, of course, the government, provides no indication as to what the government hoped to ascertain from Caldwell's testimony or notes, whom specifically the grand jury was investigating, or whether the information sought from Caldwell was available from other sources. Where a subpoena is issued in connection with secret grand jury proceedings, this factual vacuum is the normal state of affairs.[207] In such a factual vacuum governmental action which encroaches on first amendment rights is impermissible, for the Court has set up a strict set of standards by which the state's interest is to be weighed, and satisfaction of these standards requires some sort of factual showing. First, where the state asserts such an interest it must make some sort of factual showing that such an interest does in fact exist, and that it is properly a matter of governmental concern.[208] Where legislative authorizing resolutions have been loosely worded, the Court has required some indication from the investigating committee as to what the subject of an investigation conducted thereunder was, so that it could be determined whether any state interest was in fact involved.[209] Where the information available to the Court was insufficient for such a determination, the Court has held that a witness was protected from questioning.[210] Second, in the area of constitutionally protected freedoms, overbreadth has always been recognized as a fatal deficiency in governmental action. The Court has consistently struck down statutes and regulations which attempt to reach a substantive evil property a subject of governmental control but also restrict constitutionally protected conduct.[211] To prevent a similarly overbroad effect in connection with the compulsory testimony of witnesses in legislative investigations, the Court has carefully examined the evidence set forth by the state to determine whether there was a reasonable relationship between the interest asserted by the state and the information it sought to ascertain.[212] The Court has defined this requirement as follows:

---

[206] In re Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970).

[207] This factual vacuum arises, of course, because of the traditional secrecy of grand jury proceedings and is compounded by the often very broad subject matter of grand jury investigations. A subpoena served on Newsweek, described at note 2 supra, is similarly uninformative.

[208] For example, in Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178 (1957), the Court upheld the right of a witness to refuse to answer questions put to him by a House Investigating committee because neither the authorizing resolution nor the questions asked gave any indication of what governmental interest was being asserted. The Court explained:

> The power of the Congress to conduct investigations is inherent in the legislative process. That power is broad. . . . But, broad as is this power of inquiry, it is not unlimited. There is no general authority to expose the private affairs of individuals without justification in terms of the functions of Congress. . . . Nor is the Congress a law enforcement or trial agency. . . . Investigations conducted solely . . . to 'punish' those investigated are indefensible.

Id. at 187. Because the Court had "no doubt that there is no congressional power to expose for the sake of exposure" [id. at 200], and since the Government made no showing that a more legitimate interest was involved, the Court struck down the witness' contempt citation.

[209] See, e.g., Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Comm., 372 U.S. 539 (1962); Scull v. Virginia ex rel. Comm. on Law Reform and Racial Activities, 359 U.S. 344 (1959); Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178 (1957); Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234 (1957).

[210] See, e.g., Scull v. Virginia ex rel. Comm. on Law Reform and Racial Activities, 359 U.S. 344 (1959); Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178 (1957). Cf. Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109 (1959); Uphaus v. Wyman, 360 U.S. 72 (1959).

[211] See, e.g., NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Flowers, 377 U.S. 288 (1963); Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479 (1960); Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60 (1960).

[212] See, e.g., Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Comm., 372 U.S. 539 (1963); DeGregory v. New Hampshire, 383 U.S. 825 (1966); Scull v. Virginia ex rel. Comm. on Law Reform and Racial Activities, 359 U.S. 344 (1959); Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234 (1957); Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178 (1957); cf. Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109 (1959); Uphaus v. Wyman, 360 U.S. 72 (1959).

> We understand this to mean—regardless of the label applied, be it 'nexus' 'foundation,' or whatever, that it is an essential prerequisite to the validity of an investigation which intrudes into the area of constitutionally protected rights . . . that the state convincingly show a substantial relationship between the information sought and a subject of overriding and compelling state interest.[213]

Third, a corrollary to the overbreadth doctrine is that where there are methods available to the state less destructive of first amendment freedoms, the state must use them.[214]

In the Caldwell case the only showing the Government made was its assertion that: "[Hilliard's statement as published by Caldwell] coming after the threat of the Panthers to kill President Nixon, made in the November 20, 1969 issue of The Black Panther . . . appeared relevant to an inquiry or investigation of a possible violation in connection with the publication of these statements and related activities of the responsible individuals."[215] From such a showing no court could determine if the government's subpoena to Caldwell was necessary or even relevant to any state interest. The grand jury, which meets only to determine if there is probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed and that the subject of the inquiry committed it, is unique in the almost total lack of limitations imposed upon its powers of inquiry.[216] However, where most challenges of grand jury proceedings pose fourth, fifth, sixth and fourteenth amendment questions, a claim of newsman's privilege raises first amendment issues; hence, the applicable standards should be those adopted in legislative investigation cases. If the Caldwell subpoena would not meet the requirements imposed upon legislative subpoenas, it should not be upheld simply because it was issued in connection with a grand jury proceeding.

Assuming the government were to supply enough information to make the necessary showing of a valid or even compelling state interest, it is questionable whether this interest would in the normal criminal case be overriding. The government's interest is not an interest in national security, but rather a relatively narrower one of convicting criminals This distinction is an important one, for certainly the government's interest must be judged in relation to the magnitude of the harm asserted and shown. And although the number of government subpoenas has been increasing, the number of criminals who might escape conviction because of a newsman's privilege probably does not present a problem equal to one of national security.[217]

Furthermore, in the great majority of the cases where the government has recently issued subpoenas, the governmental interest may be still narrower. The government often employs the device of "planting" informants in dissident groups. This practice is a matter of public record.[218] Hence, in the Caldwell case, for example, it is highly unlikely that Caldwell would have had more information than an informant Black Panther Party member. Thus, when the government chose to subpoena Caldwell, its interest was the convenience of obtaining evidence for prosecution without utilizing or revealing its own informants. Exposure of governmental informants may not be too steep a price to incur in order to avoid subpoenaing a newsman. Exposure of one informant does not prevent the government from utilizing another. Dissident groups have always been aware of the use of informants, but despite this awareness, the government still manages successfully to employ the device. Forced disclosure from a newsman, on the other hand, would do irrevocable harm to that newsman, for it would cost him all his remaining sources,[219] and its detrimental impact would be significantly felt by all other newsmen.[220] Furthermore, any expectation of long range benefits to the administration of justice stemming from subpoenas to the professional press is almost entirely illusory. The more subpoenas issued compelling newsmen to disclose confidential communications, the fewer sources and the less confidential information there will be for reporters to divulge. The more subpoenas issued for newsmen to testify in court about events they have witnessed or to produce films thereof, the less able they will be to cover such events and shoot such films and the less information government will be able to derive from this source.

---

[213] Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Comm., 372 U.S. 539, 546 (1963).

[214] See, e.g., NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Flowers, 377 U.S. 288 (1963); Louisiana v. NAACP, 366 U.S. 293 (1961); Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479 (1960); Martin v. Struthers, 319 U.S. 141 (1942).

[215] Affidavit of Francis L. Williamson at 3, attached to Opposition Memo, supra note 7. See note 57 supra and accompanying text.

[216] For a detailed discussion of the grand jury system, see Comment, The Rights of a Witness Before A Grand Jury, 1967 DUKE L.J., 111–22 (1967).

[217] It is likely that few, if any, criminals would escape conviction because of a newsman's privilege. Films that the government could not subpoena as evidence would still caping punishment. In a great many cases where newsmen are subpoenaed, the government has other means of obtaining the evidence. See text accompanying note 218 infra. Police chiefs and attorneys-general from several statutory privilege jurisdictions, surdential information would probably not result in a significant number of criminals escontribute toward the eventual conviction of offenders. Since the published or televised films would be available to any government agency that spent the fifteen cents to buy the newspaper or took the time to watch the broadcast, they would still be of great use in identifying the offenders. Similarly, the loss of the newsman's testimony as to confiveyed in 1949, unanimously concluded that the privilege had not hampered law enforcement in their jurisdictions. See note 221 infra and accompanying text.

[218] See, e.g., N.Y. Times, June 4, 1969, at 16, col. 3 (police undercover agent testifying in congressional hearing about his infiltration of the SDS); id., Dec. 14, 1969 at 1, col. 1 (FBI Director Hoover's testimony before congressional committee about intensification of FBI efforts to "penetrate" the Black Panthers by undercover agents). The role of these undercover agents is cogently illustrated by a recent series of events: on October 19, 1970 Assistant District Attorney Joseph A. Phillips, the prosecutor in a New York bombing trial, revealed that a police undercover agent had infiltrated the
The agent turned the dynamite over to bomb squad detectives, who replaced the explosives with simulated facsimiles. The agent then returned the package to its hiding place, from which it was later taken and used in an attempt to blow up a local police station. According to prosecutor Phillips, this dynamite, which, of course, did not explode, would be key evidence in the subsequent trial. Id., Oct. 20, 1970, at 1, col. 6.

Where the governmental interest asserted is national security, exposure of governmental informants may not be too high a price to pay in order to preserve the press' ability to gather and disseminate the news. Forcing the newsman to testify may, in a given case, advance the state's interest, but by drying up the newsman's sources or hindering his ability to gather news in the future, it may also make impossible the publication of the very stories that alert the government and the public to the fact that national security or self-preservation is imperiled. Forced disclosure, then, is a hindrance to any long-range governmental interests. Privilege from forced disclosure, on the other hand, does not adversely affect these long-range interests. The New York Law Revision Commission, in its 1949 Report, gathered a series of statements from various attorney generals and police chiefs in jurisdictions where a privilege had been in force. These officials were unanimous in stating that the pivilege had not interferred with law enforcement or the prosecution of criminals, and in fact had, on occasion, provided valuable assistance.[221]

The overriding state interest standard would create a limited privilege, that is, one which could be defeated in individual cases. Apart from inadequacies of such a privilege due to the difficulties inherent in a governmental showing of such an interest, a limited privilege does little to alleviate the chilling effect of forced disclosure and production of films on the flow of news. No source can predict ahead of time whether there will be an overriding state interest in disclosure of his information or identity. No policeman[222] or political protester knows whether films taken of him or information written about him, will be related to an overriding state interest. A privilege that forces the newsman to appear and divulge all information in certain cases will do very little to accomplish the goals of the proposed privilege.

If the privilege is limited in scope, so that the newsman has only the right to refuse to answer certain questions or produce certain films, he will still be subject to grand jury appearances. Such proceedings are secret and no one will ever be sure of what was said or done therein. The newsman's assurance that only non-privileged information or film was divulged is apt not to inspire much confidence.[223] Similarly, a privilege limited in application—for example, one which can be defeated where the information goes to the heart of the inquiry or where the state shows an overriding interest—is unsatisfactory. With such a privilege the policeman or protester knows that there will be times when the newsman must appear and divulge everything and he has no way of predicting whether his particular case will be one of the times: with the recent rash of subpoenas he may well assume that his case will indeed be one of the times.

---

[219] See notes 33 & 38 supra and accompanying text.

[220] See notes 25–37 supra and accompanying text.

[221] See letter from Sen. Thomas Desmond to the New York Law Revisions Commission, June 23, 1948, in 1949 N.Y. LAW. REVISION COMM'N REPORT, at 131–32. Despite the recommendation of this committee, the New York Legislature rejected the privilege in its 1949 session. See id. at 28–29. The Legislature did, however, finally adopt a privilege in its 1970 session. See N.Y. CIV. RIGHTS LAW § 79-H (McKinney Supp. 1970).

[222] Law enforcement officers, subject to prosecution under federal civil rights statutes, may have as much reason as protestors to fear the newsman's films. For example, a former deputy sheriff of Alameda County, California was indicted for the shooting of three persons during a May 1969 riot at Berkeley, California. S.F. Chronicle, Oct. 20, 1970, at 2, col. 1. In another instance, a Los Angeles Times reporter was killed by a tear-gas projectile fired into a bar by a Los Angeles sheriff's deputy during a riot. The Justice Department announced that a Deputy Assistant Attorney-General would be sent from Washington to help the local United States Attorney "monitor the sheriff's investigation," and that the Department would begin an investigation "should any discrepancies occur in the findings of the Sheriff's Department." L.A. Times, Sept. 1, 1970, at 1, col. 6.

The Supreme Court, in other contexts, has recognized the chilling effect of this sort of uncertainty, and has stuck down procedural rules, otherwise constitutionally permissible, where the uncertainty of their operation would tend to restrain exercise of first amendment rights. In Speiser v. Randall[224] The Court invalidated a state rule that a taxpayer, in order to obtain a tax exemption, must prove that he did not advocate violent overthrow of the government. The Court explained that the state could constitutionally deny exemptions where it proved that the claimant advocated violent overthrow, but it could not put the burden on the taxpayer of proving he did not engage in such advocacy. The Court discussed "the complexity of the proofs and the generality of the standards applied ... [which provided] but shifting sands on which the litigant must maintain his position."[225] Because of these uncertainities, where "particular speech falls close to the line separating the lawful and the unlawful,"[226] a taxpayer, aware of the difficult burden of proof he would later have to bear, "necessarily must steer far wider of the unlawful zone than if the State must bear these burdens."[227] Thus, because uncertainties inherent in the procedure would serve to deter lawful as well as unlawful advocacy, the regulation was unconstitutional.

Similarly, in Dombrowski v. Pfister[228] the Court allowed individuals to seek a declaratory judgment of the invalidity of an overbroad statute, rather than forcing them to follow the normal procedure of undergoing prosecution in the hopes that state courts would narrow the statute's application to within permissible limits. The Court explained the reason for its holding as follows:

> If the rule were otherwise, the contours of regulation would have to be hammered out case by case—and tested only by those hardy enough to risk criminal prosecution .... By permitting determination of the invalidity of these statutes without regard to permissibility of some regulation on the facts of particular cases, we have, in effect, avoided making vindication of freedom of expression await the outcome of protracted litigation. Moreover, we have not thought that the improbability of successful prosecution, makes that case different. The chilling effect upon the exercise of First Amendment rights may derive from the fact of the prosecution unaffected by the prospects of its success or failure.[229]

Dombrowski and Speiser suggest that, because of the particular context in which the privilege today arises, an absolute privilege may be appropriate in order to avoid the chilling effect of the uncertainities necessarily inherent in any limited privilege. Whatever might once have been the merits of a limited privilege, today it cannot suffice; there have simply been too many subpoenas. Where, in the past, pressure on newsmen was infrequent or, at least, not a subject of public knowledge, the source, policeman or protester had little reason to anticipate the possibility of forced disclosure. Consequently, the non-existence of a privilege or the uncertainties in an existing privilege were not of great moment. Today, because of the great number of recent subpoenas, public attention is directly focused on the frequency of governmental attempts to force disclosure or production of films. Hence, the uncertainties of the limited privilege become increasingly significant.

---

[223] The Ninth Circuit in In re Caldwell No. 26,025 (9th Cir. Nov. 18, 1970) recognized this problem:

> The secrecy that surrounds Grand Jury testimony necessarily introduces uncertainty in the minds of those who fear a betrayal of their confidences. These uncertainties are compounded by the subtle nature of the journalist-informer relation. The demarcation between what is confidential and what is for publication is not sharply drawn and often depends upon the particular context or timing of the use of the information. Militant groups might very understandably fear that, under the pressure of examination before a Grand Jury, the witness may fail to protect their confidences with quite the same sure judgment he invokes in the normal course of his professional work.

Id. at 10 (slip opinion).

[224] 357 U.S. 513 (1958).

[225] Id. at 526.

[226] Id.

[227] Id.

[228] 380 U.S. 479 (1965).

[229] Id. at 487.

Many commentators advocating a privilege have suggested that it be limited to communications intended to be confidential and not for publication. The district court's protective order in the Caldwell case,[230] for example, allowed the newsman to refuse to answer questions concerning statements made to him or information given to him "unless such statements or information were given to him for publication or public disclosure."[231] Such a privilege is insufficient and probably creates more problems than it solves. In the first place, a privilege limited to "confidential" information does not aid the reporter who covers public political protest activities. His information is obtained under circumstances involving no assurances of confidence, but compelled testimony or production of films nevertheless impairs his ability to cover these activities.[232] Second, much information is revealed under circumstances where the element of confidentiality, though present, is elusive of proof in a court of law. The record in the Caldwell case, for example, shows that Black Panther sources gave information to Caldwell only on an unspoken understanding that he would sense what was non-confidential and intended for publication, and what was not.[233] In the Torre case,[234] the court noted with respect to the claim of confidentiality there asserted: "This confidentiality was apparently not explicit: 'Q. Did this network executive ask you to withhold giving his name? A. No, he did not. It is just that having worked in the business so long, in cases like this you don't mention the man's name.' "[235]

To force the source to label each item "confidential" or "non-confidential," especially where he speaks at length to the newsman, would make the task of communicating to the newsman at times quite burdensome, and in any event, this approach does not solve the problem. Unless the newsman's word is to be accepted as proof that the communication was labeled "confidential," the proceedings would be at an impasse. The newsman, without bringing his source into court, cannot prove the confidentiality; nor, however, can the government disprove it. To accept, on the other hand, the newsman's unsupported word is, as a practical matter, not a wise policy. The average newsman would assume that the source did intend certain communications to be confidential whether or not the source remembered to label them as such. The newsman holds to his profession's ethics, which prohibit disclosure;[236] at the same time, he has a self-interest in not being cited for contempt. Since he feels his source's communications are inviolate from any forced disclosure, he resents being put in the awkward position of having to testify about anything said to him, whether confidential or not. Under these circumstances, allowing the matter to be determined upon the newsman's unsupported word makes perjury an attractive proposition.

Any suggestion that the privilege be limited to published or, alternately, unpublished information, does not withstand close scrutiny. The published-unpublished distinction creates a vital uncertainty which might well nullify the proposed protective effect of the privilege: neither the source nor the newsman can predict what will be published. The source can prevent his information from being published by labelling it "not-for-publication," but neither he nor the newsman can be sure that information intended for publication will be published. The newsman's editors might decide that only a portion of the information is important enough to publish, or they might reject it altogether for lack of space, fear of libel or pre-emption by later events. Hence, the source cannot rely on the protection of the privilege, and he may still be deterred by the threat of forced disclosure.

The published-unpublished distinction has further flaws. Under a privilege limited to published information the newsman would have to disclose the source of unpublished information or the contents of such information or both. Under a privilege limited to unpublished information the newsman would have to testify as to the source of published information or the contents of such information, or both. In so far as either privilege is limited to the identity of the source, it is insufficient because it does not protect the equally important contents of the source's communications.[237] In so far as the privilege does extend to the contents of the communications, the published-unpublished distinction is logically unsound. The privilege limited to published information[238]—the newsman would have to disclose unpublished information—is a useless safeguard, since it is the unpublished information which is at issue. Similarly, if a privilege is to be recognized, it is pointless to limit it to unpublished information. Under such a privilege the newsman would have to disclose published information, but published information is by definition already disclosed, and short of asking the newsman if he in fact wrote or broadcast the item, there would be nothing to inquire about without slipping back into the area of privileged unpublished information. Hence, a requirement that the newsman testify as to already published information accomplishes nothing.[239]

---

[230] In re Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970).
[231] Id. at 362.
[232] See notes 39–42 supra and accompanying text.
[233] See notes 34–36 supra and accompanying text.
[234] Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910 (1958).
[235] 259 F.2d at 547 n.3.
[236] See note 23 supra.

The limited privilege, then, whether limited in terms of the published-nonpublished—or broadcast—distinction, the confidential-nonconfidential criterion, or the overriding state interest exception, is an unworkable and self-defeating safeguard. Aside from the difficulties in the mechanics of its application, the limited privilege does not alleviate the chilling effect of forced disclosure and the consequent impairment to the flow of news. At the same time, if the limited privilege, by at times allowing forced disclosure, may occasionally advance the governmental interest in the individual case, it can only hinder that interest over the long run. An absolute privilege, on the other hand, will encourage the flow of news without in the long run adversely affecting any governmental interest.

B. The privilege as against subpoenas by criminal defendants

When a criminal defendant seeks the newsman's information, there is neither any reason nor any justification for an absolute privilege. Colliding with the first amendment right of the press is the defendant's sixth amendment right to compel testimony[240] and his equally basic right to a fair trial.[241] The Supreme Court has recognized that where these rights collide, those of the press must give way.[242] Moreover, the chilling effect on confidential relationships present in forced disclosure under governmental pressure is much less in the case of forced disclosure from defense subpoenas. Information relevant to a criminal trial is either political information or information concerning unlawful or potentially unlawful activities. Sources who communicate this type of information usually fear forced disclosure because of government pressure. It is a rare case where a source anticipates his information being useful to a criminal defendant.[243] Hence, defense subpoenas would not greatly dry up sources or hinder the ability of the press to maintain confidential relationships.

Even defense subpoenas do, however, to a certain extent hinder the ability of the press to cover public protests, strikes, or political activities. These subpoenas put the press in the position of taking sides. A newsman knows he is in court only because of legal compulsion; the public might well believe that the newsman's appearance results from his support of the defendant on trial. With the recent wave of political protest activity and the resulting arrests for such crimes as feloniously assaulting an officer and inciting to riot, the news media have been served with a large number of subpoenas from defendants hoping the films taken during the protest activity would prove their innocence.[244] Partly as a result of these frequent court appearances, newsmen are facing increasing hostility from law enforcement officers, who in many cases no longer are willing to cooperate with newsmen covering the activities.[245] Furthermore, in terms of sheer time and inconvenience, these court appearances are prohibitive.[246] Thus, a balance must be struck between the conflicting interests of the press and the defense.

---

[237] See notes 185–92 supra and accompanying text.

[238] Four of the statutory privileges are limited to published information. See statutes cited at note 204 supra.

[239] The Ninth Circuit in the Caldwell case perceived the futility of such a requirement. See text accompanying notes 68–69 supra.

[240] "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." U.S. CONST. amend. VI.

[241] See note 158 supra.

[242] See Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333 (1966); Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532 (1965); Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723 (1963); see text accompanying notes 154–55 & 161 supra.

[243] The only sources who would fear defense subpoenas are law enforcement officials who make remarks about pending investigations or cases. There is no other category of sources whose remarks would be particularly helpful to the defense. Individual instances may occur, but they would be rare.

One solution is to limit the defense's right to subpoena newsmen to those cases where the defendant can show that the newsman's information or film is relevant and helpful to his defense and is not readily available elsewhere.[247] That this scheme is constitutionally permissible is seen from the fact that in the police-informant identity cases the Supreme Court has applied identical standards: the police must disclose the informant's identity only where the defendant can show that information to be relevant and helpful to his case.[248] Any question raised by the extra requirement of non-availability from other sources can be justified by the fact that in the newsman's privilege case, it is a first amendment interest rather than the public interest of mere convenience in the flow of information to the police which is balanced against the defendant's right to a fair trial.

C. The privilege in relation to private litigation

New York Times v. Sullivan [249] and the series of cases following it [250] provide a useful insight into the proper scope of the newsman's privilege in ordinary civil litigation. In these cases the Supreme Court subordinated the rights of private litigants to the public interest in a free and vigorous press by severely limiting the right of recovery for libel and invasion of privacy. A plaintiff can recover only where he shows "actual malice," defined as knowing falsehood or reckless disregard for the truth,[251] or "highly unreasonable conduct." [252] The Court in these cases held that where vindication of private rights would have a chilling effect on the freedoms of speech and press, the press must prevail as long as its conduct is not deliberately mendacious, reckless or highly unreasonable. The press, in other words, is to be penalized only where it acts in ways not justified by legitimate news reporting considerations and is guilty of socially undesirable conduct. The reasoning of the Court in these cases would seem to apply to the question of forced disclosure of information or production of films, for the same competing interests and policy considerations are present. Threat of such disclosure deters confidential news sources, chilling their exercise of free speech rights and impairing the press' ability to gather and disseminate the news.[253] Because of this chilling effect, the policies behind New York Times and its progeny seem applicable to the privilege issue.

News films deserve special treatment under such a standard since filmtaking seldom constitutes malicious, reckless or highly unreasonable conduct. Hence under the New York Times series of cases the press should be privileged against production of films. Aside from the question of films, the problem of forced disclosure should be viewed in two contexts: libel actions and actions not involving libel. Where the action is one for libel, the conduct of both the press and the source is at issue. Neither should be able to use the first amendment as a shield against the consequences of wrongful conduct. New York Times, Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts and Associated Press v. Walker [254] were all libel cases. Under their standards newsmen should have to reveal their sources or their sources' confidential information where plaintiff shows actual malice or highly unreasonable conduct.

---

[244] See note 21 supra.

[245] See note 39 supra and accompanying text.

[246] See notes 41–42 supra and accompanying text.

[247] This approach was taken by one recent court recognizing a privilege. See People v. Dohrn No. 69-3808 (Cir. Ct. of Cook County—Criminal Division June 12, 1970). This case is discussed in text accompanying notes 129–31 supra.

[248] McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. 300 (1967); Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53 (1957).

[249] 376 U.S. 254 (1964).

[250] Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130 (1967); Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1967); Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75 (1966).

[251] New York Times v. Sullivan, 375 U.S. 254 (1964), applied an "actual malice" standard to libel suits brought by public officials against critics of their official conduct. Id. at 279–80. Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1967) applies the standard to invasion of privacy suits brought by any individuals. Id. at 387–88.

[252] Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130 (1967), applies the "highly unreasonable conduct" standard to libel suits brought by "public figures who are not public officials." Id. at 155.

[253] See notes 29–38 supra and accompanying text.

[254] 388 U.S. 130 (1967) (companion cases).

In non-libel actions there is no allegation of undesirable press conduct. Rather, the fact that the press published or broadcast an item concerning the events in litigation is entirely fortuitous. It can be argued that the plaintiff's interests should prevail over those of the source where the suspected or probable source is himself a defendant, because under these circumstances the source's conduct might indeed be at issue. For example, in In re Goodfader[255] plaintiff, suing civil service commissioners for wrongful ouster from her job, sought to force a newsman who had attended the commission's ouster session to reveal his source of information that the ouster was to be accomplished at that session. The issue in this case was the conduct of the commissioners. If one of the commissioners was in fact the source, his informing the newsman of the contemplated ouster may have been evidence of wrongful conduct. However, even in these circumstances, and whether or not the source is considered to have waived his rights by his own misconduct, the plaintiff should not be able to force disclosure from the newsman; to allow him to do so would penalize not only the source—who may have brought his misfortune upon himself—but the newsman too. Since the newsman is guilty of no misconduct, and because of the public interest in a free flow of news, the newsman's right to silence should be upheld. Where the suspected or probable source is not one of the parties to the action, the argument for prohibiting forced disclosure is even stronger, for then his interests are to be balanced, with the newsman's, against those of the litigant. Since, in non-libel actions, the interests of either the newsman, or both the newsman and the source, should prevail over those of the private litigant, an absolute privilege might be appropriate.

CONCLUSION

The furor over the spate of federal subpoenas recently reached such proportions that Attorney General Mitchell was forced to instruct the Department of Justice to set forth guidelines for the issuance of subpoenas to the press. In an August 1970 press conference Mitchell explained that the "legal confrontation" over the subpoenas appeared to be escalating and that such confrontation could "seriously affect . . . press relationships with the Federal Government, the bar and the courts."[256] He then announced a new set of Justice Department guidelines "to provide new and reasonable safeguards to protect the rights and privileges of the free press in a manner consistent with the paramount public interest in the fair administration of justice."[257]

The Justice Department guidelines were based on a recognition of "limiting effect on the exercise of first amendment rights."[258] The Department announced as its general policy: First, in considering whether to issue a subpoena, the Department would "weigh [the] limiting effect against the public interest to be served in the fair administration of justice"; second, the Department did not consider the press as "an investigative arm of the Government"; hence it would try to obtain information from other sources before subpoenaing the press; third, the Department would negotiate before issuing the subpoena; and, finally, if negotiations failed, subpoenas could only be issued upon the express authorization of the Attorney General.[259] The guidelines set forth specific requirements for Government officials requesting issuance of a subpoena.[260]

---

[255] 45 Hawaii 317, 367 P.2d 472 (1961).

[256] N.Y. Times, Aug. 11, 1970 at 24, col. 2.

[257] Id.

[258] Id. at 24, col. 1.

[259] Id. at 24, cols. 1–2.

[260] The specified requirements were that: First, there must be sufficient reason to believe that a crime has occurred from disclosure from non-press sources, so that the press will not be used as a "springboard for investigations"; second, there must be sufficient reason to believe that the information sought is essential to a successful investigation, particularly with reference to directly establishing the guilt or innocence of the persons under investigation; third, there must be an unsuccessful attempt to obtain the information from non-press sources; fourth, great care is to be used in requesting both unpublished information and, because of the harassment incurred by cameramen, publicly disclosed information; and, fifth, the subpoenas whenever possible are to be directed at material information regarding a reasonably limited period of time and should avoid requiring production of a large volume of unpublished material. Id.

The new Justice Department policy called a halt to the rash of subpoenas, but the Department served warning on the press that the halt may not last. According to the announced guidelines, the press was to remember that "emergencies and other unusual situations may develop" where the issuance of subpoenas would not have to conform to the specified standards.[261] The press and the Federal Government now coexist in a state of uneasy truce. State and local governments, on the other hand, have yet to reach an agreement with the press, and there is no indication that the stream of subpoenas from these bodies is about to abate. Pressure from criminal defendants and private litigants has, similarly, not ceased.

Newsman's privilege is a constitutional issue; one that belongs in the courts. The only resolution of the issue thus far, however, has been in the political arena: the national news media was able to bring enough pressure to bear to force the federal government to reach a compromise. This compromise is not sufficient. In the first place, it is not binding on the Justice Department, and even within the terms of the agreement, there are loopholes left open.[262] Second, by publicly announcing a policy of "negotiation with the press," it calls public attention to the fact of press-government deals, a fact which cannot be reassuring to the source, policeman or protestor who wonders if his interests are being negotiated away. Third, and most important, the compromise does not lessen the pressure from criminal defendants, private litigants and state and local government. A judicial resolution is necessary. The courts which have considered the issue are in hopeless disagreement. Some courts persist in denying the privilege; four courts have recognized it, but have not agreed on the standards for its application. The Ninth Circuit, the highest court recently to grapple with the issue, adopted a standard of overriding state interest, but expressly declined to define the elements of a showing of this interest.[263] Similarly, state legislatures are in disaccord: 14 legislatures have codified an evidentiary privilege;[264] the rest have either never considered it or rejected it altogether. The press is equally uneven in its reaction. Some subpoenas and court orders have resulted in compliance; others in resistance. An important constitutional question should not be left in such chaos. It is time for the Supreme Court to clear the confusion. The need for a free and unimpeded flow of information to the public demands a workable and authoritative set of rules.

Margaret Sherwood

[From The Pittsburgh Law Review; Vol. 32:406 (1971)]

Notes

Caldwell v. United States: The Newsman's Constitutional Privilege

(By Dennis J. Mulvihill)

The first amendment provides that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom . . . of the press. . . ."[1] Until Caldwell v. United States,[2] state and federal courts had interpreted the first amendment as granting no constitutional privilege to newsmen to withhold confidential sources and information.[3] In Caldwell, however, the Ninth Circuit held that the freedom of the press clause in the first amendment does grant newsmen the right to protect confidentiality by refusing to appear and testify before a grand jury. This Note will analyze THE RATIONALE OF Caldwell in light of prior case law, and discuss the scope and validity of the decision as it affects the average newsman seeking to protect his source.

---

[261] Id. at 24, col. 3.

[262] For example, despite the new policy, the Justice Department announced on December 6, 1970 that it was seeking Supreme Court review of the Ninth Circuit's Caldwell ruling. 39 U.S.L.W. 3273 (Dec. 6, 1970) (No. 1114).

[263] See note 75 supra and accompanying text.

[264] See notes 78 & 221 supra.

[1] U.S. Const. amend. I.

[2] Caldwell v. United States, 434 F. 2d 1081 (9th Cir. 1970).

[3] The Supreme Court of the United States has never ruled on the issue of a newsman's constitutional privilege. Certiorari has been denied on three occasions where the question was presented for the Court's determination: Garland v. Torre, 259 F. 2d 545 (2d Cir. 1958), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910 (1958); Murphy v. Colorado, —— Colo. ——, cert denied, 365 U.S. 843 (1961); State v. Buchanan, —— Ore. ——, 436 P.2d 729 (1968), cert. denied, 392 U.S. 905 (1968).

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

For many years newsmen attempted to avoid compulsory disclosure of confidential sources in court by demanding a common law evidentiary privilege. They argued that the public interest in the free flow of news required judicial protection of the confidential relationship between a newsman and his source. Although fifteen states have responded by enacting immunity statutes,[4] no court has recognized the privilege at common law.[5] Consequently, in recent years newsmen have adopted a new approach—that of arguing that freedom of the press encompassed by the first amendment guarantees the right to withhold confidential information and sources.

The constitutional approach to a newsman's privilege was first presented in Garland v. Torre.[6] At pre-trial discovery proceedings in a libel suit, newspaper columinst Marie Torre refused to answer questions eliciting the identity of a confidential source of information.[7] Miss Torre's continued reticence upon a subsequent court order to disclose her source resulted in a contempt citation. Reviewing the contempt order, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals accepted the hypothesis "that compulsory disclosure of a journalist's confidential sources may entail an abridgement of freedom of press by imposing some limitation upon the availability of news."[8] Nevertheless, it was held that public interest in the fair administration of justice excused some infringement on freedom of the press where the information sought went "to the heart of plaintiff's claim." The circuit court affirmed the contempt order, holding "the Constitution conferred no right to refuse to answer."[9]

In 1961, the Supreme Court of Hawaii rejected a news photographer's contention that freedom of the press outweighed public interest in disclosure of identity of his source. In In re Goodfader's Appeal[10] the party seeking identity of the source claimed her discharge from a government commission had been illegal, and she filed suit for reinstatement. Appellant, a photographer, had received information relating to the dismissal from a confidential source, whose identity he refused to divulge at deposition proceedings. His ignoring of a subsequent court order demand disclosure resulted in a contempt citation. On appeal the state supreme court concluded that the constitutional protections applicable to the press did not extend to a newsman's confidential sources.[11]

A result similar to Garland v. Torre was reached in Murphy v. Colorado.[12] A reporter was ordered to identify her source of information, notwithstanding the possibility of some infringement upon freedom of the press. As in Torre, the court in Murphy did not conclusively recognize the involvement of first amendment rights. Rather, the court stated that if freedom of the press was involved, the public interest in a proper adjudication of the dispute was still paramount.

---

[4] ALA. CODE tit. 7, § 370 (1960); ARIZ. REV. STAT. ANN. tit. 12, § 2237 (Supp. 1969); ARK. STAT. ANN. tit. 43, § 917 (1964); CAL. EVID. CODE ANN. § 1070 (1966); IND. STAT. ANN. tit. 2, § 1733 (1946); KY. REV. STAT. § 421.100 (1969); LA. REV. STAT. ANN. § 45:1451-52 (1970 Supp.); MD. CODE ANN. art. 35, § 2 (1965); MICH. COMP. LAWS ANN. § 767.5a (1968); MONT. REV. CODES ANN. tit. 93, ch. 601–2 (1964); N.J. STAT. ANN. tit. 2A. ch. 84 A–21 (1969 Supp.); N. MEX. STAT. ch. 20, § 1–12.1 (Supp. 1969); N.Y. CIV. RIGHTS § 79–h (McKinney Supp. 1970); OHIO REV. CODE ANN. tit. 27, § 2739.12 (1964); PA. STAT. ANN. tit. 28, § 330 (Supp. 1970).

[5] See 8 J. WIGMORE, EVIDENCE § 2286 (McNaughton Rev. 1961).

[6] 259 F. 2d 545 (2d Cir. 1958), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 910 (1958).

[7] Marie Torre published a statement allegedly made by a Columbia Broadcasting System official relating to a neurotic complex actress Judy Garland had developed as a result of a weight problem. Miss Garland sought the identity of the official to establish a cause of action in a subsequent libel suit against C.B.S.

[8] 259 F. 2d at 548 [emphasis added].

[9] Id. at 550.

[10] 45 Hawaii 317, 367 P.2d 472 (1961).

[11] After an exhaustive review of the newsman's argument, the court stated: We have not been convinced that there is a First Amendment protection available to deponent. However, in the absence of any authoritative ruling by the court having the final say on the matter, we will assume, for the purposes of this case, that the forced disclosure of a reporter's confidential source of information may, to some extent, constitute an impairment of the freedom of the press. We nevertheless conclude, in accord with the analysis and the holding on the same hypothesis in Garland v. Torre, (2d Cir. 1958) 259 F. 2d 545, that such an impairment may not be considered of a degree sufficient to outweigh the necessity of maintaining the court's fundamental authority to compel the attendance of witnesses and to exact their testimony if not otherwise privileged or protected. Id. at ——, 367 P.2d at 480.

[12] ——Colo. ——, cert. denied, 365 U.S. 843 (1961).

A more recent case, State v. Buchanan,[13] involved a student newspaper editor's refusal to disclose to a grand jury the names of persons whom she had interviewed. The editor, Miss Buchanan, argued that the protection of identity of sources was essential to insure publication and dissemination of all types of news.[14] However, the Supreme Court of Oregon found the information within the scope of grand jury investigation, and upheld a lower court contempt citation.

Following the Torre rationale, most courts have handled the issue of a newsman's privilege by determining whether the interests to be served by compelling the testimony of the witness justifies the possibility of some impairment of the first amendment. Generally, a resolution of the problem has been achieved by the balancing of society's interest in the full disclosure of truth against the constitutional guarantee of a free flow of news. Thus, the disposition of each case necessarily requires a recognition of the actual competing interests involved.

CALDWELL V. UNITED STATES

In Caldwell v. United States,[15] the first amendment was again asserted to protect a professional newsman's confidential sources and information. Earl Caldwell, a reporter for the News York Times, was subpoenaed by a federal grand jury to testify on matters relating to Black Panther Party activities. Since Caldwell had conducted several in-depth interviews with members of the Black Panthers, the grand jury felt that he had acquired valuable knowledge of the group's plans and activities. On motion in the Northern District of California to quash the subpoena,[16] Caldwell argued that his forced appearance before the grand jury was violative of the right to a free press, since it would destroy the confidential relationship which he enjoyed with members of the Black Panther Party.[17] The district court recognized that Mr. Caldwell's knowledge of Black Panther activities was derived from a type of confidential relationship commonly developed and maintained by professional journalists. Further, the court noted that such relationships are indispensible to a newsman's function of gathering, analyzing and publishing the news. Since forced disclosure would arouse distrust in the confidential sources and thereby destroy their availability, the public right to all types of information would be impaired.[18] Balancing the particular interests involved, the district court held that the government had not demonstrated a need for the information sufficient to justify an infringement of the first amendment freedom of press.[19] Consequently, the court ordered that while Caldwell must fulfill his public duty to appear before the grand jury,[20] he could not be compelled to disclose confidential sources and information maintained in his work as a professional newsman. Caldwell, however, refused to obey the order compelling his attendance, and was held in contempt.

---

[13] —— Ore. ——, 436 P.2d 729 (1968), cert. denied, 392 U.S. 905 (1968).

[14] Miss Buchanan's article dealt with the use of marijuana on the University of Oregon campus.

[15] 434 F. 2d 1081 (9th Cir. 1970).

[16] Application of Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358 (N.D. Cal. 1970).

[17] Explaining his relationship with the Black Panther Party, Caldwell testified: [A]s they realized I could be trusted and that my sole purpose was to collect my information and present it objectively in the newspaper and that I had no other motive, I found that not only were the party leaders available for in-depth interviews but also the rank and file members were cooperative in aiding me in the newspaper stories that I wanted to do.

. . . As a result of the relationship that I have developed, I have been able to write lengthy stories about the Panthers that have appeared in The New York Times and have been of such a nature that other reports who have not known the Panthers have not been able to write.

. . . if I am forced to appear in secret grand jury proceedings, my appearance alone would be interpreted by the Black Panthers and other dissident groups as a possible disclosure of confidences and trusts and would similarly destroy my effectiveness as a newspaperman.

434 F 2d at 1087–88.

[18] This same argument was rejected in State v. Buchanan, —— Ore. ——, 436 P.2d 729 (1968), cert. denied, 392 U.S. 905 (1968).

[19] When the exercise of the grand jury power of testimonial compulsion so necessary to the effective functioning of the court may impinge upon or repress First Amendment rights of freedom of speech, press, and association, which centuries of experience have found to be indispensible to the survival of a free society, such power shall not be exercised in a manner likely to do so until there has been a clear showing of a compelling and overriding national interest that cannot be served by alternative means. 311 F. Supp. at 360.

[20] Citing Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273 (1919), and United States v. Bryan, 339 U.S. 323 (1950).

On appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded with instructions that the judgment of contempt and the order directing attendance before the grand jury be vacated. The circuit court agreed that public access to news would be diminished by compelling Caldwell to disclose confidential sources and information. However, the court concluded that refusing to compel attendance upon the subpoena in this situation was also necessary to protect the public's first amendment right to a free flow of news.

Basically, the rationale of the circuit court involved three phases: (1) Acknowledging the applicability of the first amendment; (2) Balancing the interests involved; (3) Defining the scope of the protective order.[21]

In order to assess the validity and scope of the Caldwell decision, it is necessary to examine individually each of the following phases of the court's opinion.

Recognizing the Applicability of the First Amendment

Before reviewing the scope of the district court order limiting interrogation, the circuit court considered whether first amendment rights were involved. The circuit court noted that freedom of the press under the first amendment guaranteed public access to the widest spectrum of available knowledge. Since the subpoena requiring Caldwell to testify would destroy the trust he enjoyed with the Panther membership, the undesirable result would be that—"[the Black Panthers] would refuse to speak to him; they would become even more reluctant than they are now to speak to any newsmen; and the news media would thereby be vitally hampered in their ability to cover the views and activities of the militants.[22]"

Consequently, such articles would not be available for public dissemination. The court, emphasizing the need "to provide the public with a wide range of information about the nature of protest and heterodoxy,"[23] concluded that first amendment rights were dampened by compelling Mr. Caldwell to testify. Thus, Caldwell represents the first case to recognize conclusively the involvement of the first amendment when a newsman is ordered to reveal confidential information and sources.[24]

Although the Ninth Circuit in Caldwell did not differentiate between disclosure of infomation and disclosure of identity of sources, such a distinction appears valid in determining the applicability of first amendment protection.[25]

It can be argued that an extension of constitutional protection to confidential information is unwarranted. The protection afforded by the first amendment was not provided for the benefit of the press, but to insure a free flow of news to the public. Therefore, constitutional freedom of press safeguards should be applied so as to guarantee the widest possible dissemination of news. The protection granted in Caldwell, however, does not serve this purpose. The court recognized that much of the information sought by the grand jury was not imparted to Caldwell with a view toward publication or public disclosure. Rather, it was acquired through information and "off the record" confidential discussions between Caldwell and members of the Black Panther party. Since Caldwell himself would not voluntarily destroy the Black Panthers' trust by publishing the information, the news would probably never be channeled into the public view. Thus, the imposition of constitutional protection does not serve the purpose of insuring full disclosure of the news to the public. Indeed, under the facts in Caldwell, forced disclosure by the court may be the sole means by which the public could be completely informed of Black Panther activities. The circuit court appears to be applying the "public" freedom of press in a manner calculated to protect only the private interests involved.

---

[21] Caldwell also moved to quash the subpoenas on the ground that they were based upon information obtained by unconstitutional surveillance of his interviews with Black Panther members. The district court denied the motion on the ground that Caldwell lacked standing to raise the issue. In light of the disposition of the first amendment question, the circuit court declined to review this aspect of the lower court decision.

[22] 434 F. 2d at 1084.

[23] Id. at 1085 [citations omitted].

[24] Other courts have recognized the applicability of the first amendment on a hypothetical basis only. See, e.g., note 11 supra.

[25] All prior cases dealing with a newsman's constitutional privilege have dealt with only the identity of the source. None have considered the protection of confidential information.

In defense of Caldwell, it might be said that the confidential information enabled the journalist to present more accurately the sentiments and attitudes of the Black Panther membership. On this argument, the court stated: "It is not enough that the public's knowledge of groups such as the Black Panthers should be confined to their deliberate public pronouncements or distant new accounts of their occasional dramatic forays into the public view.[26]"

In adopting this approach, however, the court should have considered the issue of whether the first amendment freedom of press encompasses a public right to more balance and well informed reporting by newsmen.

The application of the first amendment by the Ninth Circuit also included the privilege of the journalist to withhold the names of confidential sources. Protection of identity of sources would appear to be more consistent with first amendment freedom of press than a grant protecting information received in a news gathering capacity. As the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has stated. "important information, tips and leads will dry up . . . unless newsmen are able to fully and completely protect the sources of their information."[27] Thus, protection of anonymity may be necessary to insure public access to all types of news. The recognized public right to receive the news would be shallow indeed if newsmen were unable to gather and disseminate news from all sources.

Balancing the interests involved

The second phase of the court's opinion involved a "balancing of interests" test. The narrow issue posed by the court was whether the restriction on the grand jury's scope of inquiry outweighed the infringement on the public right to a free flow of news.[28]

Although recognizing the traditionally broad powers of inquiry permitted grand jury investigations, the court noted that such grants of power are "necessarily tempered by constitutional prohibitions and other exceptional circumstances."[29] The circuit court, citing the United States Supreme Court decision in De Gregory v. Attorney General of New Hampshire,[30] noted that sacrifice of first amendment freedoms is required only where a compelling need for the particular testimony is demonstrated. Consequently, the government, to justify infringement of free press, was required to show a compelling or overriding national interest in the information which could not be served by ny alternative means. Although the opinion might have ceased here, the court further noted that forced disclosure effectively converted news gatherers into Department of Justice investigators, thereby invading "the autonomy of the press by imposing a governmental function upon them".[31] These constrictions caused the court to conclude that since the government had not demonstrated an overriding national interest in the information, forced disclosure was unwarranted.

The application of the balancing test in Caldwell results in an absurd anomaly. As Judge Jameson points out in his concurring opinion in Caldwell, "the obligation to appear and testify is even stronger and the scope of inquiry is broader in grand jury investigations [than in civil actions]." [32] Yet, the majority approach in Caldwell serves to permit a broader scope of inquiry in a civil court of law. The court admitted that in a civil action the public's right to freedom of press may be properly infringed upon where the information sought goes to the "heart of the plaintiff's claim". The court, however, established a far greater burden for justifiable governmental infringement on free press, i.e., an overriding and compelling national interest in the information. It is not sufficient, as in a civil action, that the information possessed by the reporter is highly relevant and material to the investigation.[33]

Defining the Scope of the Protective Order

In reversing the district court order compelling attendance upon the grand jury, the circuit court stressed the very tenuous and unstable relationship existing between the militant Black Panthers and reporters. The relationship depends upon a trust and confidence that—"is constantly subject to reexamination and that depends in turn on actual knowledge of how news and information imparted have been handled and on continuing reassurance that the handling has been discreet. This reassurance disappears when the reporter is called to testify behind closed doors.[34]

---

[26] 434 F. 2d at 1084 [emphasis added].

[27] In re Taylor, 412 Pa. 32, 41, 193 A.2d 181, 185 (1963).

[28] 434 F. 2d at 1085.

[29] Id.

[30] 383 U.S. 825 (1966).

[31] 434 F. 2d at 1861.

[32] Id. at 1091.

[33] Perhaps a limited application of the circuit court directive is justifiable where the court is willing to believe Caldwell that "there is nothing to which he could testify [which is not already public] that is not protected District Court's order."

The court felt that Caldwell's appearance alone at a secret hearing might be interpreted by the Panthers as a disclosure of trust. As a result, Caldwell's effectiveness as a reporter would be destroyed. Thus, the issue facing the court in this phase of the opinion was whether the threat to freedom of the press was justified by a demonstrated need for testimony as to matters not protected by the privilege. Finding that the government had not established a prior need for such non-privileged information, the court stated: "Since the cost to the public of excusing his attendance is so slight, it may be said that there is here no public interest of real substance in competition with the First Amendment freedoms that are jeopardized.[35]"

The court again applied a balancing of interests involved, and refused to compel attendance.

In excusing Caldwell's appearance, the Ninth Circuit departed from prior case law in two respects. First, the court recognized that nonattendance upon a court order may, on some occasions, be necessary to protect constitutional rights. Second, the government must establish a compelling national interest in the testimony when infringing upon freedom of the press.[36]

CONCLUSION

With its decision in Caldwell v. United States, the Ninth Circuit emerges as the first federal court to recognize a newsman's constitutional privilege to withhold confidential news sources and information. Under Caldwell, a reporter may refuse to appear and testify before a grand jury if: (1) to do so would endanger the unique trust and confidence between a reporter and his sensitive sources, and (2) the government cannot establish an overriding or compelling national interest in the information.

Other courts should be wary, however, of accepting the Caldwell case as precedent for granting a constitutional privilege to newsmen.[37] Instead of establishing a sound constitutional argument, the decision appears to rest upon the unique social and political exigencies involved. The sensitivity of Caldwell's news sources and public concern for channels of communication with the militant Panthers appear of paramount concern to the court. It is interesting to note, also, that the guidelines established by the court are remarkably similar to those issued on August 10, 1970 by Attorney General John N. Mitchell,[38] with one exception—the circuit court held that the courts are the proper forum to determine the propriety of the subpoenas, while Mr. Mitchell intended to reserve final judgment unto himself. Thus, the political and social atmosphere surrounding the controversy appear to have seriously influenced the court's decision. Perhaps a determination of the proper scope of free press as intended by the Constitution can issue only from the Supreme Court of the United States.

---

[34] 434 F. 2d at 1088.

[35] 434 F. 2d at 1089.

[36] The circuit court held that the compelling interest must be shown in advance of issuing the subpoena. However, the court felt that the fashioning of specific rules and procedures to accommodate this holding was better left to the district court.

[37] Since Caldwell, at least three courts have refused to grant a constitutional privilege to newsmen. In Re Pappas, 39 U.S.L.W. 2444 (Mass. Jan. 29, 1971); State v. Knops, 39 U.S.L.W. 2445 (Wisc. Feb. 2, 1971); U.S v. Calley, 39 U.S.L.W. 2463 (Army General Court-Martial, 5th Judg. Cir. Jan. 20, 1971).

In Pappas, the court refused "to adopt the broad conclusion of [Caldwell v. United States], that a newsman's privilege exists because of the First Amendment, [since] we would be engaging in judicial amendment of the Constitution or judicial legislation." In Knops and Calley, the courts distinguished Caldwell on the basis of factual differences.

[38] [The] Department [of Justice] does not approve of utilizing the press as a springboard for investigations . . . [T]here should be sufficient reason to believe that the information sought is essential to a successful investigation—particularly with reference to directly establishing guilt or innocence . . . [t]he government should have unsuccessfully attempted to obtain the information from alternative non-press sources . . . [Subpoenas] should normally be limited to the verification of published information and to such surrounding circumstances as relate to the accuracy of the published information. John N. Mitchell, "Free Press and Fair Trial: The Subpoena Controversy," address before House of Delegates, American Bar Association, (August 10, 1970).

In this context, it is worthy of note that the government did not seek review of the qualified privilege granted by the district in Caldwell.

MODEL NEWSMEN'S PROTECTION LAW FOR STATES

Approved by the Board of Directors and supported by resolution of the 1971 National Convention of Sigma Delta Chi.

No person shall be required in any proceeding or hearing to disclose any information or the source of any information procured or obtained by him while he was (a) engaged in gathering, writing, photographing or editing news and (b) employed by or acting for any organization engaged in publishing or broadcasting news, unless the body proposing to require disclosure of such information or source shall have first obtained a final order of a court, made after a hearing, and expressly finding:

(1) The existence of probable cause to believe that the witness or his sources has evidence which is relevant ond material to an issue properly pending before such body, and

(2) Disclosure by such person is the only method by which such evidence, or evidence of similar effect, can be obtained, and

(3) The failure of disclosure of such evidence will cause a miscarriage of justice.

[From the New York Times, April 7, 1970]

LIMITING THE SUBPOENA

"Our liberty," said Thomas Jefferson, "depends on the freedom of the press, and that cannot be limited without being lost."

The effort by the Department of Justice to infringe on a reporter's ability to gather news and to protect confidential material has been turned back by a United States District Court in San Francisco. The opinion by Federal Judge Alfonzo J. Zirpoli safeguards the public in two ways: It upholds the grand jury's right to summon a journalism to testify. and at the same time it upholds a journalist's right to protect private information and associations that, if revealed, could drastically curtail his ability to function under the First Amendment.

The judicial ruling held that centuries of experience have found that freedom of speech, press and association are indispensable to the survival of a free society. These freedoms are inviolate, Judge Zirpoli said, "until there has been a clear showing of a compelling and overriding national interest that cannot be served by alternative means." The burden of proving such a grave exception to the normal gathering, reporting and protection of the news is placed on the Government—a proof that must be made to the satisfaction of the court.

No such exception existed in the case of Earl Caldwell, a New York Times reporter, who was called upon to give testimony about interviews with Black Panther party members. While holding that Mr. Caldwell had the same responsibility as any other citizen to appear before a grand jury in response to a subpoena, Judge Zirpoli ruled that he was entitled to a protective order limiting the questions he could be asked. The attempt to quash the subpoena was denied but the court upheld the alternative remedy of restricting the subpoena "to protect Mr. Caldwell's confidential relations."

The Department of Justice first subpoenaed the reporter to testify and to bring his personal notes and tape reportings, a requirement that was legally resisted by The Times with the support of many other news agencies and communications media. The second subpoena simply required his personal appearance, which Mr. Caldwell as citizen and journalist must obey, subject to the immunities ordered by the judge.

The First Amendment, the rights of the public and the responsible functioning of the reporting process have been sustained in San Francisco.

[From The Washington Post, Aug. 13, 1970]

NEWSMEN AS WITNESSES

From our point of view—which is admittedly and obviously an interested one—approximately two cheers seem to be in order for Attorney General Mitchell's statement respecting the issuance of subpoenas for news media personnel or property. During the past year or so, federal prosecutors have taken to issuing subpoenas to newsmen and their employers with a kind of reckless abandon that seems to us full of peril for the freedom of the press. Newsmen who are forced to turn informer in the name of law enforcement, forced to tell in public what they were told in confidence and forced, in addition perhaps, to divulge the sources of their information, are likely to be heavily handicapped in the gathering of news. And the burden of that handicap is certain to be borne by the readers who depend upon them for information.

One cheer is due Mr. Mitchell for his recognition that the issuance of subpoenas to newsmen has an important impact on First Amendment freedoms. The guidelines promulgated by the Department of Justice acknowledge that the "compulsory process in some circumstances may have a limiting effect on the exercise of First Amendment rights." That's an understatement; but it's better than a flat denial. A second cheer is due for Mr. Mitchell's evident desire to be discriminating and restrained in authorizing subpoenas. They are to be authorized, the guidelines say, only when they are requisite to the fair administration of justice, only after negotiations with the media, only when other attempts to get the needed information have failed and only with his express personal approval.

This newspaper is convinced, nevertheless, as we have said in an amicus brief filed in the Earl Caldwell case, that "the First Amendment grants to newsmen a constitutional privilege, absolute and unqualified, to refuse in all circumstances, without penalty, to divulge to anyone any information or source, confidential or otherwise, which they obtain in the course of their professional newsgathering activities."

Undoubtedly, such an absolute privilege may entail a loss under some circumstances to law enforcement and the administration of justice. The same may be said about exercise of the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination, about the privilege generally extended to communications between husbands and wives, lawyers and clients, doctors and patients, priests and penitents and about the exclusion of evidence obtained unlawfully. All these are sometimes used as justification for withholding from a grand jury or a court information which might be of very considerable value. But the community has deemed the cost to justice a price worth paying for the vital social values conserved by the granting of the privilege.

A privileged status for newsmen in the discharge of their professional duties serves even more important social values. For as Supreme Court Justice Frank Murphy said 20-odd years ago, "A free press lies at the heart of our democracy and its preservation is essential to the survival of liberty. Any inroad made upon the constitutional protection of a free press tends to undermine the freedom of all men to print and to read the truth."

If newsmen began to act as informers or as investigative agents of the government, invaluable sources of information would cease to trust them. The free flow of news has not dried up before now for two reasons. One is that prosecutors and policemen have generally respected the special situation of newsmen, have acted as though the First Amendment privilege was a fact. The other reason is that newsmen have traditionally accepted fine or imprisonment rather than disclose confidential sources or information when prosecutors have tried to breach the privilege. Whenever newsmen have thus defied constituted authority, the public has tended to honor rather than to condemn them, as though this martyrdom were a sort of noblesse oblige of their calling. But it is at once foolish and unfair to impose such punishment on persons serving the public interest. Besides, news sources may not always rely on the willingness of newsmen to go to prison.

The preservation of a free press should not depend upon the caprice of government officials or upon the readiness of individual newsmen to sacrifice themselves for the sake of their sources. Rather, the responsibility for preserving a freely functioning press should be assumed by the government, and particularly by the courts, as guardians of a Constitution which guaranteed an independent press because such a press was deemed indispensable to a free and self-governing society.

[From the New York Times, Nov. 20, 1970]

PROTECTING BASIC FREEDOMS

The decision of the United States Court of Appeals in San Francisco requiring the Government to show a "compelling need" for a journalist's evidence before ordering him to testify in secret grand jury hearings gives new protection to essential press freedoms that are particularly vital "in times of widespread protest and dissent."

The Ninth Circuit ruling gives realistic recognition to the public stake in keeping informed about the plans, philosophy and activities by such revolutionary groups as the Black Panthers through channels that go beyond propaganda statements. Access to such information is jeopardized when these groups, inherently distrustful of the "establishment," are made to fear that newsgatherers in whom they have confided can be called behind locked doors and forced to turn state informer.

Even though the judges leave to the district court the responsibility for fashioning specific rules and procedures, the decision marks another long step away from the dragnet subpoenas the Justice Department issued with such abandon to various newspapers, news magazines and television networks earlier this year.

The San Francisco case arises out of attempts to call Earl Caldwell, a reporter for The Times, before a grand jury investigating the Black Panthers. The original subpoena was circumscribed by District Judge Alfonzo J. Zirpoli to limit any grand jury questions that required Mr. Caldwell to disclose confidential information given to him in his journalistic capacity.

The appeals court rightly recognized that even this protection might prove insufficient to preserve the bonds of trust the Panthers had come to have in Mr. Caldwell's integrity as a reporter.

"The secrecy that surrounds grand jury testimony necessarily introduces uncertainty in the minds of those who fear a betrayal of their confidences," the court noted. It added that the facts in the Caldwell case indicated that his capacity as a newsgatherer might well be destroyed with no real benefit to the grand jury in terms of the information he could add to its record.

Unquestionably, there will continue to be differences of opinion between the press and the courts on the criteria to be applied in establishing a compelling governmental need for a reporter's appearance behind the closed doors of the grand jury. But certainly there can be no valid challenge of the Court of Appeals finding that "to convert newsgatherers into Department of Justice investigators is to invade the autonomy of the press by imposing a governmental function upon them."

The dangers involved in such a trespass on press freedom make it essential that subpoenas be confined only to those cases in which there is a clear and demonstrable need for a reporter's testimony in the public interest. And even then the most tightly defined restrictions must be laid down to guard against destruction of confidence.

[From the National Observer July 19, 1971]

PRIVILEGES FOR JOURNALISTS

(By Michael Malloy)

Some journalists may be asking for too much of a good thing by trying to expand freedom of the press to the point where it spares them from any scrutiny of the way they collect and edit the news. Many members of our trade are now insisting on a right to protect their notes, film, and news sources from any congressional or legal inquiry.

Newsmen should, of course, be protected from fishing expeditions by congressmen or prosecutors who merely want to ransack their files in the hope of digging up something to pin on people or organizations they don't like. Some of the pending cases may be of this nature, and one would hope that the courts on a case-by-case basis would not allow it.

But protecting the press and broadcasting from wrongful inquiry is a different thing from insisting on blanket protection from any inquiry at all. A congressional look at the way some news is reported might be useful, for instance, in rewriting the Government secrecy regulations that newsmen so often complain about. And if a crime has been committed, and a newsman knows a lot about it, he should be obliged to testify in court, just as any other citizen would be.

That is the issue in two recent press controversies. An underground newspaper in Madison, Wis., claimed First Amendment protection from revealing its special knowledge about a fatal bombing there. A Washington reporter claimed First Amendment protection against revealing the source of a story for which the newsman himself is defendant in a libel suit, surely one case in which his reportage is a fit subject—almost the only subject—for a court inquiry.

These demands for legal privileges beyond those of ordinary citizens are in a different category from the New York Times' recent defense of the right to publish a news story without censorship by the Government. The Times was defending the freedom of speech and publication that the Constitution grants to all Americans. The special protection demanded in these other cases would apply only to the press, and make of its employes a legally privileged class like doctors and lawyers.

But doctors and lawyers get these privileges at a cost the press cannot afford. They are licensed by the state. Lawyers, in fact, are officers of the judicial branch of government. Nothing could be more disastrous to the freedom of the press than to demand analogous rights and thereby leave the press open to analogous regulation.

Right now the First Amendment gives every American the right to speak and publish as he likes, be he a Mafia capo or a bomb-throwing Weatherman. But should a capo be free from inquiry about a "syndicate" crime conference if he says he attended in his capacity as a reporter for the Cosa Nostra Daily? Should a Weatherman be spared from testifying because he took notes for the underground press while his friends were fusing dynamite?

The answer is no. If the answer were yes, the grant of special privileges would eventually be attended by some means of licensing the members of the press so that everyone couldn't enjoy their immunity. The First Amendment freedoms that now belong to all of us would be contracted, not extended. Licensed newsmen would be in danger of becoming officers of the state, like lawyers, instead of its watchdogs. That is the very evil they think they are opposing when they demand legal rights that other citizens don't have.

[From The Wall Street Journal, Feb. 6, 1959]

IN QUEST OF THE NEWS, DO NEWSMEN HAVE A "RIGHT" ALWAYS TO HIDE SOURCES?

(By William H. Fitzpatrick)

(The question whether newsmen should ever be required to reveal a source of information has been much in the news lately. This is a condensation of a talk before the New York State Society of Newspaper Editors on the subject. It was delivered by William H. Fitzpatrick, associate editor of The Wall Street Journal.)

The proposition that newspapermen ought not be required to reveal their sources of information—under any conceivable circumstances—deserves to be questioned on at least two grounds.

One is the relation of this suggested privilege to the public good. The other is to ask how the nation's press, the acknowledged champions of the right of the public to know all where the public interest is involved, can at the same time champion for itself a privilege to remain silent on matters that may also involve the public interest.

The argument goes that if the privilege is not granted, newspapers will not be able to gather news as heretofore. It is also said that a number of states have granted such a privilege. The answer to that, it seems plain, is that an equal number of states have refused to grant such a privilege though the legislatures have considered it. And newspapers in about two dozen other states have got along nicely without such a law.

It is said further that the newspaper privilege sought is similar to that known in the law as the priest-penitent, lawyer-client, doctor-patient and husband-wife privileges. It might help us to examine these privileges.

The priest-penitent privilege is based on the belief that if a man goes to his clergyman to confess a crime the clergyman more than likely will try to persuade him to make amends and to go to the police.

The doctor-patient privilege goes back to medieval times also, when it was believed in the interest of the public to have ill persons seek treatment to prevent the spread of disease. But this privilege has its limitations. There is no doctor-patient privilege now in existence where crime is committed. And doctors have been required to testify about the way a man treated for gunshot wounds came by his hurts, how an accident occurred as a result of which the driver was treated, and whether the driver was drunk.

LIMITED PRIVILEGE

The lawyer-client privilege isn't nearly so broad as a great many of us think, either. This privilege rests on the argument that confidence between lawyer and client serves the ends of justice since a lawyer can advise his client better—sometimes by telling him to plead guilty—for knowing all the facts. But lawyers have been made to reveal the identity of a person hiring them to represent someone else, and to disclose the names of persons for whom they have put money in the bank.

Finally, we come to the husband-wife privilege. This also is an ancient one. The judges knew that to ask a spouse to testify against a spouse was to put an extra burden on marital relations. Further, husbands and wives just weren't to be trusted with the truth where the other was involved. But in most states now, husbands and wives are fully competent to testify for or against the other in civil cases, as any reader of the daily press well knows. And in most states the so-called "privilege" does not now extend to any "crime committed by one against the other."

So far as Federal courts are concerned, Justice Sutherland, speaking for the majority of the Supreme Court, held in Funk v. U.S. that the disqualification of the wife to testify for the husband was no longer part of the modern common law as administered in Federal courts.

Obviously, the so-called lawyer-client, doctor-patient, husband-wife privileges aren't nearly so broad as they probably are thought to be. They have been narrowed in the interests of the administration of justice. At the same time, newspapers should remember that even these privileges exact a price. Lawyers and doctors are answerable to the State, for they are licensed. Are newspapermen willing to submit to licensing by State or Federal boards?

So a lot of questions arise. They are not new; they arose when in 1949 the New York State Law Revision Commission went pretty thoroughly into this question.

MANY QUESTIONS

Some of them are: What sorts of news-gathering and news-dissemination would come within the scope of such a law? Everybody? Or, if not everybody, just a few? Publishers as well as reporters? What of a crime that the reporter himself observes? And what if he participates in it? What about the nature of the news in question? Assuming that the public interest may be well served by refusal to divulge a source of information when a mayor's official misdeeds are exposed, is there a like service to the public interest in permitting a reporter to use the privilege where the private indiscretions of a private citizen are concerned? Should the privilege exist only in criminal cases? What about libel actions? What about grand juries? Or legislative bodies?

In a word, should the privilege be an absolute, or should there be left with the courts or other bodies discretionary power to permit or to withhold the compulsion to testify?

The questions were asked and answered by the Law Revision Commission in this way: An unconditional privilege granted to newsmen to refuse to divulge the sources of information of news stories would be against the public interest. But a privilege containing safeguards essential to the protection of the public interest could safely be granted. In other words, where the public interest was deemed paramount, courts should require that sources be revealed.

Let it be noted that for many newspapermen there are circumstances under which no power on earth could force them to reveal a source of information. Let us assume the writer is handed by a person in a Federal bureau a set of documents. These documents clearly prove that some funny business in contracts has been going. After due checking, the story is printed, and it stands up.

A Congressional investigation follows, the newspaperman is sworn as a witness and on the stand is asked the name of his informant.

Congress doesn't get it because the name of the informant isn't pertinent and the man's identity is not at all necessary to serve the ends of justice. The disclosure could, however, serve the ends of unjust vengeance. And if Congress should vote the newsman in contempt, the Department of Justice should indict him, and a Federal judge sentence him, he might have to live for a time in jail. But he could also live with himself.

Now imagine another situation. A newsman is investigating a report that the local bank is in trouble because somebody has lifted some money. So he goes to the bank president who says the cashier stole $10,000 but please don't quote him as saying so. Instead of digging further, the newsmen writes a story saying that an official of the bank says Joe Johnson, the cashier, stole $10,000; and let's also assume the newspaper is foolish enough to print it as it stands.

CIVIL SUIT

The police grab Joe Johnson and throw him in jail and after a few days of polite questioning, they turn him loose. He hasn't stolen the money at all, it seems. Joe Johnson sues the bank for what happened to him, and the newsman is called as a witness in a civil suit. Can it seriously be claimed this newsman would be entitled to refuse to reveal the source of his information under oath, in a trial to arrive at justice to Joe Johnson, on either moral or legal grounds? Will anyone argue that he is not himself obstructing justice by refusing to testify?

In these cases particular stress has been laid on the word "justice"—indeed, the key is what is the "just" thing to do. The point is not a minor one, for justice is and ought to be the first tenet of responsible newspapermen, just as the public interest, as individual newspapers determine it, ought to be a basic principle of every newspaper.

Indeed, the press freedom anchored in Article I of the Bill of Rights of the Constitution was placed there in the public interest. The founders believed that a freedom to print was necessary to preserve most other freedoms of free men. But it should be remembered that freedom to print is not an irresponsible freedom nor an unlimited one. I need not remind any editor of Justice Holmes' famous remark that "freedom of speech does not include shouting fire in a crowded theater."

Neither is press freedom all that some of us, from time to time, might like it to mean. There are other freedoms possessed by others that sometimes clash with it, and one of them is directly concerned with bearing witness.

Articles VI and VII of the Bill of Rights have to do with criminal trials and civil suits. All criminal trials, and civil suits where the value of the controversy exceeds $20, have guarantees for jury trials, for speedy and public trials, and guarantees of compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in the defendant's favor. Compulsory process means the right to subpoena and the right of trial judges to hold witnesses in contempt for refusal to testify.

There is no exception to this Constitutional right to summon witnesses that excludes newsmen from the same responsibility to serve the public interest required of everybody else.

ARROGANT POWER

And we had best be careful about attempts to broaden freedom of the press lest we be accused of seeking not just liberty to print, but license to print. We may believe that complete immunity will serve a responsible press, but others may well believe that it will lead to irresponsibility flowing from an arrogant power to hold ourselves unaccountable for what we print.

But let us not think for a moment that such a result would ever come about; the result from attempts to grant immunity may be an entirely different one, and one we may well come to fear. Let us take a look at the sort of legislation I have in mind.

Under a bill introduced in Congress, newspapers would have an immunity from revealing sources of information—except where military security is concerned. Well, what department or bureau in Washington these days could not claim at least a peripheral interest in military security, since military security and national security are inexorably linked?

And there is another point, perhaps the most important of all, that ought to be considered.

If newspapers support the proposition that immunity of newspapermen from testimony can be limited in any way for any purpose by Act of Congress, they are supporting a proposition that grants Congress a limiting power. Will the exclusions grow from military security, once the philosophy of limitation is adopted, to such things as "except where an official's reputation," or even a Congressman's chances for reelection, may be injured?

As things are now, there are no spelled-out rights to refuse to testify as to the sources of information nor are there any spelled-out acts of Congress that would force disclosure.

In this, newspapermen are perhaps fortunate. For it permits the individual newspaperman to choose his course, right or wrong, according to his own principles. Balanced against the individual's concepts will be the concept of the individual court asto whether the cause of justice is served or not by the refusal.

It suggests something considerably less than a posture we can take pride in to ask that newspapers be granted an immunity broader than anyone else possesses under the Constitution. Is it possible that we are so blind as to believe we can have it both ways—that we can demand full disclosure where all others are concerned but deny it where we are concerned?

Or is it possible that, if we follow such a course, the public will some day wonder whose interest, ours or the public's is our real concern?

"THE PENTAGON PAPERS" CASE

[From The New York Times, July 1, 1971]

'AN ENLIGHTENED PEOPLE'

The historic decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the United States Government vs. The New York Times and The Washington Post is a ringing victory for freedom under law. By lifting the restraining order that had prevented this and other newspapers from publishing the hitherto secret Pentagon Papers, the nation's highest tribunal strongly reaffirmed the guarantee of the people's right to know, implicit in the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

This was the essence of what The New York Times and other newspapers were fighting for and this is the essence of the Court's majority opinions. The basic question, which goes to the very core of the American political system, involved the weighing by the Court of the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom against the Government's power to restrict that freedom in the name of national security. The Supreme Court did not hold that the First Amendment gave an absolute right to publish anything under all circumstances. Nor did The Times seek that right. What The Times sought and what the Court upheld, was the right to publish these particular documents at this particular time without prior Governmental restraint.

The crux of the problem lay indeed in this question of prior restraint. For the first time in the history of the United States, the Federal Government had sought through the courts to prevent publication of material that it maintained would do "irreparable injury" to the national security if spread before the public. The Times, supported in this instance by the overwhelming majority of the American press, held on the contrary that it was in the national interest to publish this information, which was historic rather than current operational nature.

If the documents had involved troop movements, ship sailings, imminent military plans, the case might have been quite different; and in fact The Times would not have endeavored to publish such material. But this was not the case; the documents and accompanying analysis are historic, in no instance going beyond 1968, and incapable in 1971 of harming the life of a single human being or interfering with any current military operation. The majority oof the Court clearly recognized that embarrassment of public officials in the past—or even in the present—is insufficient reason to overturn what Justice White described as "the concededly extraordinary protection against prior restraint under our constitutional system."

So far as the Government's classification of the material is concerned, it is quite true, as some of our critics have observed, that "no one elected The Times" to declassify it. But it is also true, as the Court implicitly recognizes, that the public interest is not served by classification and retention in secret form of vast amounts of information, 99.5 per cent of which a retired senior civil servant recently testified "could not be prejudicial to the defense interests of the nation."

Out of this case should surely come a total revision of governmental procedures and practice in the entire area of classification of documents.

Everyone who has ever had anything to do with such documents knows that for many years the classification procedures have been hopelessly muddled by inertia, timidity and sometimes even stupidity and venality.

Beyond all this, one may hope that the entire exercise will induce the present Administration to re-examine its own attitudes toward secrecy, suppression and restriction of the libertries of free man in a free society. The issue the Supreme Court decided yesterday touched the heart of this republic; and we fully realize that this is not so much a victory for any particular newspaper as it is for the basic principles of freedom on which the American form of government rests. This is really the profound message of yesterday's decision, in which this newspaper rejoices with humility and with the consciousness that the freedom thus reaffirmed carries with it, as always, the reciprocal obligation to present the truth to the American public so far as it can be determined. That is, in fact, why the Pentagon material had to be published. It is only with the fullest possible understanding of the facts and of the background of any policy decision that the American people can be expected to play the role required of them in this democracy.

It would be well for the present Administration, in the light of yesterday's decision, to reconsider with far more care and understanding than it has in the past, the fundamental importance of individual freedoms—including especially freedom of speech, of the press, of assembly—to the life of the American democracy. "Without an informed and free press," as Justice Stewart said, "there cannot be an enlightened people."

[From The Washington Post, July 1, 1971]

THE PENTAGON PAPERS: FREE—AT LAST

"Our democracy depends for its future on the informed will of the majority, and it is the purpose and the effect of the First Amendment to expose to the public the maximum amount of information on which sound judgment can be made by the electorate. The equities favor disclosure, not suppression. No one can measure the effects of even a momentary delay."

This passage from the ruling of U.S. District Court Judge Gerhard Gesell on June 21, 1971, comes close to summing up our own views in the case of the United States Government vs. The Washington Post—and, frankly, we would have preferred to leave it at that. Instead, the issue moved up to the Supreme Court and yesterday the government's plea for a restraining order against this newspaper and The New York Times was dismissed by a vote of 6-to-3. Perhaps the best way we can express our gratification with the outcome is to refer you to page one where we are resuming publication today of material from the Pentagon papers, otherwise known as the "History of U.S. Decision-Making Process on Vietnam Policy." That we are again free to print this material is an undoubted gain if only because to have remained under restraint would have been an immeasurable loss not for us alone, nor for the press alone, but for the public, and for the country, and for the democratic processes: It is the purpose and the effect of the First Amendment to expose to the public the maximum amount of informatioon on which sound judgment can be made by the electorate.

But it has to be added that from the beginning of this unprecedented confrontation between press and government, the issue has not only been what we could print but also when. So it cannot be forgotten now that for a period of more than two weeks, in the case of The Times, and ten days in the case of The Post, and for shorter spans in the case of the Boston Globe and the St. Louis Post Dispatch, newspapers in this country, abiding by court orders, have, in effect, been prevented by government from publishing certain material. It is not enough to say that the material in question was historical (and therefore hardly urgent) because even history, freshly authenticated and in compelling detail, has the capacity to shape contemporary events. Another time we might be dealing with information of far greater urgency and no one can measure the effects of even a momentary delay.

It can hardly be said, then, that yesterday's Supreme Court opinion, together with six separate concurrences and three separate dissents, effectively comes to terms with the tormenting issue at the heart of this dispute—the government's right of prior restraint of the press. It does not resolve the dilemma posed by the First Amendment's protections of the press, on the one hand, and the government's undoubted right to protect security on the other. For what the court majority seems to be saying, without attempting in this space to take into account the many conflicting conclusions stated by all nine justices, is that the government failed to make its point—not that a point was not necessarily there to be made. Some justices saw merit in the government's argument, as to the facts, and others were at pains to suggest that the government's point might better be made in a different way—through criminal penalties for publication of at least some parts of this material.

So there is not all that much comfort, let alone clearcut law, to be found in yesterday's outcome, though in fairness to the Court and to the government, the affair of the Pentagon papers was an exceedingly difficult case on which to rest broad principles of law; it involved a breakdown of government security of such scope and magnitude that relief from the courts, in any practical sense, was probably never within the government's reach. It seems doubtful, in short, that we will see its likes again, and this says several, in some ways contradictory, things to us, not least of which is that the losses and gains on both sides can best be measured, not in theoretical law, but in real and practical terms.

We were dealing here, presumably, with 7,000 pages of classified material, some of it rated exceedingly sensitive. So it is not entirely surprising that the courts should have been reluctant to dismiss the government's plea out of hand—although the District Court here did just that. On the other hand, the sheer bulk of the material and the manifest insensitivity, in any real sense, of so much of it, necessarily undermined the government's argument, which came down in the end to a plea for highly selective restraints by the courts against only a small portion of the whole. Out of this process, perhaps, may come a positive boon in terms of a thorough re-examination of the classification procedures of the government; for even the government's counsel, as well as the administration, conceded along the way that the existing practices result in massive over-classification of material, for far too long a time.

But the real lesson of this affair, in practical terms, lies elsewhere, or so it seems to us, for what we have been witnessing over the past two weeks has been a belated and very nearly frantic effort by the government to remove from the public domain what should never have been lost—and under circumstances that are quite unlikely to repeat themselves. It has not been often in our history that a newspaper has found itself in possession of so prodigious an amount of classified material, and has begun to publish it, with a clear statement of what it had in hand, and a plain forewarning of what was still to come; such an opportunity for prior restraint does not normally present itself. And neither, for that matter does the government often bundle together quite such an extraordinary load of classified material and leave it lying around quite so negligently.

The very uniqueness of this affair, in other words, has grossly distorted the realities, which are that the government has a very broad grant of authority to conduct its activities in secret, and enormous power to preserve its essential secrets, and an impressive record of doing so. That it failed to do so in this case was never an argument, in our view, for suspending the First Amendment rights of the press or for limiting the prerogative of the press to exercise its own judgment in the handling of these documents. Still less was it an argument for denying the public its right to be informed.

[From The Washington Post, June 27, 1971]

THE PRESS AS ADVERSARY

(By William Greider, a Washington Post Staff Writer)

The struggle is older than the republic—government men telling newspaper men not to print something, warning that national security was endangered, and newspaper men ignoring the advice at their peril, even before they had the First Amendment to protect their freedom.

Gen. George Washington complained about leaks harmful to the Continental Army, although he did not seek any injunctions.

"It is much to be wished," Washington wrote in 1777, "that our Printers were more discreet in many of their Publications. We see almost in every Paper, Proclamations or accounts transmitted by the Enemy, of an injurious nature. If some hint or caution could be given them on the subject, it might be of material Service."

Gen. Sherman, during the Civil War, proposed the ultimate solution. He arrested one of Horace Greeley's battlefield correspondents from the New York Herald, charged him with spying and prepared to shoot him. President Lincoln's intervention saved the reporter's life, but it did not alter Gen. Sherman's opinion of the profession. When Sherman heard that three correspondents were killed by artillery, the general remarked, "Good, now we shall have news from hell before breakfast."

A SPECTACULAR LEAK

At the outset of World War II, President Franklin D. Roosevelt ordered an investigation of the Chicago Tribune and the Washington Times-Herald for a truly spectacular leak—one which makes the current flap over Vietnam policy papers seem pallid by comparison. On Dec. 4, 1941, three days before the attack on Pearl Harbor, both of those newspapers printed the U.S. government's secret war mobilization plans. Despite the air of crisis and considerable fuss, the Tribune was neither enjoined nor indicted.

Frank C. Waldrop, who was then political and foreign editor of the Times-Herald, wrote of the conflict-in-purposes some years afterwards when political passions had cooled:

"We saw it as simple truth that Mr. Roosevelt was out to lie the United States into war with Germany. And after we published, there were those who saw it as simple truth that we were deliberate traitors and intentional agents of the Nazis."

The truth in these matters, as Waldorp observed years later, is never quite so simple. Committed to isolationism, the Chicago Tribune and Times-Herald editors who broke the secret war plans believed the revelation might save Americans from being drawn into a long war in Europe in which they felt America did not belong.

The documents were leaked, however, by someone with the opposite purpose—"a general of high renown," according to Waldrop, who regarded war in Europe as inevitable but feared the United States was ill-prepared. The general felt the "Victory Program," once published, would mobilize American public opinion in favor of greater armaments.

The editors, of course, did not know that war was only three days away. Neither did the general whose only purpose was bigger appropriations for the Army Air Corps. Nor did the isolationist senator, Burton K. Wheeler of Montana, who delivered the secret papers to the Tribune.

FDR ordered the Army and the Justice Department to investigate. The attorney general thought the Espionage Act had been violated. Yet nothing happened; the matter was allowed to drop quietly.

Perhaps, it was because the "Victory Program" dealt primarily with Europe and became moot when Japan attacked in the Pacific. Or, as Waldrop suggests, perhaps FDR himself closed the case when he discovered that one of his best commanders was the source of the leak.

The final irony, established years later by historians, was that this enormous breach of security by two newspapers had virtually no impact on events. When the German commanders read the U.S. plans to raise an army of 10 million men, they immediately urged Hitler to close the Russian front and shift their defenses to the Mediterranean and Western Europe. Hitler ignored their warnings.

A SERIES OF SHOWDOWNS

Over the years, the adversary relationship between press and government has been defined by occasional showdowns such as these—just as another important benchmark in the meaning of "freedom of the press" has been drawn by the current litigation over whether the press can print classified Pentagon documents on the origins of the Vietnam war.

The sporadic clashes, more than the ordinary harmony, provide the meaning for these words: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances."

Now history records that the first newspaper publisher in America, one Benjamin Harris, was a bigot, an opportunist, an all-purpose scoundrel who also had bad news judgment. Some would insist, no doubt, that the tradition flourishes still.

Nevertheless, what Harris started in Boston in 1690 with the first edition of "Publick Occurrences Both Foreign and Domestic" was an historic departure—an unauthorized newspaper, printed without the consent or prior approval of the local government. It lasted one issue.

As media historian John Tebbel has recounted, the Bay Colony put Harris out of business, not because he was virulently anti-Catholic or because he "leaked" official secrets. The trouble was that Harris concocted his own secrets—wild stories about Indians and allied nations which were sure to damage the King's diplomatic relations.

Since nobody dreamed that a publisher would print such stuff without the government's approval, it was universally assumed that Harris's stories, true or false, were officially certified. To prove the contrary, the government had to seize the edition and destroy it.

There was a lesson in that—for the second publisher in America. When the Boston News-Letter appeared, it proclaimed in bold type: "Published by Authority," meaning that the content met the prior approval of the government.

THE 'RADICAL' FRANKLINS

The exceptions however, defined the future. James Franklin, Ben's older brother, started a monthly in 1718 called the New England Courant and, in his very first issue, attacked the venerable and powerful preacher Cotton Mather (because Mather advocated inoculation). Franklin was arrested. When he persisted in his independence, the colonial council later issued a sweeping decree prohibiting him from printing anything "except that it first be supervised by the Secretary of his province."

His younger brother Ben took over the paper and continued to dissent in print from the official viewpoint. Later, the brothers parted and Ben Franklin went to Philadelphia, where he edited his own newspaper so brilliantly under this credo:

"If all printers were determined not to print anything till they were sure it would offend nobody, there would be very little printed."

As the colonial government and its interests diverged more and more from the people who were governed, the idea of free and independent newspapers became more crucial. The most celebrated conflict was the criminal indictment for libel in 1773 against John Peter Zenger, who printed in his New York Weekly Journal what everyone already knew—that the royal governor of New York was a lazy lecher.

The law and the case precedents were all against Zenger, but his lawyer got him off with revolutionary eloquence addressed to the jury. He attacked: "Men who injure and oppress the people under their administration, provoke them to cry out and complain, and then make that very complaint the foundation for new oppressions and prosecutions."

The idea persisted, despite threats and intimidation from the King and his agents. By the start of the Revolution, "patriot papers" were operating throughout the colonies—"publishing in the front room and sedition in the back," as Tebbel described them. The Boston Gazette office—where the Tea Party was probably planned—was high on the British list of places to capture when the fighting began.

Out of this tradition, the First Amendment established the broad protection from government supervision which newspapers claim and which is tested periodically in conflict. In the abstract principle, the main check upon newspapers would be the reading public, the free marketplace of ideas, and all that. In practice, the government has sometimes indeed had to protect the press from the public: probably more newspapers have been closed down by angry mobs than by federal marshals.

The idea of many, competing editorial voices survived the great trial of the republic's early years when, as always, the press endangered the limits of freedom by its own excesses. George Washington grumbled, but did not use official power against the newspaper which greeted his Farewell Address with the remark: "If ever a nation was debauched by a man, the American nation has been debauched by Washington."

When Federalist papers directed the same sort of venom at President Thomas Jefferson, he complained too, but stood by the principle that he had advocated: "No government ought to be without censors and where the press is free, no one ever will. If virtuous, it need not fear the fair operation of attack and defense. Nature has given to man no other means of sifting out the truth either in religion, law or politics."

In that spirit, President James Madison did not suppress the Federal Republican in Baltimore when it attacked him during the War of 1812, although the newspaper was widely accused of treason—and a mob destroyed it.

LIMITS REMAIN

The great legal questions which have flowed from this principle of free expression have, generally speaking, broadened that freedom progressively through the years—decisions which made it easier for newspapers to get information from the government, made it harder for people and, especially politicians, to sue newspapers for libel, and liberalized the legal definitions of obscenity and subversion to the point where it is difficult to prosecute a publisher for either.

But limitations remain. Newspapers have been closed by government action, though not by the kind of limited injunction the Justice Department has been seeking against printing specific material in The New York Times, The Washington Post and the Boston Globe. If not closed, they have been threatened or penalized. Like the current episode, the most climactic clashes developed over protecting national security.

During the Civil War, President Jefferson Davis and his Confederate generals were faithful readers of the Yankee press, gleaning details of enemy troop movements (presumably, Union generals also followed dispatches from the Press Association of the Confederate States of America which covered the war for 43 dailies in the South).

Gen. Sherman blamed his setbacks on newspaper leaks (newspapers, for their part, reported that the general was insane). Lincoln issued a sweeping order reminding the legion of battlefield correspondents that they could be court-martialed for espoinage if their reporting aided the enemy. Some newspapers characterized the Commander-in-Chief as "a slang-whanging stump-speaker" and "half-witted usurper" and "mole-eyed."

Besides the press-security conflict on the battlefield, the government dealt more severely with homefront disloyalty—the pro-slavery Copperhead newspapers which made mischief throughout the war.

The Chicago Times was under a seizure order issued by Gen. Burnsides, then reversed by President Lincoln (the excitement was credited with reviving the paper's failing circulation). The Philadelphia Evening Journal was suppressed; so was the Christian Observer. A New York grand jury attacked the disloyalty of five local newspapers and the editor of the Ohio Statesman was indicted, but died before his trial.

In 1864, the New York World and the Journal of Commerce were closed down by troops for two days after they printed a bogus presidential proclamation announcing a new draft call of 400,000 men. The New Orleans Picayune, which reprinted the phony story, was closed for two weeks.

Some of the same questions arose during World War I and the government employed a pressure tactic which folded some publications without violating the contemporary interpretation of the Constitution—revoking their mailing privileges. More than 75 papers felt this threat from the Post Office Department; some of them succumbed and legal challenges failed.

In covering the war, a "voluntary censorship" was accepted by the newspapers to get accreditation for their correspondents. Generally, it worked, although The Washington Post and the Hearst newspapers, among others, were accused of breaking the rules on several occasions.

During World War II, the pattern was similar. Most conventional newspapers learned to live with "voluntary censorship," but the national security was invoked against the eccentric, like Father Charles E. Coughlin's right-wing

"Social Justice," closed down after he was threatened under the 1917 Espionage Act. Some 30 publications were indicted for disloyalty, according to Frank Luther Mott, journalism's authoritative historian. Others lost their postal permits.

Col. Robert R. McCormick's Chicago Tribune, bitterly against American intervention and on mutually venomous terms with the President, had the most celebrated confrontations. Besides printing the U.S. war plans before the war had started, the Tribune was accused of leaking the fact in 1942 that the United States had broken the Japanese naval code—a feat which won the Battle of Midway and promised future naval victories until its revelation.

The accusation was based on the Tribune's detailed account of the battle—which was so complete the government claimed it could only reveal to the Japanese that their code was broken. The newspaper always denied the charge and a federal grand jury in Chicago investigated the incident, then dropped it. In hindsight, Pentagon secret-keepers acknowledged in 1954 that the Japanese did not find any significance in the Tribune's original story, and were not even alerted by the political flap surrounding it. The lesson, according to Pentagon officials, was that once a serious leak occurs, it may be better to ignore it.

UNEXPLORED QUESTIONS

Whatever else may be said about him, the late Col. McCormick was more consistent than some of his fellow publishers on one point—his deep suspicion of government interference with the press. The Chicago Tribune championed the cause in 1927 of an obscure Minneapolis publication called The Saturday Press, threatened with a court injunction putting it out of businss as "malicious, scandalous and defamatory."

The legal test which followed, Near v. Minnesota, was financed by the colonel and other publishers, providing the one clear Supreme Court precedent for the current controversy over prior restraint. In that 1931 decision, the Supreme Court held that Minnesota could not regulate a newspaper the way it might penalize a dairy that sells bad milk or a stockbroker who defrauds his customers.

"The fact that the liberty of the press may be abused by miscreant purveyors of scandal does not make any the less necessary the immunity of the press from previous restraint in dealing with official misconduct," the court declared. "Subsequent punishment for such abuses as may exist is the appropriate remedy, consistent with constitutional privilege."

The Supreme Court, however, noted that even that rule is not absolute. It suggested some exceptions when a government might reasonably seek an injunction to prevent a publication: to avoid obstruction to its recruiting program or the revelation of troop-movement schedules, or to protect the community against incitement to riot or the violent overthrow of the government.

In just the last few years, a new reading of the First Amendment has been developed by some legal scholars which puts modern newspaper management on the defensive. The theory holds that "freedom of the press" belongs to everyone, not just the people who own the newspapers, and the crucial test is whether everyone's viewpoint is given fair access to the news columns. That departure raises deep and largely unexplored questions about who controls the printing presses and whether monopoly ownership inhibits the freedom protected by the First Amendment.

Last week, the judges were deciding whether the "top secret" documents from the Vietnam policy study qualify as exceptions to the First Amendment, as cited in the Near decision. Ironically, both sides have cited a 1968 opinion written by an appellate judge in Washington—now Chief Justice Warren Burger.

The government argues that Judge Burger's decision recognized that prior restraints on the press are permissible in some circumstances. But the newspapers point to another declaration by the same judge:

"A free, open society elects to take calculated risks to keep expression uninhibited."

[From the Columbia Journalism Review, Sept.–Oct. 1971]

THE 'STATE SECRETS' MYTH

By Max Frankel[1]

"THE GOVERNMENT'S COMPLAINT . . . COMES WITH ILL GRACE BECAUSE GOVERNMENT ITSELF HAS REGULARLY . . . VIOLATED THE CONDITIONS IT SUDDENLY SEEKS TO IMPOSE. . . ."

The Government's unprecedented challenge to the Times in the case of the Pentagon Papers cannot be understood without an appreciation of the manner in which a small and specialized corps of reporters and a few hundred American officials regularly make use of so-called classified, secret, and top secret information and documentation. It is a cooperative, competitive, antagonistic, and arcane relationship. I have learned over the years that it mystifies even experienced professionals in many fields, including those with Government experience, and including the most astute politicians and attorneys.

Without the use of "secrets" there could be no adequate diplomatic, military, and political reporting of the kind our people take for granted, either abroad or in Washington, and there could be no mature system of communication between the Government and the people. That is one reason why the sudden complaint by one party to these regular dealings strikes us as monstrous and hypocritical—unless it is essentially perfunctory, for the purpose of retaining some discipline over the federal bureaucracy.

I know how strange all this must sound. We have been taught, particularly in the past generation of spy scares and Cold War, to think of secrets as secrets —varying in their "sensitivity" but uniformly essential to the private conduct of diplomatic and military affairs and somehow detrimental to the national interest if prematurely disclosed. By the standards of official Washington—Government and press alike—this is an antiquated, quaint, and romantic view. For practically everything that our Government does, plans, thinks, hears, and contemplates in the realms of foreign policy is stamped and treated as secret—and then unraveled by that same Government, by the Congress, and by the press in one continuing round of professional and social contacts and cooperative and competitive exchanges of information.

The governmental, political, and personal interests of the participants are inseparable in this process. Presidents make "secret" decisions only to reveal them for the purposes of frightening an adversary nation, wooing a friendly electorate, protecting their reputations. The military services conduct "secret" research in weaponry only to reveal it for the purpose of enhancing their budgets, appearing superior or inferior to a foreign army, gaining the vote of a congressman or the favor of a contractor. The Navy uses secret information to run down the weaponry of the Air Force. The Army passes on secret information to prove its superiority to the Marine Corps. High officials of the Government reveal secrets in the search for support of their policies, or to help sabotage the plans and policies of rival departments. Middle-rank officials of government reveal secrets so as to attract the attention of their superiors or to lobby against the orders of those superiors. Though not the only vehicle for this traffic in secrets—the Congress is always eager to provide a forum—the press is probably the most important.

In the field of foreign affairs, only rarely does our Government give full public information to the press for the direct purpose of simply informing the people. For the most part, the press obtains significant information bearing on foreign policy only because it has managed to make itself a party to confidential materials, and of value in transmitting these materials from government to other branches and offices of government as well as to the public at large. This is why the press has been wisely and correctly called the Fourth Branch of Government.

I remember during my first month in Washington, in 1961, how President Kennedy tried to demonstrate his "toughness" toward the Communists after they built the Berlin wall by having relayed to me some direct quotations of his best arguments to Foreign Minister Gromyko. We were permitted to quote from this conversation and did so. Nevertheless, the record of the conversation was then, and remains today, a "secret."

---

[1] Max Frankel is Washington bureau chief of the New York Times. His comments are adapted from an affidavit filed in the Pentagon Papers case. The complete file of Times legal briefs and supporting documents, edited by Times general counsel James C. Goodale, is available from Arno Press, Inc., at $75 per set.

I remember a year later, at the height of the Cuban missile crisis, a State Department official concluding that it would surely be in the country's interest to demonstrate the perfidy of the same Mr. Gromyko as he denied any knowledge of those missiles in another talk with the President; the official returned within the hour and let me take verbatim notes of the Kennedy-Gromyko transcript—providing only that I would not use direct quotations. We printed the conversation between the President and the Foreign Minister in the third person, even though the record probably remains a "secret."

I remember President Johnson standing beside me, waist-deep in his Texas swimming pool, recounting for more than an hour his conversation the day before, in 1967, with Prime Minister Kosygin of the Soviet Union at Glassboro, N.J., for my "background" information and subsequent though not immediate use in print, with a few special off-the-record sidelights that remain confidential.

I remember Secretary of State Dean Rusk telling me at my first private meeting with him in 1961 that Laos is not worth the life of a single Kansas farm boy and that the SEATO treaty, which he would later invoke so elaborately in defense of the intervention in Vietnam, was a useless instrument that should be retained only because it would cause too much diplomatic difficulty to abolish it. Similar dealings with high officials continue to this day.

We have printed stories of high officials of this Administration berating their colleagues and challenging even the President's judgment about Soviet activities in Cuba last year. We have printed official explanations of why American intelligence-gathering was delayed while the Russians moved missiles toward the Suez Canal last year.

Respect for sources and for many of the secrets prevents a truly detailed accounting. But I hope I have begun to convey the very loose and special way in which "classified" information and documentation is regularly employed by our government. Its purpose is not to amuse or flatter a reporter whom many may have come to trust, but variously to impress him with their stewardship of the country, to solicit specific publicity, to push out diplomatically useful information without official responsibility, and, occasionally, even to explain and illustrate a policy that can be publicly described in only the vaguest terms.

This is the coin of our business and of the officials with whom we regularly deal. In almost every case, it is secret information and much of the time, it is top secret. But the good reporter in Washington, in Saigon, or at the United Nations gains access to such information and such sources because they wish to use him for loyal purposes of government, while he wishes to use them to learn what he can in the service of his readers. Learning always to trust each other to some extent, and never to trust each other fully—for their purposes are often contradictory or downright antagonistic—the reporter and the official trespass regularly, customarily, easily, and unselfconsciously (even unconsciously) through what they both know to be official "secrets." The reporter knows always to protect his sources and is expected to protect military secrets about troop movements and the like. He also learns to cross-check his information and to nurse it until an insight or story has turned ripe. The official knows, if he wishes to preserve this valuable channel and outlet, to protect his credibility and the deeper purpose that he is trying to serve.

The Government's complaint against the Times in the present case comes with ill grace because government itself has regularly and consistently, over the decades, violated the conditions it suddenly seeks to impose upon us—in three distinct ways.

First, it is our regular partner in the informal but customary traffic in secret information, without even the pretense of legal or formal "declassification." Presumably, many of the "secrets" I cited above remain "secret" in their official designation.

Second, the Government and its officials regularly and customarily engage in a kind of ad hoc, de facto "declassification" that normally has no bearing whatever on considerations of the national interest. To promote a political. personal, bureaucratic, or even commercial interest, incumbent officials and officials who return to civilian life are constantly revealing the secrets entrusted to them. They use them to barter with the Congress or the press, to curry favor with foreign governments and officials from whom they seek information in return. They use them freely, and with a startling record of impunity, in their memoirs and other writings.

Third, the Government and its officials regularly and routinely misuse and abuse the "classification" of information, either by imposing secrecy where none is justified or by retaining it long after the justification has become invalid, for simple reasons of political or bureaucratic convenience. To hide mistakes of judgment, to protect reputations of individuals, to cover up the loss and waste of funds, almost everything in government is kept secret for a time and, in the foreign policy field, classified as SECRET and SENSITIVE beyond any rule of law or reason. Every minor official can testify to this fact.

Obviously, there is need for some secrecy in foreign and military affairs. Considerations of security and tactical flexibility require it, though usually for only brief periods. The Government seeks with secrets not only to protect against enemies but also to serve the friendship of allies. Virtually every mature reporter respects that necessity and protects secrets and confidences that plainly serve it.

But for the vast majority of "secrets," there has developed between the Government and the press (and Congress) a rather simple rule of thumb: the Government hides what it can, pleading necessity as long as it can, and the press pries out what it can, pleading a need and right to know. Each side in this "game" regularly "wins" and "loses" a round or two. Each fights with the weapons at its command. When the Government loses a secret or two, it simply adjusts to a new reality. When the press loses a quest or two, it simply reports (or misreports) as best it can. Or so it has been, until this moment.

Some of the best examples of the regular traffic I describe may be found in the Pentagon Papers that the Government asks us not to publish. The uses of top secret information by our government in deliberate leaks to the press for the purposes of influencing public opinion are recorded, cited, and commented upon in several places of the study. Also cited and analyzed are numerous examples of how the Government tried to control the release of such secret information so as to have it appear at a desired time, or in a desired publication, or in a deliberately loud or soft manner for maximum or minimum impact.

Examples of my point are so numerous that despite the great bulk of the papers, we were able to locate more than a dozen different kinds of such passages in less than an hour. They include not only regular, daily articles but also major contemporary analyses of government decision-making at several key stages of the Vietnam war, right after the Cuban missile crisis, and shortly after the invasion of Cambodia. They include major journalistic investigations of secret institutions, like the Central Intelligence Agency. They combine known facts, pried-out secrets, and deliberate disclosures of secrets. They are recognized within the profession and among readers as the most valuable kind of journalism and have never been shown to cause "irreparable" harm to the national security. They have occasionally prompted investigations inside the Government to determine the sources of information, the possible presence of disloyal or dissenting officials, or the existence of information not previously given any weight or credibility by higher authority. None of these articles could be fairly described as less "sensitive" or more innocuous than the materials now challenged. None of them ever produced a legal challenge or a request for new legislation.

Samples of the second kind of traffic in secrets—the ad hoc, de facto (but by no means authorized, official, or "legal") declassification of documents—are numerous and voluminous.

George Christian of Austin, Tex., former press secretary to President Johnson who had free admission to all foreign and domestic discussions involving the President, at any level and in any forum, published his memoir in 1970. It includes seventy pages of narrative on the decisions to end the bombing of North Vietnam in late 1968, with many direct quotations of the President and other officials, many unflattering references to our allies in South Vietnam, and a great deal of detailed information, all still highly classified, about the secret negotiations with North Vietnam in Paris. This book, entitled The President Steps Down, actually covers a period more recent than that discussed in the Pentagon Papers, and at a much higher level of government and secrecy.

Recently, a book containing secret documents from members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff about the very same period covered by the Times' materials was published. The book, entitled Roots of Involvement, by Marvin Kalb and Elie Abel, includes telegram exchanges between General Westmoreland and General Wheeler in early 1968. We are advised that these texts were taken from privately circulated analyses and histories of phases of the war by leading military commanders, still on active duty.

Theodore C. Sorensen's Kennedy, written within a year of the death of President Kennedy, reveals dozens upon dozens of actions, meetings, reports, and documents, all still treated as "classified" by the Government and unavailable for more objective journalistic analysis. Sorensen treated the Kennedy-Khrushchev correspondence as private, to protect future channels of communication with Soviet leaders, but the most "secret" of these letters, during the Cuban missile crisis, were fully revealed in two subsequent books, one by Elie Abel and one by Robert F. Kennedy. Sorensen also observes that while Kennedy was still alive he invited Professor Richard Neustadt into Government archives for a contemporary analysis of decision-making of the "Skybolt" affair, the secrets of which were later revealed by the professor in a public acount of this minor-missile crisis with Britain.

Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., kept notes in the White House for his history of the Kennedy years entitled A Thousand Days. Roger Hilsman, an intelligence officer and then Assistant Secretary of State for the Far East, poured his files and secrets into a quick memoir entitled To Move a Nation. John Bartlow Martin, special ambassador during the Dominican Republic invasion of 1965, wrote Overtaken by Events, recounting numerous confidential messages and communications. Chester Cooper, a CIA official involved in Vietnam policy for two decades, left the White House to produce what was probably the most complete and best-documented history until the Pentagon Papers became available to the Times. The Secret Search for Peace in Vietnam, by David Kraslow and Stuart Loory of the Los Angeles Times, remains to this day the most thorough newspaper (and book) account of the diplomacy surrounding the war—through channels still deemed "live."

As the Times indicated in the first of its articles about the Pentagon study, it is a massive history of how the United States went to war in Indochina. Its 3,000-page analysis, to which 4,000 pages of official documents are appended, was commissioned by Secretary of Defense Robert S. McNamara in 1967 and completed in 1968, by which time he had been replaced by Clark M. Clifford. The analysis covers a historical record, as the Times said, from World War II to May, 1968—the start of the peace talks in Paris, by which time President Johnson had set a limit on further military commitments and revealed his intention to retire. We said that "though far from a complete history, even at 2.5 million words, the study forms a great archive of government decision-making on Indochina over three decades."

Moreover, the material was treated by the Times as a historical record that was of importance not only to our daily readers but also to the community of scholars that we have long served with a record of events. Our presentation was subjected to the most careful editing so that our report would remain faithful to the Pentagon record itself.

The Times found the history to be concerned primarily with the decision-making process in Washington and the thoughts, motives, plans, debates, and calculations of the decision-makers. I have seen no materials bearing on future plans of a diplomatic or military nature. The Times' interest throughout, like that of the study itself, in the words of our opening line, was in "how the United States went to war in Indochina."

The Pentagon Papers published by the Times and a bureaucratic history and analysis of the interaction of events and policy decisions are an invaluable historical record of a momentous era in our history. We cannot believe they should be suppressed.

[From the Columbia Journalism Reader, Sept.–Oct. 1971ᶜ]

WHERE WE STAND, A LEGAL VIEW

By Thomas I. Emerson [1]

IT WAS A LANDMARK DECISION, SAYS A LEGAL SCHOLAR—OF COMPARABLE IMPORTANCE TO THE JOHN PETER ZENGER CASE. BUT TO WHAT EXTENT WAS IT AN ADVANCE?

Do you regard this as a particularly unusual period in press-government relations?

In one sense, yes. In legal theory, the press probably has more protections now than it has ever had. But in terms of the social climate and the attitudes of the Administration, there is probably more pressure on the press than at any time since World War I.

Historically, the press has been subject to very considerable controls. At the end of the eighteenth century, shortly after the Constitution was promulgated, the Alien and Sedition Acts were passed and then used to a large degree against newspaper editors. Prior to the Civil War, Abolitionist newspapers were not allowed in the South. During the Civil War there was considerable interference with the press: Lincoln and his generals closed several newspapers, deprived papers the use of the mails, and enforced intensive censorship of Copperhead newspapers. Then, in World War I a German-language newspaper in St. Louis was prosecuted under the Espionage Act on charges of printing false and misleading reports and slanting the news on military operations.

I think such restrictions would clearly be impermissible as Constitutional law now stands. The whole development of the First Amendment, which really began only in 1919 in Supreme Court decisions arising out of World War I, has given the press a much more secure position.

Would you describe the cases that began the modern era of the First Amendment?

The initial cases arose out of the Espionage Act of 1917, which prohibited conduct that would tend to create insubordination in the armed forces. The Act was applied to inhibit criticism of the war. Gradually, as time went on, the Supreme Court shifted, and particularly with the beginning of the Hughes Court the Justices were willing to uphold the right to criticize the war and the Government generally. The area of speech protected by the First Amendment expanded quite substantially in the 1920s and 1930s, but was then set back somewhat by the decision in the Smith Act cases of 1950-51. But since then it has again progressed through cases such as Julian Bond's, which indicates that any expression, no matter how critical of the war it may be, is protected by the First Amendment. So I think that in theory, the newspapers have a pretty strong Constitutional grounding.

Of course, there are many ways to influence and control the press other than by criminal prosecutions. And one now gets the distinct feeling that the Government is attempting to exercise control. I think of the speeches of Vice President Agnew; the New York Times-Washington Post-Boston Globe case; actions by the FCC under the new chairman; the Coldwell subpoena case; and various other indications that the Administration seems to be willing to apply pressures on the press of a character and intensity that I think have not been applied for more than a half-century.

Would you trace the roots in law of the New York Times case?

In the period shortly after the printing press was introduced in England, a series of laws and regulations brought into being a very elaborate system of censorship; not only did everything that was published require advance approval either by ecclesiastical or secular authorities, but also the number of printing presses was limited, the number of printers was limited and licensed, there was a whole system of advance censorship of anything printed. It was against this that John Milton made his famous speech in Parliament in 1646 that was reprinted and published as Areopagitica. After the laws expired it became accepted as part of British law that no advance censorship, no advance approval be required. The sedition laws still prohibited printing material critical of the Government, but the Government could not prevent publication in advance even of material that could constitute an offense. The theory was that a system of advance censorship is much more restrictive than post-publication prosecutions.

---

[1] Thomas I. Emerson, Lines Professor of Law at Yale, is author of Toward a General Theory of the First Amendment, The System of Freedom of Expression and co-author of Political and Civil Rights in the United States.

That was the situation at the time the First Amendment was adopted as part of the Bill of Rights in 1791. The Court on several occasions has said that the main purpose of the First Amendment was to guarantee that British censorship laws would never be applied in this country. When the prior restraint issue first came up, in the Hughes Court in 1931, it was called Near vs. Minnesota, which involved the so-called Minnesota Gag Law. That law provided that any newspaper which printed scurrilous and defamatory material could be subject to an injunction, and it was applied to a Minneapolis newspaper that printed an attack on the city administration. The Court, for the first time facing a situation somewhat comparable to the British censorship laws, held that the obtaining of an injunction against publication was a violation of the First Amendment; that one of the principal purposes of the First Amendment was to prevent a system of advance censorship. The Court thus incorporated into American Constitutional law the doctrine of no prior restraint.

The Court did say there were some exceptions to the doctrine. But the only exception it had allowed prior to the New York Times case was one permitting movie censorship boards to screen a film in advance for obscenity. And it clearly indicated it was talking only about films.

What influence do you believe the Court's 1971 decision will have on the freedom of U.S. news media?

The result was certainly favorable to a free press. Put the other way, a contrary result would have been a disaster. It would have made the press subject to a very considerable extent of advance restriction. It would have changed the whole relationship between the press and the Government. The outcome was a sound outcome. On the other hand, the legal theory that the Court adopted is, I think, cause for concern.

Only three Justices came out strongly against a system of prior restraint—Justices Black, Douglas, and Brennan, and Brennan would make some very narrow exceptions. Black and Douglas apparently permitted none. Justice Marshall probably would go along with them, but actually he based his opinion on a different ground—on the ground that Congress had denied this power to the President, and the Court therefore didn't get into the question. But if you assume there were four who would vigorously apply the doctrine of no previous restraint, nevertheless there were five whose opinions seriously undermined the doctrine against prior restraint. Certainly the three dissenters would have made exceptions, but also Justices Stewart and White announced that any anticipated publication which raised an immediate danger to national security would be grounds for an injunction, and the dissenting judges apparently would have gone at least that far.

Now, there are two legal problems there. One is that the exception which is made—that you can have advance restraint of a newspaper if the Government proves a grave and immediate breach of national security—is a very wide-open exception: very broad, very vague, covering a large amount of territory that would probably allow the Government to obtain an injunction in most cases where any issue of national security was raised. It would certainly be far more restrictive than the previous situation was considered to have been.

There is also a second problem. That is that even if the courts ultimately interpret the concept of "grave and immediate breach of national security" rather narrowly, the very application of the rule will constitute a system of prior restraint. The Government can come in and allege a grave and immediate breach of national security; the Court will then issue a temporary restraining order; publication will be held up while the Court looks to see whether there is a breach of national security; and the whole process of applying the rule will itself be a system of prior restraint. So in legal theory the press is in a rather vulnerable situation if the Stewart-White doctrine is adopted. Of course, the Court hasn't decided that, but that was certainly the implication.

Presumably the circumstances of the New York Times case would not arise very often: it is rather unlikely that a newspaper would have such a massive collection of documents to publish at one time. Similarly, the press by now presumably has learned that it would not be enjoined if it already had published something, and presumably it wouldn't tell the Government in advance what it had. So as a practical matter the press may be able to protect itself in spite of the rule that the Court seemed to be laying down.

"PRESSURE OF A KIND NOT APPLIED IN A HALF-CENTURY . . ."

On the other hand, if one assumes that a newspaper publishes classified material on several occasions over a period of weeks, or maybe a month; the Government might well then come into court and say, "We don't know exactly what the newspaper is going to publish next, but they have displayed a pattern of publishing classified materials. We don't know what their sources are, but they must have some source, and we want to enjoin them from printing more classified material."

That is an extension of the New York Times facts, and an extension of the theory of the case, but not much of an extension. A court might well say, "If publication of material that would cause grave and immediate injury to the national security can be prevented when the Government knows about it in advance; if the Government is pretty sure, because the newspaper has done it in the past, that more is coming out, what is there to prevent us from enjoining the newspaper from publishing any more classified material?" At that point you have a system of prior restraint that could be even more restrictive than the rule of the New York Times case. In other words, once you take a position that the rule against prior restraint doesn't apply in a national security situation, then it is not a very large step to say that if a newspaper has sinned once, the Government can prevent it from sinning again.

Are you suggesting, then, that even though Congress might bring about a change in government classification policies, this wouldn't necessarily protect the press in a severe test?

The Court certainly did not take the position that anything that is classified cannot be published. It did take the position that it would examine material to see whether what was about to be published would be a grave and immediate breach of national security. So the classification system by itself is not decisive. But as a factual matter, that pushes the Court in a direction of suppression because if it is something that the Government has classified then it is likely that publication could be represented as a breach.

One commentator has pointed out that suppression for even two hours, let alone two weeks, can make moot the dissemination of something urgent.

Any delay is serius—certainly a delay long enough for a court to look at material. In addition, the court has to hold a secret proceeding—which is what it did in both the Post and the Times cases. The Government's argument is that in order to persuade the Court that this is a serious breach of national security it will have to tell all the facts as to why, and therefore the very process of proving its point wil cause a breach of national security unless the hearing is in secret. So you have the Court holding secret proceedings from which the public is excluded. Besides that, the Government said, "No one can be permitted to come to these proceedings unless he has a security clearance." So the Government could determine what lawyers and what members of the press would be allowed to participate in the hearing. In other words, the very process of deciding in advance gets you into secret judicial proceedings, and that is a very serious thing in a democratic society.

In this case, did the Government ask for secret proceedings that would exclude the newspapers?

Yes. It asked the Court for secret proceedings, and it asked counsel for the newspapers to name the persons they wanted to be present at the secret proceedings, and then they cleared those persons in Washington. Only those persons cleared by the Government were admitted to the secret proceedings. So the Government even had control of who appeared. The newspapers' counsel could attend, if they got clearance—but they had to get clearance. Third parties such as the American Civil Liberties Union weren't admitted. If they had been, they would have needed clearance, too.

In addition, the Government submitted two briefs in each of the cases. I represented twenty-seven Congressmen who filed a brief as amici curiae. We served our brief on the Solicitor General, as is customary. He is supposed to give us a copy of his brief. He gave us a copy of his public brief, but would not give us a copy of his private brief. So there were secret briefs which were available only to the Court, not to the public.

Has this ever been done in our history in a case involving the press?

Not that I know of. There have been instances in espionage cases involving state secrets, in which there has been limited access to materials, but those have been very, very few. Even there, the defendant can't be convicted on the basis of anything that isn't submitted in the record, so the Government has to disclose the material or drop the prosecution.

What else was noteworthy about this case?

At least one other aspect: that the Court really did nothing to advance the doctrine of the right to know. In this case there were two components of the right to know: the general public's right to know, and also the legislature's, the Congressional right. Now that is a very important area of First Amendment rights, an area that is just beginning to be developed in law. Nothing could be more important to a democratic system than the right of citizens to all information on which to base decisions. Any democratic society is going to have to develop some legal principles in that area.

Could Congressional action help here?

Of course the Freedom of Information Act—the Moss Act—is directed toward supporting the right to know, and many states have passed statutes making the proceedings of boards, commissions, and state agencies open to the public. There has been the beginning of a movement by statute supporting the right to know. But it is rather feeble. The federal Freedom of Information Act exempts all national security matters, and many of the states have extensive exemptions. It's just a beginning, but it is a beginning, and people are commencing to realize the importance of it. It certainly would have been given an impetus if the Court had been able to say something about it.

Would you place this case on a level with the John Peter Zenger case in its implications for journalistic freedom?

I think it was of comparable importance to the Zenger case. I would say it's probably more important than the New York Times vs. Sullivan libel case, and on a par with the Smith Act case (Dennis vs. the United States), and the case involving the Internal Security Act (Communist Party vs. United States). It is truly a landmark decision.

Would you comment on recent cases of subpoenas of journalists' notes and film?

Obviously this is an exceedingly important matter. If the Government can obtain information about sources and about material that the reporter doesn't use, his sources of information can be materially curtailed, and the way a story is investigated and researched could presumably be changed. The reporter wouldn't keep notes, and people he talked to wouldn't be as free. It would clearly have a very serious effect.

Until recently the law has afforded very little protection to a reporter in this area. The law started from the point that the Government was entitled to any information which it could otherwise legally obtain through the judicial process, that it was the duty of all citizens to give information to the Government that was relevant to some legal issue or some legislative issue. The exceptions to that were very narrow—husband-wife, doctor-patient, a few other confidential relationships were the only ones recognized.

The press, when called upon to produce information that it felt would violate confidences, usually has refused, and in a few cases reporters have gone to jail for it. But by and large the press has persuaded the courts not to force the issue, and as a practical matter the courts weren't interested in tangling with the press.

Since the Government has forced the issue, the courts seem to be modifying their position somewhat. In the Caldwell case, for instance, the Ninth Circuit court held that the Government would have to show compelling reasons why it needed the information; that the reporter would not even have to appear before the grand jury unless the Government could show that it couldn't get the information elsewhere. But the concept of "compelling reasons," like the concept of "grave and immediate breach of national security," is so broad that the courts would have great leeway in applying it, and the consequence would be that no one would know what his rights were. The reporter wouldn't know how far he could go, and the person talking to the reporter wouldn't know how far he could go. A whole chilling effect would occur. A rule that is too vague is almost worse than no rule at all. I would hope that the Supreme Court, when it decides the Caldwell case, would come out with some very specific and restrictive rule.

Where do the news media stand in other area such as libel law?

Libel is an illustration of development of First Amendment doctrine beneficial to the press. Originally the law of libel grew up independently of the First Amendment, and although it promised a good deal it never delivered much. It was pretty hard to win a lawsuit and collect money, but the legal position of the press was very vulnerable. When libel issues arose in a political context with the civil rights movement in the Sixties—that is, when Southern opponents of the civil rights movement sued the New York Times and the broadcasters for libel, based really on political criticism—the Court had to face the problem of how to reconcile libel laws and the First Amendment. In doing so, the Court went quite far in protecting the press, laying down the rule that criticism of public officials, even though false, was justified unless actual malice was proved—definite realization that a statement was false, and a desire to publish it whether it was false or not. That rule has been extended not only to public officials but to public figures, and most recently, in the Rosenbloom case, extended further to apply to any matter of public concern.

I think that even the "actual malice" restriction is too broad; I agree with Justices Black and Douglas that leaving the issue of malice up to a jury reopens the whole question and deprives the press of a great deal of protection which it otherwise would have. Nevertheless, as applied so far the rule has been a major protection. Even the newest Court appointees went along in extending the Times doctrine to public isues.

Where do we stand in assuring broadcast media First Amendment protection?

There now are two main problems. One is a noticeable tendency by the Federal Communications Commission to restrict broadcasting in various ways. The Commission has adopted, or shows signs of adopting, stricter rules about "offensive" or vulgar material. The chairman has officially announced that that is what he would like to do. That could easily lead to interference with political commentary. Another aspect is the FCC's attempt, subsequently modified, to limit songs that deal with drug problems.

The Federal Communications Bar is quite worried about the likelihood that the FCC may press rather far in the direction of censorship, which could tend to political censorship. I think the courts would probably block any formal overt action in that direction, but the FCC operates unofficially to a large extent, and it can make an impact without revoking somebody's license and thereby posing a clearcut legal issue. It's a question of the broadcasters standing up to the FCC and not letting it go too far.

The other main problem in broadcasting regulation is the application of the Fairness Doctrine, the equal-time doctrine, and other FCC regulations which concern the variety of material that comes over the air. That is extremely important. The whole system of freedom of the press and expression depends on having access to a variety of viewpoints, and the viewpoints that come over the air are quite narrow in scope.

The FCC is presently considering a revision of the Fairness Doctrine. My feeling is that the revision should be very strongly in favor of the Government requiring stations to open their facilities to more viewpoints. I think that because radio and TV are limited facilities, the efforts of the Government to permanently promote greater variety of expression through the fairness rule and similar doctrines would be consistent with the First Amendment.

In recent weeks some commentary, including commentary from the legal profession, has seemed rather hostile to the kind of journalistic freedoms you have been discussing. What might the news media do to create understanding of the stakes involved?

I would say one of the main things that the media can do is to educate the public to the significance of the whole system of free expression. The idea of a free press and freedom of expression is a rather sophisticated concept for a politically mature people, one that we have worked out extensively in the last forty or fifty years but which only a limited group understands and realizes the import of. The natural inclination, as Holmes said long ago, when you don't like what a fellow is saying is to shut him up. I think that there has to be great effort made to have a really full understanding of it, and I think the news media have an important obligation there. I think the New York Times case has opened up the possibility of making people aware of what the role of the press is; that its role isn't simply to take handouts given by the Government; it's for the people.

The major problem with the system of freedom of the press today is the inability of many points of view to find an outlet. That is a very serious problem. I think that it is important for the media to be aware of that, to anticipate it, to try to take account of it. In other words, just as I think the Government ought to subsidize an opposition to itself, in a sense monopolistic elements in the communications industry should subsidize some opposition to themselves. I think it would be a much healthier and ultimately more successful system.

THE FIRST AMENDMENT AND BROADCASTING

[Speech to the Illinois Broadcasters Association, October 13, 1971]

WILL BROADCASTING SURVIVE?

By Lee Loevinger

It is indeed an honor to be asked to speak to the convention of a broadcasters association. However, the honor at this point in our history is a little bit like being appointed navigator of the luxury liner, the steamship Titanic. To say that broadcasting is facing troubled times is true but trite. We are all facing troubled times, and perhaps all times seem troubled to those living in them and confronted by their problems. But cold analysis suggests that the troubles of this period for commercial broadcasting may be terminal.

The situation of broadcasting can best be described simply by noting the number, variety and nature of the problems confronting it. Even to list all of these fully would unduly extend this discussion so I shall simply mention some of the more important burdens which the government has recently inflicted upon broadcasting. These include: the limitation of prime time network programming; new and very large FCC fee charges; shifting and increasingly strict renewal standards; a proposed requirement for announcements inviting complaints; increasing pressure to attain some vague unattainable ideal in children's programming; the requirement for reviewing and judging of record lyrics; the prohibition against local CATV ownership; greatly increased line charges for program transmission and interconnection; pressure and demands for free time for political broadcasts; increasing requirements for reporting and record keeping; the loss of advertising revenue resulting from the prohibition against cigarette advertising and the increasing attack upon other broadcast advertising; the escalating costs of program production; demands from OEO and an apparently limitless number of minority groups for programming directed to their special interests; wage and price controls; and all of the economic problems growing out of the uncertain and depressed conditions which have confronted business recently.

Television tends to get the headlines and to attract public attention so that it sometimes appears that the problems of broadcasting are really television problems. This is an illusion. The basic problems confronting television also confront both AM and FM radio-broadcasting and are the same for all the broadcasting media. For example, the two problems that I shall mention as most significant are the problems of license renewal and attacks on commercials. These affect television and radio in precisely the same fashion and equally. Up to the present time the competing applications for licenses have been filed against television stations. However, as militant activists discover the cost of establishing and operating television stations and the difficulty of raising that much money by selling love beads or underground newspapers they will begin to look for alternatives. Radio is an obvious and desirable alternative. It provides a voice that reaches the public just as television does, and in some respects more widely and effectively. Radio reaches the whole population, perhaps more completely than television. It can operate during power blackouts. Radio receivers are cheaper to buy and more portable than television receivers. Radio stations are cheaper to own and much cheaper to operate than television stations. Thus it is inevitable that those seeking a medium to carry their voices to the community will soon turn to radio. As soon as a precedent has been set in television competing applications will start to come in against radio application renewals.

With respect to commercials the Fairness Doctrine and all the other rules applicable to television commercials apply equally to radio commercials. The protests against commercials and the demands for counter-commercials and anti-commercials involve radio as well as television. The zealous partisans who so earnestly oppose advertising and demand time for anti-commercials have not overlooked and will not neglect radio.

There is only one economic boat for broadcasting. Radio and television are in the same boat together. If one end sinks, both ends sink.

The burdens, troubles and difficulties confronting broadcasting are unprecedented in number, variety and magnitude. They confront all broadcasters and are equally threatening to radio and television and to large and small broadcasters.

Nevertheless it is necessary to have a sense of proportion and to judge the relative importance of these difficulties. If the roof on your house is leaking, that's certainly bad. But if your house is burning down, that is a crisis.

Some problems are unpleasant, expensive, or oppressive but nonetheless tolerable. Examples of these are the increase in FCC fees, the increasing burden of record keeping and responding to government inquiries and the increasing competition and threat of competition from such sources as cable or CATV, cassettes and Pay-TV.

There are other problems which appear burdensome but which must be recognized as arising from necessary responsibilities and duties and the adjustment to changing social conditions. These include the cost and difficulty of recruiting and training the disadvantaged and the minority groups, the measures necessary to eliminate and prevent any racial, religious, or sexual discrimination and the need to survey community interests more closely. Whatever burden these problems impose must be accepted by broadcasters and the duties arising from these obligations must be fully discharged.

There are, however, two current issues which are basic and vital both to broadcasters and to the general public. These are: first, the right of a broadcaster who complies with all laws, regulations and legal standards to retain his license and to continue broadcasting; and, second, the right of broadcasting to compete economically with other media.

These issues are vital because without a license a broadcaster cannot operate and without revenue a broadcaster cannot exist.

The importance of these issues to the national and public interest is not so obvious but nonetheless basic. Broadcasters have no special right to make a profit or to serve their own economic or social interests. If broadcasting were a public utility it would have a right to make a profit, but the amount of profit would be subject to government control. However, the Communications Act makes it clear that broadcasting is not to be treated as a public utility. Broadcasters are under no duty to disregard economic considerations or to forego profit making but they are not entitled to throw the mantle of public interest over these activities.

However, the two issues of the right to continue to operate and the right to compete economically are vital and paramount because they affect not only broadcasting but also the basic public interest in free speech and a free press. The dependence of the public upon broadcasting as a source of news and views has been investigated and reported frequently and is too well known to require documentation now. The ability of the public today to learn news and views of national and international affairs depends largely on a free and independent broadcasting system. This has been recognized by both Congress and the Supreme Court. In the Red Lion case the Supreme Court said: "The Communications Act is not notable for the precision of its substantive standards * * * But the people as a whole retain their interest in free speech by radio and their collective right to have the medium function consistently with the ends and purposes of the First Amendment * * * It is the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral, and other ideas and experiences which is crucial here. That right may not constitutionally be abridged either by Congress or by the FCC." Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C., 395 U.S. 367, 385, 390 (1969).

Earlier, in the WDAY case, the Court said: "The legislative history * * * of the [Communications Act] both prior to its first enactment in 1927, and subsequently shows a deep hostility to censorship either by the Commission or by the licensee. * * * Thus, expressly applying this country's tradition of free expression to the field of radio broadcasting, Congress has from the first emphatically forbidden the Commission to exercise any power of censorship over radio communication." Farmers Union v. WDAY, 360 U.S. 525, 528, 529–30 (1959).

The court has also said that the term "censorship" as commonly understood and as used in the Communications Act means "any examination of thought or expression in order to prevent publication of objectionable material."

Despite these and other ringing declarations in favor of free speech the freedom and even existence of broadcasting is now being threatened by actions of the courts and the Commission. On January 23, 1969 a three-member majority of a four-member quorum of the FCC held that the license of WHDH (Boston) would not be renewed and its channel would be given to a competing applicant, because the licensee owned a newspaper and the competing applicant did not. There were unusual and distinguishing circumstances in this case but the majority expressly refused to rely upon them as a ground of decision. One member of the majority emphasized that the principle of this case applied to all license renewal proceedings, and that a licensee seeking renewal was in precisly the same position as a new applicant. On reconsideration, the majority affirmed that this principle applied to all renewal proceedings, said that the past record of the licensee, although favorable, gave it no credit toward a renewal and held that past precedents recognizing the right of license renewal gave no protection to the licensee in this case.

A bill to reverse this decision was introduced by Senator Pastore in the Senate and about 100 Congressmen in the House and hearings were held.

On January 15, 1970, the FCC by a 6 to 1 vote issued a policy statement that where a license renewal applicant could show a past record of substantial service without serious deficiencies he would be entitled to a license renewal as against the challenge of a newcomer. (22 FCC 2d 424).

This was challenged in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit by the Citizens Communication Center and by Black Efforts for Soul in Television, and on June 11, 1971 the court set this policy statement aside. The Court of Appeals held that there must be comparative hearings whenever a licensee is challenged by another applicant at renewal time. The court went on to say that the FCC policy was unreasonably weighted in favor of the licensee, that the Communications Act says nothing about a presumption in favor of licensees seeking renewal, and that past decisions of both the FCC and of that court had improperly reflected a bias in favor of incumbent licensees. The court said that the Commission should consider only superior programming service in renewal applications and that the Commission should define both quantitatively and qualitatively what constitutes superior programming service.

In other subsequent cases the same court has reversed the FCC and has held that broadcast licensees may not refuse to accept and broadcast commercials because they are controversial within the Fairness Doctrine and that commercials for gasoline and automobiles are controversial and require that free time be given under the Fairness Doctrine for counter-commercials or anti-commercials. In another similar case, the FCC has held that institutional advertising by an oil company, viewed in the light of its total advertising program in all media, raised controversial issues regarding the desirability of the Alaska pipeline under the Fairness Doctrine. It is not yet clear how broad these rulings are and whether they will be applied to all product commercials, but those interested in preserving the American system of free broadcasting must assume that they do.

Broadcasting as a mass medium and a technique of communications will unquestionably survive for the indefinite future. It is so effective that it will undoubtedly be utilized increasingly unless and until some more efficient technique is developed. However, the system of free and independent broadcasting that we have developed in the United States may be radically changed or totally destroyed within the near future if these trends continue.

Thus these rulings vitally affect the public interest. The right to secure a license renewal, and thus to continue operating is made subject to the FCC's judgment as to programming, which obviously means that programming must be shaped to gain the approval of the FCC and its staff.

Commercials are the sole source of broadcasting income and, therefore, are literally the economic life blood of broadcasting. However, no sensible advertiser will purchase advertising on a medium which is required to present attacks upon his advertising claims if anyone is interested enough to dispute them. It is a matter of common observation today that there are no advertising claims which go unchallenged by someone. Advertising for things as innocuous as breakfast foods and hair spray has been attacked and demands have been made upon broadcasters for the right to respond to and attack such public service commercials as recruiting spots for the U.S. Army and pleas for contribution to the United Givers Fund. In these circumstances the economic ability of a broadcaster to survive is entirely subject to the control of the FCC. Such power in a government agency destroys the right of free speech, which is one of our most fundamental constitutional principles.

There is a long historical background to demonstrate this. The American Declaration of Independence charged the British King with "a history of repeated injuries and usurpation, all having the indirect object of establishment of an absolute tyranny . . ." The facts submitted in support of this charge included the fact that the King made judges dependent on his will alone "for the tenure of their offices and the amount and payment of their salaries." To guard against such usurpations and tyranny the U.S. Constitution provided that judges should hold office during good behavior and that their salaries should not be diminished during their continuance in office. Thus it was recognized that security of tenure and of economic livelihood was indispensable to independent judgment.

The FCC itself asserts a relationship between economic interest and broadcasting performance. The economic interests of broadcast licensees are required to be disclosed and are subject to searching scrutiny and analysis by the FCC on the theory that such interests may have some influence on the broadcast performance of a licensee.

Is it not obvious that the power to exercise economic control over broadcasting enterprises involves the power to control the conduct and performance of those enterprises?

Is it not apparent that an enterprise which is wholly dependent upon the favor and whim of a government agency for its right to continue in operation and existence at intervals of three years can exercise no real freedom or independence?

Of course, the judges and the commissioners of the FCC piously, and no doubt sincerely, protest that they do not intend to censor broadcasting speech or reporting. Indeed, those who most vigorously push rigorous control protest the loudest. But the FCC is constantly engaged in examining program content, including news broadcasts, as well as documentaries, editorials, and other expressions of opinion under the Fairness Doctrine, in comparative proceedings, and in license renewal procedings. In the WHDH proceeding—which now has renewed vitality—the Commission opinion commented on the licensee's "failure to editorialize" and on the manner of its reporting news of certain publications of a State commission. In the WQAD (Moline) case the Commission members publicly debated the character and quality of the programming in deciding a challenged renewal application.

In these circumstances and with broadcast licenses subject to renewal essentially at the unfettered discretion or whim of the FCC and its staff every three years no broadcaster can possibly be independent or free of government control or influence in his programming, news reporting or editorial expression. If the Commission, or several Commissioners, are displeased with a broadcaster because of his programming, news reporting, or editorial expressions, they need not overtly censor, but can readily find legally acceptable reasons for failure to renew the license. With license renewal possibly depending on the vote of a single Commissioner, the views, prejudices and whims of each Commissioner become a matter for assiduous research, study and cultivation by every licensee.

Those concerned about American broadcasting should note that in every major country of the world except the United States the government controls broadcasting.

Great Britain is a great and democratic country. The basic broadcasting system in Great Britain is BBC, which is a government agency controlled by the Postmaster General. In 1954 the British Parliament set up the Independent Authority as a competitor of the BBC. However, the ITA board is appointed by the Postmaster General and a few years ago the head of ITA was moved to BBC by the Postmaster General.

In France the entire broadcasting system is operated and controlled by the government and run out of a central facility in the heart of Paris. The effect of this can be illustrated by recent history. A few years ago there were riots in the streets of Paris with students from the Sorbonne tearing up paving blocks to build fires and barricades that were being used in a battle with the police. No mention of this was heard at the time on the French broadcasting system. The French people did learn of the student riots through radio and television from Luxembourg. This small country, about the size of the District of Columbia, operated broadcasting stations on the American plan, which is to say, supported by commercial advertising and programmed to please and reach the largest popular audience. Many of the programs are taken from the American commercial networks. Since the government is a partner in the Luxembourg broadcasting operation and thus shares the profits it has not yet undertaken to exercise any power of control or censorship over the programming or news.

Without reviewing the details of broadcasting systems of other countries, it can be asserted that the American system of commercial broadcasting is unique in the world, both in its scope and efficiency in providing programs of public interest and in its freedom and independence in presenting news and ideas free of government influence or control.

Those who feel confident that it can't happen here should reflect thoughtfully on recent events. The first field of regulation by the federal government in this country was that of railroad transportation. Over the years the railroads have been regulated and controlled by a government agency with essentially the same legal standards and objectives as those set for the FCC. After about 80 years of such operation the railroads had become unprofitable and inefficient to the point that they were ready to abandon passenger transportation. As a result the government established AMTRAK, a federal corporation which has now taken over the operation of virtually all passenger transportation from the proprietary railroad corporations.

You haven't heard of FEDCAST—yet. But if the trends in government control of broadcasting continue for only a few more years you will hear of it. FEDCAST will be the federal corporation set up to take over the operation of all commercial broadcasting stations after their economic viability has been destroyed by federal rules choking off advertising and their freedom of programming has been constricted to the scope desired by those in control of the FCC.

This will happen, almost to a certainty, unless something is done to prevent it. The question is what can be done to prevent this. The most plausible answer at the present time appears to be legislation. The precise form, substance and timing of the legislation cannot be specified and will undoubtedly be the result of extensive consideration and compromise in the course of the legislative process. However, I venture to suggest that the basic principles which should, explicitly or implicitly, be embodied in Congressional action should be these.

1st. There should be a declaration and recognition that broadcasting is both an indispensable news source for the public and a major entertainment and advertising medium. The freedom and independence of broadcasting as a journalistic medium is vital to the public interest. The entertainment and advertising functions provide an essential economic foundation for the journalistic function and its free and independent exercise.

2nd. Broadcasting has the same protection and rights under the First Amendment as newspapers and other mass media.

3rd. The FCC has the right to act concerning or to consider broadcast programming only with respect to specified legal categories, which probably should be: (a) obscenity; (b) lotteries; (c) incitement to riot or insurrection; (d) possibly criminal libel; (e) the rule of Section 315 with such limitations as Congress may make; and (f) either a Fairness Doctrine strictly defined by statute or, as a complete substitute, the statutory right of access suggested and described by Mr. Whitehead, Director of OTP, in his excellent IRTS speech of October 6th.

4th. The FCC should be clearly forbidden to forbid or discourage or require or encourage or consider or attempt to influence in any way, directly or indirectly, any other kind or character of programming.

5th. The FCC should have no authority to supervise or review the content of commercial broadcast advertising and any Fairness Doctrine should not apply to broadcast commercials except to those by or on behalf of a political candidate or advocating, opposing or commenting on a political issue.

6th. The FTC should have the same authority to examine broadcast commercial advertising and take action regarding misleading or deceptive advertising as it does with respect to advertising in any other medium.

7th. Broadcast license renewal should not be granted, denied or conditioned on anything broadcast or not broadcast except with respect to broadcast material which the FCC has been specifically authorized to control or consider.

8th. It should be recognized as in the public interest for broadcast licensees to have such freedom and independence as results from security in their right to continue to hold their licenses so long as they comply with all laws and valid regulations. Consequently in proceedings for license renewal it should be presumed that a licensee who has complied with the laws and regulations and thus operated in the public interest is entitled to renewal and that the application of any other person for the same channel or frequency should not force the FCC to hold a hearing or be considered competitive until the presumption has been overcome.

The NAB has decided that as a matter of principle legislation to protect the right of license renewal is necessary and desirable and has appointed a task force to work on securing such legislation. No specific legislative proposal has been drafted and the NAB has not yet considered or approved any particular legislative proposal or approach. What course the NAB and its Task Force may ultimately formulate and follow I do not venture to predict. However it appears that it will take some time to formulate legislative proposals and organize support for them. Specific proposals probably cannot be introduced until January 1972 and there may be a long and difficult fight to secure enactment. But the principle of the right to renewal as a foundation for a free and independent broadcasting system is basic and must have legislative recognition.

All state associations and all broadcasters must understand that we are today fighting for the survival of the American system of free and independent broadcasting. The interest of broadcasters in their business in this instance coincides with the public interest in free speech and free and independent broadcasting journalism. Therefore, broadcasters and broadcasting associations must take and push the initiative and must work as long as necessary to secure appropriate legislation—as if their lives depended upon it—because they do.

However, broadcasters must also recognize that there are many in this country to whom free speech and a free press are merely abstractions and that there are others who say that these are simply slogans which the establishment uses to protect itself against the just demands of the people. Argument alone will not eliminate these concepts or persuade these opponents. There must indeed be argument and explanation but there must also be action. Broadcasting, which speaks to the poor, the disadvantaged and the oppressed as no other medium ever has, must also listen and respond to the demands and needs of the poor, the disadvantaged and the oppressed. As broadcasting should not be subject to pressures or demands from any agency of government, it must be voluntarily responsive to pressures and demands from all segments of the public.

Broadcasting has done a far better job than any of its critics have yet understood in serving and in responding to the demands and needs of the poor and the disadvantaged. This is illustrated by the recent survey showing that broadcasting as an institution is regarded by the black community as more fair and more sympathetic than any other American institution, including the Supreme Court, Congress, the newspapers and the government. The public, including the disadvantaged minorities, must be told that broadcasting is being subjected to an attack which will diminish, not increase, its ability to serve them and to satisfy their demands and needs. Congress, too, must be made to understand that protection of the freedom and independence of broadcasting is not simply a boon to broadcasters but is an important contribution to the public interest and to the preservation of the American social and political system and of American values.

For the last half-century broadcasting has lived an exciting and tumultuous but not particularly perilous existence. As one who has been given the honor of appointment as navigator of the great and unsinkable Titanic I have the duty to inform you that all of you have been passengers on the ship. As broadcasters you have just finished your pleasure cruise on the Titanic. Now you must sink or swim.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF BROADCASTERS

REMARKS OF FRANK STANTON, VICE CHAIRMAN, COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC., APRIL 11, 1972

For the moment, let it suffice that never in my career have I been more deeply moved than by the eloquent approbation you have bestowed upon me. Never have I felt more generously rewarded for responding to the call to duty.

And this is why.

One year ago, almost to the day, two agents of the House Special Subcommittee on Investigations appeared in my office at ten o'clock in the morning. They served me with a subpoena demanding an array of materials used in the preparation of the CBS News investigative report, "The Selling of the Pentagon," including film ad tape outtakes which were never broadcast. This was to mark the beginning of a bitter dispute which culminated three months later on the floor of the House of Representatives. Around the controversy swirled confusion, both as to motive and as to principle, traces of which still linger—unfortunately.

So deep running were the issues and of such paramount importance were the principles at stake that I would like to take this occasion to put in simple perspective the reason CBS pursued the course which we felt duty and honor commanded. Fully conscious of the seriousness of the action, we refused to comply with the unprecedented demands of the subpoena which we felt to constitute an infringement of the First Amendment and hence to be unconstitutional. Not in any spirit of defiance, not out of hostility, not to hide anything, did we make this decision. Our sole motivation was resistance of what we believed to be a ". . . government invasion of one of the country's oldest and most fundamental freedoms."

On that ground alone we took our stand.

Pointing to the chilling effect of not only the subpoena but of the investigation itself, we noted that "if newsmen are told that their notes, films and tapes will be subject to compulsory process so that the government can determine whether the news has been satisfactorily edited, the scope, nature and vigor of their news gathering and reporting activities will inevitably be curtailed." The vital question was—and is—whether news and editing judgments shall continue to be made independently by a free press—and whether the letter and spirit of the Constitution could possibly contemplate distinctions between print and broadcast journalism.

On July 13, the House debated whether CBS and I should be cited for contempt of Congress for refusing to yield the subpoenaed materials. The dialogue was heated, ofter acrimonious. But in the end the First Amendment prevailed. The Dean of the Congress, Emanuel Celler, Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, reflected the sense of the majority: "The First Amendment," he said, "towers over these proceedings like a colossus and no esprit de corps and no tenderness of one member for another should force us to topple over this monument to our liberties; that is, the First Amendment. . . . There may be no distinction between the right of a press reporter and a broadcaster. Otherwise, the stream of news may be dried up."

The stream of news, happily, has not dried up. And I am moved and appreciative that your thoughts of me, on this occasion, have centered on the need for broadcasting to be free, and on the duty to meet and overcome any threat to that freedom. As part of the free press we have been constantly aware that this freedom proved time and time again to be the salvation of this republic from excesses and abuses, social, economic and political.

Neither we nor the printed press before us came easily upon that freedom. From the earliest days of our nationhood, the press has fought repeatedly to assert and maintain its freedom, turning back assaults by those who, whether for cynical or for lofty reasons, sought to suppress or restrict it.

Ours, of course, is not by any means the only repository of the tradition of free inquiry in our nation. The inquiry function of Congress, subject to constitutional limitations, is essential to its basic role of effective law making. For decades the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee has made important contributions to the growth of both radio and television—and certainly it will continue to do so. The conflict which arose with it on a journalistic issue was unfortunate indeed, and it is a great pity that the issue could not have been resolved short of a First Amendment fight.

The defense of basic freedoms is a never-ending process—and it is important for us to realize that we are most in danger of losing them when we are most complacently sure that they are safe. The vitality and character of this nation of self-governing people would inevitably be eroded by any diminution of the freedoms of its journalism. You cannot have a self-governing people without having a fully informed people—a people free to know, free to discuss and free to draw their information from media which are themselves free to report. If media are held accountable to government for what they report and how they report it, you cannot have the informed debate and decision making which are the lifeblood of our nation.

The central act of a democracy is the choice, by the people, of its leadership. The essential ingredient in the electoral process, an informed electorate, became increasingly difficult to achieve as our nation expanded across a continent, as it grew towards a population of over 200 million, as its internal character and external relationships became infinitely more complex and its density was caught up in a speed of events that vastly reduced tolerable margins of error. Moreover, many of the old limitations of our political procedures became more hazardous—convention decisions made far from the sight and hearing of voters in the secrecy of smoke-filled rooms, for example, and candidates who were seen or heard during campaigns by only the tiny sprinkling of voters before whom they could appear in person.

More than any other factor, broadcasting with its directness, its immediacy and its ubiquity, changed all that. The electorate could be witnesses at nominating conventions. The voters could hear and, later, see for themselves the candidates seeking their votes. When radio began covering the conventions in 1924, the nominating process was released from the private domain of the political operators; a million and a quarter receiving sets all across the land were tuned in directly to the convention halls. From that point, the people were no longer dependent on what they were told about the proceedings: the people could hear for themselves, and they could make their decisions based upon direct access to the events and personalities of the campaign.

Slogans and hearsay gave way to direct exposure of candidates to the electorate, with a significance that is easily gauged. In the last election before the dawning of the broadcast era, in 1920, only 43.5 percent of eligible voters went to the polls, as compared to 64 percent in 1960, when suspension of the equal-time restrictions to permit the Kennedy-Nixon debates made possible the fullest use of broadcasting as yet in history.

But the effect of broadcasting upon the democratic experience has gone far beyond elections. The monumental events of this century—depression, wars, uneasy peace, the birth of more new nations in two decades than had occurred before in two centuries, undreamed of scientific breakthroughs, profound social revolution—all these were made immediate intimate realities to Americans through, first, the ears of radio and, later, the eyes of television. No longer were the decisions of the American people made in an information vacuum, as they witnessed the towering events of their time that were bound to have incisive political repercussions.

As broadcasters we can take pride in the role we have played in all this. We have not been blind to our responsibilities. Even our severest critics must concede that. Each of the broadcast media became, within the first generation of its existence, the first source of news to most of our countrymen. It has been this freedom from government intervention or control that has made possible the monumental achievement of U.S. broadcast journalism and is the primary condition of its survival.

Survival of broadcast freedom is not so often a matter of dramatic resistance as it is of constant watchfulness and quiet determination. The threat is not always direct or frontal. No one proclaims himself for government control of program content, whether news, entertainment or advertising. In fact, we have all come to recognize, as the first sign of proposals that would have the ultimate effect of government control, the protesting words from the proposer: "I am against censorship, I am against government control, but . . ."

You are familiar with the current inventory of existing and proposed restrictions on the freedom of broadcasting to do its job—which is to serve the American people in the same context of freedom that has given this nation the most varied and most effective communications media the world has ever known. If this roster of requirements and restraints had been applied to the printed media throughout our history, the freedom of all our institutions, and indeed of the American people themselves, would long since have been an abandoned dream of the Constitution-makers.

Consider the implications of only some of these restrictions, real or suggested:

The equal-time provision—Section 315—constantly crippling the most constructive use of broadcasting in the electoral process; compulsory access to the air, which would strip the licensee of the responsibility for what he broadcasts, even though he is held accountable for it; tortured applications of the fairness doctrine, reducing to an absurdity any valid concept of fairness to the listener and viewer;

the ban on broadcast advertising of lawful products whose advertising is permitted in all other media;

the compulsory allocation of broadcast time for "counter-advertising" which would destroy one of the mainsprings of our economy;

the establishment by government of arbitrary quantitative formulae for program content for times of day or segments of the audience—the ultimate example of Big Brother dividing the entire population into rigid, fixed categories.

Combined with the constant threat of investigation that hangs over broadcasting alone among the media, these restrictions are all the more insidiously erosive—insidious because the purposes put forth to justify the restraints and strictures are usually well-intentioned. "The greatest dangers to liberty," Justice Brandeis once said, "lurk in insidious encroachment by men of zeal, but without understanding."

Though there will be times in the future, as there have been in the past, when we will have resolutely to contest such encroachments, we must remember that the most eloquent defense of freedom is its wise and uncompromised use. This calls for not only courage and a steady sense of responsibility to the people rather than to the government, but also the capacity and willingness to welcome and heed fair criticism.

We are no more immune to error than is government or any other institution. If we do not recognize this—if we become too preoccupied with preserving old ways just to prove that we were right—then our obligation to explore new frontiers, to seach for new opportunities and to advance our standards of service will go by the board.

In short, we must be willing to admit error when error occurs. And in this connection we readily admit that "The Selling of the Pentagon," which was at the center of the controversy referred to earlier, was not flawless. CBS News conducted exhaustive studies over a long period of time not only of the factual basis of "The Selling of the Pentagon" but also of the way the reporting and editing processes of broadcast journalism could be improved. Out of such study emerged updated operating standards for news and public affairs broadcasts and renewed recognition that such standards must reflect a constant zeal for improvement. We must be willing and prompt to change when change is in the public interest. We must prove, by our actions rather than our words, that the way of freedom is more than the pale afterglow of ancient visions of the good society. Freedom must be the determining, lasting condition in which the institutions of our society, including broadcasting, are strong and healthy and best capable of fulfilling their mission.

I would like to believe that, after nearly half a century, the incredibly dynamic and constructive history of broadcasting has proved this conclusively. But conclusiveness is not a luxury visited upon free institutions. And today there are once again simering in Washington rumors of new investigations of broadcast journalism—its methods and its reporting. Once again, I am sure that, if this happens, the rationale will be a high-minded search for the facts. Once again the perilous truth will be that it is the search itself, and not its findings, whatever they might be, that does violence to the whole thrust and intent of the Constitution, by exposing broadcast journalism to harassments from which the First Amendment specifically protects printed journalism. And once again it will be the needs of the people which will suffer—unless all of us in broadcasting stand our ground.

We can do this with the incontrovertible awareness that broadcasting has made massive contributions to the strengthening of the democratic proposition in this country and that it has added immeasurable richness to the lives of our countrymen.

In accepting your generous citation today, I do so not with any sense of personal achievement but with profound gratitude that I have been permitted to share with you in what broadcasting has accomplished for the cause of enlightened freedom.

SUBPOENAS, OUTTAKES, AND FREEDOM OF THE PRESS; AN APPEAL TO MEDIA MANAGEMENT

(Remarks by Commissioner Nicholas Johnson to Washington Nieman Fellows, February 12, 1970)

United States District Attorneys across the country—presumably responding to the President and his Justice Department—have recently issued broad and sweeping subpoenas to numerous national newspapers, magazines and television networks. The media are being ordered to produce reporters' notes, correspondence, telephone call memoranda, and un-edited tapes and film—known in the television business as "outtakes." They are offering little but verbal resistance to these demands. The materials subpoenaed will apparently be used to prosecute persons who, among other things, have criticized the government.

We are also reading reports that, on several occasions, the government has disguised its agents as reporters to spy on other reporters in Vietnam who have criticized the military. Back in this country they are being used to gather evidence on citizens with "suspicious" political beliefs.

Black Panther organizations, long convinced that the predominantly white press was merely a "tool" of the government anyway, can now point to the media's response to this wave of government subpoenas as confirmation of their charges.

Reports indicate that local and state police and government officials throughout the country are following the Justice Department's lead with enthusiasm. They, too, view reporters' confidential notes and film as a new source of information for criminal prosecutions. And the local media owners often seem even less able and inclined to resist than the powerful national organizations.

I believe this wave of government subpoenas, together with other manipulations of the press, have placed the freedom and integrity of this country's news media in serious jeopardy.

The press in America has had a long and honorable tradition of protecting confidential news sources. Reporters have gone to jail or risked citations for contempt of court, rather than disclose names or other information given to them in trust. These traditions are essential to the full and open reporting all of us take for granted in this country. Surely it is too late to resurrect the 17th Century English Star Chamber tactics of suppression, intimidation and secrecy.

The United States Supreme Court has written that the First Amendment protects, not just the right of the press to speak, but the right of the people to hear. It protects our rights to receive information, as well as the right of the newsmen to gather and write about it. The Court has said, "Those [first amendment] guarantees are not for the benefit of the press so much as for the benefit of all of us."

Yet what will happen to freedom of news gathering—and therefore the public's access to vital information—if news sources know that the material they give in confidence can be subpoenaed by the government for use in public courts of law? The answer, I think, is clear: sources of news information will dry up. And newsmen know this better than anyone else.

In 1967, spokesmen for the Wall Street Journal estimated that 15% of the stories carried were based on information received in confidence. The Christian Science Monitor thought its percentage was as high as 33% to 50%. Sterling Noel, managing editor of the Baltimore News American, said: "Confidential sources for news stories are among the most widely used by all experienced newsmen, and particularly those covering politics and government agencies." Dale Belles, Jr., editor of the Gary Post-Tribune observed: "In a city like Gary, privilege of confidence enables us to keep the public informed as to how its business and law are being administered." Randall E. Shew, managing editor of the Ithaca Journal, felt: "Many investigations leading to exposure of misuse of publi ctrust never would have been started if the source of original information had not been assured that he would be protected by the newspaper." Gordon Pates, managing editor of the San Francisco Chronicle, reported: "An absolutely staggering number of news stories, political and non-political, arise from information received in confidence." And Robert Notson, executive editor of the Portland Oregonian, thought an average of a dozen stories a year of a "serious expose type" stemmed from confidential information: "In no other way can much evil-doing be brought to light for the benefit of the public. Possibility of contempt procedures [for reporters' refusal to divulge information or sources] can act as a prior restraint on news publication."

The practice of government subpoenas of news reporters' notes (on film or paper) will deter people from offering news to reporters in confidence; will prevent the media from exposing corruption in government and private circles; and may allow the government, once it learns the identity of the informant, to retaliate against the person with inside knowledge.

Already many residents of our large city ghettos fear and suspect members of the news media. The National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders (Kerner Commission Report) concluded that "most Negroes distrust what they refer to as the 'white press'" and "see the newspapers as mouthpieces of the 'power structure.'" This is central to its findings that "the communications media, ironically, have failed to communicate."

Just a few weeks ago, following what it called the CBS "capitulation" to the Justice Department's subpoenas, the Black Panther Party handed out flyers in front of the three network offices buildings in New York, stating:

> The interests of the U.S. government and those of the people who run media corporations are identical. . . . Employees of CBS and other media corporations can no longer ignore the fact that their executives have turned them into police agents.

Such expressions only corroborate the scene in Medium Cool in which similar feelings were voiced. A young black is addressing a television cameraman and soundman. He says:

> You can't just walk in out of your arrogance and expect things to be like they are, because when you walked in you brought LaSalle Street with you, City Hall, and all the mass communications media. And you are the exploiters. You're the ones who distort and ridicule and emasculate us. And that ain't cool.

Now the Panthers feel they have proof of these charges.

Recently the Justice Department also subpoenaed the notes of a Fortune magazine writer about James Ling, head of Ling-Temco-Vought, to use against him in an antitrust proceeding. I am sure the Panthers will watch with cynical interest whether the Fortune branch of Time-Life will give as little protection to the confidentiality of Mr. Ling's statements as its Time branch provides the Panthers.

The growing suspicion of ghetto residents and others that members of the press are working as informers for the government will do more than cut off reporters, and therefore the country, from the news. It may even subject reporters to the grave and omnipresent threat of physical danger. Recently the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees Cameramen's Union has asked for increased protection in covering riots and civil disorders because of these kind of risks. Perhaps, if the costs of providing such protection become high enough, we can then expect management to react on the more fundamental free speech issues. But at the present time even threats to the physical well being of their own employees are not sufficient to move these financiers to effective legal action to resist the barrage of Justice Department subpoenas which has apparently existed for several years.

The Justice Department has either forgotten or ignored Supreme Court Justice Brennan's warning that First Amendment freedoms are "delicate and vulnerable," as well as supremely precious in our society. The threat of sanctions may deter their exercise almost as potently as the actual application of sanctions. What I am afraid we are witnessing in this country is a move by the government which may stem the free flow of information and news to the public. It is shocking and saddening that the establishment press is so willing to acquiesce. The media have vast financial and legal resources at their command. The country could only benefit if they were to resist government encroachments upon their independence and defend, in court, their absolute first amendment right to refuse such subpoenas. Any criminal lawyer worth his salt will immediately go into court and vigorously raise every conceivable defense to protect his client. I think we are entitled to at least as much from the owners of the press when our First Amendment rights are concerned. Despite a practice lasting several years, however, the monolithic news media have yet to file one motion of resistance in court. Why have they been so silent?

It is time that the people of this country are told that their freedom of the press is not being staunchly defended against government encroachment by the established media. Many of our leading purveyors of news—Time, Life, CBS and numerous individual stations—have already complied with Justice Department subpoenas, publicly offering nothing but token resistance. Has the press, traditional watchdog for our First Amendment freedoms, fallen asleep? Who will defend this vital right if not the press itself?

If sketchy newspaper accounts are accurate, we have learned that the Justice Department has on numerous occasions used subpoena powers to order delivery of notes and other information by reporters for use in criminal prosecutions. Here is a list of certain actions that have been made public. How many more there are we may never know.

During the lengthy trials following the Chicago Democratic Convention demonstrations, the local news media—especially broadcast stations—received repeated subpoenas for news film. Reporters said the practice was "an almost daily burden of nearly unmanageable proportions. 'We are treated as evidence gatherers for the law.' " (Broadcasting, Feb. 9, 1970, p. 58.)

Following the "Weathermen" incident in Chicago, October 1969, the U.S. Attorney demanded that Chicago's four daily newspapers, its TV stations, and Time, Life and Newsweek magazines, turn over films, photos and files on the incident. Time and Life apparently complied; Newsweek is trying to protect confidential informants; and the newspapers are apparently willing to turn over information that the government cannot get elsewhere. (Washington Post, Feb. 4, 1970, p. A-4.)

After the Chicago police raid on the Chicago Black Panthers, December 1969, "blanket subpoenas" were again issued to the Chicago media, according to Chicago Sun-Times editor, James Hoge. Apparently the Chicago media have not vigorously or publicly resisted. (Washington Post, Feb. 4, 1970, p. A-4.)

In connection with the Government's prosecution of David Hilliard, West Coast Black Panther leader, for allegedly threatening the President, the Justice Department issued on January 8, 1970, a subpoena for all CBS video tape (including "outtakes," the unused portions of the interview' made in connection with the "60 Minutes" program on the Black Panthers broadcast January 6, 1970. According to indications from CBS News President Richard Salant, CBS's initial response was to supply the requested material. (Broadcasting, Feb. 2, 1970, p. 55.)

Apparently unsatisfied with even this broad subpoena, the Justice Department—this time in conection with the Secret Service and the FBI—issued a second subpoena against CBS on January 26, 1970, demanding records of all correspondence, memoranda, notes and telephone calls made in connection with the "60 Minutes" Black Panthers program, including material relating to the CBS interview with Eldridge Cleaver, the Panthers' minister of information, made in Algeria. This second subpoena covered materials from mid-1968 to 1970. A CBS legal spokesman said they might go to court if a "really solid" freedom-of-the-press question were raised, but indicated he wanted to reach an accommodation with the federal authorities. Richard Salant indicated CBS might help supply government with information in limited cases, even though it "might hurt journalistic functions." (Broadcasting, Feb. 2, 1970, p. 55.) CBS now says it may challenge subpoenas in "appropriate" cases and Salant has now expressed his personal opposition to the subpoena procedure. (Washington Post, Feb. 4, 1970, p. A–4.)

The Justice Department recently subpoenaed all the notes and tape recordings of New York Times reporter Earl Caldwell, made with Black Panthers during interviews dating back to the start of 1969. (Washington Post, Feb. 6, 1970, p. A–4.) At last report, the Justice Department had "postponed indefinitely" its subpoena of Caldwell. (Washington Post, Feb. 11, 1970, p. A–14.)

The executive editor of the Washington Post reported that twice in the past two years the Post has been asked to supply photographs for use in criminal actions. The Post refused both requests. (Washington Post, Feb. 4, 1970, p. A–4.)

In 1968, following the April 1967 civil disorders in Washington, D.C., the Justice Department subpoenaed newsfilm and news photographs of TV stations and newspapers. After conferences between Justice and the stations, some of the film was viewed at the stations. (Broadcasting, Feb. 9, 1970, p. 60.)

On October 2, 1969, the Justice Department subpoenaed all the notes of Fortune magazine reporter John McDonald on an interview with James Ling, head of Ling-Temco-Vought, in connection with an antitrust proceeding, as well as McDonald's tape recordings, documents furnished by Ling, and "the successive drafts" of McDonald's article before it was published. While Fortune was considering the request, officials from the Justice Department visited Time's headquarters and appropriated the written material. Now, four months later, Justice has publicly apologized. (New York Times, Feb. 10, 1970.)

Film shot by WBAL-TV, Baltimore, Maryland, cameramen of the "D.C. Nine" raid on the offices of Dow Chemical last year in Washington, D.C. was subpoenaed and introduced as evidence at trial. (Broadcasting, Feb. 9, 1970, p. 60.)

At the trial of the "Catonsville Nine," a group accused of burning draft files in Baltimore, air film as well as "outtakes" were subpoenaed and used at trial. (Broadcasting, Feb. 9, 1970, p. 60.)

It is clear from these incidents (and perhaps other that have not yet been disclosed) that the government's practice of ransacking the minds and memories of the press is established, long-standing, and widespread. Robert Ferrante, news director for WBBM-TV, Chicago, stated that the government began asking for on-the-air film before the 1968 Democratic Convention. But "after the convention the government attorneys began to ask for the out-takes in addition to the on-the-air pieces." "Time and time again we have been asked on short notice to supply film," Mr. Ferrante said. "The situation is totally out of hand."

Over a year ago I said:

> At least I think my own position is fairly clear. Suppose the FCC was about to order a national network to produce news film that was taken by its cameramen but not used over the air—what are called "outtakes" in the trade. I would urge my colleagues that we do so as a matter of propriety. . . . I am pleased the Commission has not voted to pursue such a request. In an [earlier] opinion I "urge[d] that this Commission should constantly be on guard against actions of government—especially this agency—that might impede 'robust, wide-open debate' or 'aggressive news coverage and commentary.'" (Statement to the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence, Dec. 19, p. 38.)

I have fought for this position constantly as challenges to press freedom arose. I have often been disheartened by the weak positions of media management. But never during my tenure as an FCC Commissioner have I seen such serious threats to the integrity of the news media as I think we have witnessed from certain departments of government during the past few months.

The government's actions already have begun to have their impact on news media as I think we have witnessed from certain departments of government during the past few months.

The government's actions already have begun to have their impact on news freedom. Walter Cronkite recently said: "There have been two cases already this week where officials have refused to talk off the record for fear that their remarks would show up in court." Robert Ferrante of WBBM-TV has recommended that all film and recording tape outtakes be erased or destroyed 12 hours after the film was aired. Broadcasting magazine just reported (Feb. 9, 1970, p. 60) that one unidentified station "already is destroying unused tape recordings."

The reporters for media interests have generally condemned all requests for confidential reporters' notes and information. Several dozen Wall Street Journal reporters signed a petition asking their management not to put them in "the role of a government investigator or lend unintentional support to political organization as these other news organizations have done" [apparently a reference to compliance by CBS, Time, Life and Newsweek with Justice Department requests]. Walter Cronkite of CBS said, "A news source is going to be very careful about talking to a reporter when he thinks it may end up in a court of law. What official is going to talk off the record when a reporter's notebook can be laid open in court? Our people cannot be informed if we have to work under those conditions." Chet Huntley of NBC viewed the trend as "dangerous business." And Frank Reynolds of ABC warned, "We've got to make it very clear we're not defending our right to broadcast, but the people's right to know."

The outrage of the professional reporters has been loud and articulate. But what has been the response of media management? Many of the major publications and networks appear to have (1) supplied portions of the requested information, or (2) used the rhetoric of condemning "indiscriminate" use of subpoenas while (3) offering to "negotiate" the details of what they will give to the government. Broadcasting reports (Feb. 9, 1970, p. 60) that "most stations, while reluctant to admit it, are supplying outtakes of film and tape and reporters' notes as well as on-the-air materials if they are on hand." CBS has announced it would comply with the Government's demands; however, it condemned "broad unrestricted" access to reporters' notes, notebooks and other materials not published, and declared its intention to contest such requests in "appropriate" cases. As of yet, however, apparently no such cases have arisen.

Recent incidents of television media acquiescence to government demands leaves one with the uneasy feeling that the networks, at least, will not do much fighting for freedom of the press. In November 1969, for example, Vice President Agnew criticized the television networks for their few and faltering attempts at analysis and explanation of President Nixon's Vietnam speech. The network heads responded with eloquent statements of determination to resist government commands. Yet a few weeks later when the President again spoke on Vietnam, there was no "analysis" at all; network silence was deafening. TV Guide saw it, and put it bluntly:

> Vice President Spiro T. Agnew's scolding of the networks apparently had the desired result: after President Nixon's Dec. 8 press conference, there was no criticism whatever from the commentators who followed him.
>
> Recently Vice President Agnew modestly reflected, "Sometimes when I look around at the tube from time to time, I think I have had a modicum of success." Indeed he has.

When CBS censored the requests of Carol Burnett and Elke Sommer that viewers send "Peace Letters" to Mrs. Martin Luther King, Variety magazine speculated that the network was being "hypersensitive to anything which might upset the White House."

I do not know whether these incidents, and media management's acquiescence to government subpoenas, are part of a larger pattern—with other, still undisclosed forms of media-government cooperation. But I do know that the chill which has spread, and is continuing to spread, over the news media has not been eased by the positions taken by media management.

Perhaps the full implications of what could happen in this country can be seen more clearly in the light of recent experiences in other countries. In South America, newspapers have been seized and newspaper executives arrested. In Turkey, one non-journalist was sentenced to jail for an essay submitted in a contest advocating socialism. In Greece, a new law imposes fines of more than $4,000 and long prison terms for articles "likely to undermine the public confidence" in the government and for publishing headlines, photographs, or drawings "which do not accurately represent the context of the report or deliberately mislead the reader." In Russia, writers have been publicly ridiculed and even jailed for "ideologically immature" works that "blacken" Soviet achievements. The newspaper Soviet Russia recently warned against admitting to the ranks of writers and journalists "young writers whose ideology is not yet formed." "What is important," the newspaper continued, "is not only how a writer writes, but what he writes about . . . , how party-minded his literary stand is."

Meanwhile, back in this country, the United States Information Agency (USIA) has produced and released for foreign distribution films boosting the Nixon Administration's Vietnam policy while, at the same time, it has blacklisted as "undesirable" books that might be "misunderstood" or prove "offensive" to foreign readers—books such as Beyond Vietnam by former U.S. Ambassador to Japan Edwin O. Reischauer ("didn't fit in with our purposes"), The Triumph by John Kenneth Galbraith ("counterproductive"), Freedom and Order by Henry Steele Commanger, The Negro and the City by the Editors of Fortune magazine ("a few injurious articles mar an otherwise acceptable book"), Tell Me How Long the Train's Been Gone by James Baldwin, The Center: People and Power in Political Washington by Stewart Alsop ("not beneficial to the program"), and In Dubious Battle by John Steinbeck ("unsuitable for use in the program").

During the past few days, Attorney General John Mitchell has announced his regrets at "any implication that the Department of Justice is interfering in the traditional freedom and independence of the press." However, he has promised that the Justice Department will henceforth "reach a compromise acceptable to both parties" when it wishes to examine photos, films, or reporters' files for use in criminal prosecutions.

Like Vice President Agnew, the Attorney General has reassured us that his Department's actions are "not censorship"; but, like the Vice President's speech, the "censorship" comes from the mere threat. It is, alas, a tried and true technique of all those who would wish to "control" the content of the news media to announce loudly and clearly that their actions are "not censorship," while at the same time acting to bring the press under their influence. This was almost precisely the position of the USSR when imposing censorship in Czechoslovakia in August 1968. Whether or not the government's recent actions be called "censorship," they have clearly had that result. It is no secret that police forces and other agencies of government all over the country have often looked upon the press with displeasure—for reports criticizing their operations, or attacks on the competency of government officials. Now they have been encouraged by the actions of the Justice Department to initiate their own fact-finding forays into the files and notes of newspaper reporters, sampling information given in confidence an dusing such of it (publicly or privately) that suits their purposes. This trend cannot be stopped by a few assurances that the Justice Department subpoenas were "not censorship." The damage has been done. It may take many, many years of actions of reassurance to remove the apprehensions brought about by the words and actions already unleashed.

News reporters, who have the day-to-day job of collecting and disseminating accurate and untainted information to the people, must now fear government "intimidation," an abuse of the trust built up between them and their confidential sources of information, and the drying up of important news material. Rather than come to their defense, however, media management has generally announced its intention to cooperate with the Justice Department in any "reasonable" requests. Is it not clear that a policy of cooperation with "reasonable" Justice Department requests is every bit as bad as an agreement to turn over all reporters' files on confidential interviews? What reporter, ahead of time, can know which portions of his notes the government and management will subsequently view as information which is "reasonably" within government demand? Management's cooperation policy will mean that no reporter will dare to give his sources assurances that their material will be kept in confidence; sources will refuse to talk; and reporters will refuse to take any information which might be within the reach of government subpoenas.

What accounts for news management's depressing eagerness to cooperate with the government's "reasonable" demands? The answer, I think, goes to the heart of government-press relations in this country. I regret to say it, but the press too often believes it is in its economic and political interests to establish "cordial" working relations with the government.

Thus, while the Administration criticizes the content of the media (and the Vice President even makes faint references to ownership patterns), it is quick to spring to the defense of the economic interests of television and newspapers. Thus, when the Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust indicated his opposition to the newspaper industry's monopoly authorization bill (the so-called "Failing Newspaper Act"), he was reversed by the White House, and the Administration sent the Commerce Department to support the bill. When the trade press reported that the FCC was prepared to oppose the Pastore Bill (S.2004) by a six-to-one vote, President Nixon appointed two new Commissioners (one of whom was on public record against the Bill), the agency's position on the bill was substantially altered, and it ultimately adopted a "policy statement" granting much of what the industry had urged Senator Pastore to enact into law. The FCC's action was seemingly designed as an "appropriate" response to Congressional interest, to avoid the "need" for legislation; yet when Senator McIntyre introduced legislation to split up some of the more offensive concentrations of media control in America, the FCC demonstrated no such response to Senatorial concern, and the President's "Director of Communications" announced that he opposed that legislation.

How sad that media management seems so willing to sacrifice so much for corporate greed. Variety magazine put it nicely when describing the broadcasters' eagerness to accept censorship over "violence" in TV programming if the government would protect them through the Pastore Bill:

> It has been made clear here, in a number of ways, that the ordinary broadcaster—the publisher of the airwaves—is willing to surrender still more of his First Amendment freedom for the promise of a perpetual license to do business. At gunpoint, and given the choice of "your money or your life," the ordinary citizen promptly yields up his money. Not so the broadcaster. (Variety, March 26, 1969, p. 74.)

The same forces are apparently at work in media management's willingness to negotiate its reporters' film and notes with Attorney General Mitchell.

No one has charged a "deal," and I do not. But the results are very much the same as if there were a government-media agreement that the media will take care of the Administration's image, if the Administration will take care of the media's balance sheets. This may be sufficient for the media's hired financial hands in the corporate board rooms, but what of the working reporters—or, more important, what of the needs of the American people for a free-swinging, couageous press committed to independent and investigative journalism? If the media have sold out the freedom of the press, then we will all pay a high price indeed.

Professor Jerome Barron has charged, accurately I believe, that the broadcasting industry has primarily invoked the First Amendment's protections "for completely commercial and non-ideological ends." Broadcasters, for example, have been willing to fight the FCC's insistence upon anti-smoking advertisements all the way to the Supreme Court on First Amendment grounds. Yet the industry has never filed even one amicus brief before the FCC in behalf of a broadcaster—such as the Pacifica stations—threatened with sanctions for the pure speech-content of his programming. One Broadcasting magazine editorial even gratuitously recommended to the FCC that the constitutional protections of free sueech not be extended to a Pacifica station for a poem it broadcast. And now the broadcasting industry's response to Justice Department subpoenas has been to "negotiate" demands to both parties' "mutual satisfaction."

There are similar dangerous trends in our society: Government agents have reportedly disguised themselves as reporters or cameramen—even on the steps of the Supreme Court—not to cover the news, but to gather information on the political beliefs of those against whom possible prosecutions might be brought. Government undercover agents, most recently in Vietnam, have also disguised themselves as members of the press—some believe to spy on other reporters who wrote articles critical of the government's "Vietnamization" policies. Now the Justice Department has acted in ways that will convert the reporter himself into a government agent, whose notes and private thoughts will be kept constantly on tap, their contents to be negotiated with the government on "reasonable" demand—in exchange for political and economic protection. What will happen to the integrity of, and public confidence in, the press of this country if this policy is not immediately reversed?

I believe we are entitled to know the extent to which the networks and broadcasting industry have already "cooperated" and "negotiated" with government prosecuting attorneys by turning over to them information in a manner that will jeopardize open channels of communications in this country. I believe we must all appeal to the leaders of the broadcasting industry to put aside their self-serving lust for corporate profits and power politics—at least long enough to defend those precious freedoms of a free press upon which all of us are so utterly dependent.

BROADCAST NEWS AND THE FAIRNESS DOCTRINE

(By Corydon B. Dunham)

(An address before the Practicing Law Institute's seminar on Business and Legal Problems of Television and Radio by Corydon B. Dunham, Vice President and General Counsel, NBC, February 27, 1971)

The law's protection of private rights—such as in defamation—presents no substantial problem for news broadcasters. Truth is a defense and the trend is to provide greater freedom for news reporting provided it is not malicious.

The Fairness Doctrine of the Federal Communications Commission is quite another matter. What this does in a sense is to give the government the right to edit news programming in the name of the public interest. In the past five years, the government has moved its surveillance deeper into the news operations of stations. Government inquiry into news programming has become accepted and commonplace. There is a government presence in the station's newsroom.

Viewed from an historical perspective, we cannot help but see that the Fairness Doctrine has two characteristics significant to the relation between the government and the press:

1. It is a government standard—not a journalist's standard.
2. It is enforced by a government licensing system applied by the government—not by newsmen.

Two other aspects—both throwbacks to an earlier age—heighten the Doctrine's impact:

1. The newsman must answer when the government inquiry is made.
2. Truth is no defense.

It is no criticism of the courts, the Commission or the Commission staff to observe that these aspects of the Commission's Doctrine are regressive. But the fact is that television journalism has come under a shadow of expanding government regulation.

The television news broadcast by local stations and networks is the public's primary source of information. The potential for harm to news coverage and to the public's ability to know what's going on is there. Mere inadvertence by the government under the Fairness Doctrine system could result in a gradual stilling of those voices which are the most provocative, the most informative, the most critical of government—and the public is the loser.

Thus, in carrying out its obligations, the broadcaster faces two fundamentally inconsistent bodies of law—the Supreme Court's view of the need for press freedom from legal inhibitions and the Commission's Fairness Doctrine. The paradox is that both bodies of law have as their touchstone the public interest in the free flow of information and the full discussion of public affairs, but their basic assumptions are different. Their practical effects are different.

Defamation is a judicially developed body of law. In drafting the Times overlay, the Court takes as its starting point the First Amendment. Freedom of the press is mandated by the Constitution. Actions for libel have an inhibitory tendency and should, therefore, be limited. But in this as in other Freedom of the Press cases, the Court looks also to the basic policy underlying the Amendment.

That policy is the need of the individual in an open society for access to views and ideas on public issues and of information about the state of the nation, the operation of government and the conduct of public officials and figures. The media are the necessary marketplace of ideas. Basic to the Court's reasoning is the assumption the First Amendment policy will be better effectuated by freedom than by legal strictures or inhibitions. Only this week the Court has again decided to expand the newsman's protection against libel suits unless malice can be shown.

The materials constituting the Fairness Doctrine are the product of administrative decision making. The Commission takes as its starting point the public interest standard of the Communications Act. If the public interest is furthered by the airing of diverse views, then licensees should broadcast the desired contrast. And what better way to assure that they do so than by legal requirements and regulatory guidelines.

The Commission implements these regulations by recurring Commission inquiry of its licensees. This is not compelled by the Red Lion decision. If it were, it would seem a radical departure by the Supreme Court from its First Amendment stance in other Freedom of the Press cases. The expansion of Commission regulation over the television press flows not from court decision or experience with television news media as irresponsible, but essentially from the regulatory nature of the Commission's Doctrine—regulation begets regulation.

Commission decisions do reflect an awareness of a constitutional dimension but it must be the nature of any regulatory commission to believe that full discussion will be better effectuated by regulation than freedom.

This crucial difference is one I think may not be fully appreciated by either courts or administrators. The effect of the Fairness Doctrine can be fully as chilling on reporters and their media employers as the possibility of actions for money damages for libel. Perhaps more so. Reporters and editors are reasonably adept in spotting possible defamation and avoiding it, while getting the story in print. Truth is always a defense. Fair comment is privileged. The Supreme Court has long been sympathetic to the newsman's role. Most important, it has accepted that isolated mistakes are the price of a free and vigorous press.

It is rather different to ask newsmen to develop a sang froid about violating the Commission's Doctrine; where truth is irrelevant, there is no privilege and the Doctrine imposes affirmative requirements which are not news requirements.

News people must become more apprehensive about it. This result ought to concern everyone and certainly those of us who are lawyers for broadcast news. This is where I think lawyers have not done their job adequately. We have, by and large, failed to educate the Commission to the real and detrimental impact that their Fairness Doctrine procedures can have on the functioning of individual reporters, editors, cameramen and all the other individuals who make up a broadcast news operation.

Any government agency, as an institution, cannot help but develop blind spots that make it hard to see the adverse impact of a regulation that has laudable objectives.

In most cases of regulation by administrative agency, the burden is usually financial. In the case of information flow, the burden is not so much one of economics; it is that ordinary, quite typical and accepted regulatory procedures—successful when applied to transportation, oil and gas production and distribution, and securities—can have bad side effects indeed when applied to thought and communication. Negative sanctions can deter harmful behavior, but they rarely induce fearless reporting or robust debate.

Imagine, if you will, a system under which your State Bar Association would call on you to explain why you tried a case in a certain way, called or did not call a witness, wrote a contract paragraph in a certain way—all because it received a letter of complaint from a participant, witness, spectator or casual reader. The problem is not really whether you made the right judgment but rather the continual apprehension that what you are doing at any given moment may have to be explained at some subsequent date to a review board which, by the way, has the right to take away your license. Would this make you bolder and more courageous—or less so?

At least here, lawyers would be judging the work of lawyers. The Fairness Doctrine is not that newsmen judge the work of newsmen. I would guess that lawyers and administrators do not make good journalists. But somehow we have let ourselves believe that as lawyers we are competent to judge the work of newsmen although we would hesitate without expert assistance to judge the work of engineers, artists, doctors, etc. Certainly, we would never alow newsmen to judge lawyers if legal sanctions were involved.

News coverage presents an even more aggravated situation. Put apart the need for speed and the difficulty of covering a breaking news story. Your news reports must necessarily show some people differently than they see thmselves. Since news deals with change, it must necessarily antagonize both those who are opposed to change and those who are for it, but demand more, faster. So the opportunity for complaint-triggered review by government commission increases, the better you do your job. Is this a prior restraint? I think so.

Does the Fairness Doctrine work this way?

A Commission inquiry to a licensee is apparently prompted in most cases by a complaint originating outside the Commission itself. A member of the Commission's very limited staff forwards the complaint, generally about a news or public affairs program, to the licensee for its response. The licensee must then state whether a controversial issue is involved, what that issue is, whether or not the various points of view on that issue have been presented and when and what they are. The Commission's staff then decides whether, on this statement from the licensee, the broadcaster was reasonable in what it did.

This all sounds rather modest and even, to some, reassuring. But the difficulty is that to answer that inquiry from the agency, an investigation must be conducted within the news organization as to all the elements involved. The complaint itself may be a narrow one but to answer it requires a review of all broadcast matter over a period of time on that subject to show that all points of view have been covered. And the newsman must explain the issue and why he reported it the way he did. Beyond that a member of the Commission staff may—quite understandably—see a controversial issue where the newsman saw a factual presentation; he may see the point of view as different from what the broadcaster believed it to be; he may feel other points of view could have been presented—and decide against th broadcaster on any of these grounds. But even if he decides for the broadcaster, what has the impact been on the newsman?

The hazard for a station news operation is this: the more significant the change being reported, the more important that society learn of it; the more distrubing or unusual or provocative the change, then the more likely the report will be to trigger viewer complaints—either about the point of view broadcast, or that a more generally held point of view wasn't given the same or greater prominence. Good journalism thus becomes an occasion for government investigation.

The television journalist naturally turns in defensive reaction to the lawyers. But our advice to him must reflect requirements of the Fairness Doctrine, not the standards of professional journalism or requirements of news coverage. We must tell him that in the development of the news story or news program, the expression of any point of view carries with it a Fairness Doctrine obligation concerning other significant points of view, whether or not they are newsworthy, or all that pertinent to news coverage. We must tell him too, that if a complaint is made, the Commission may see the points of view presented and issues discussed as being different from what he thought they were.

Avoidance of news about vested interests, minorities, errors in government. will promise less government inquiry. A blander form of journalism becomes more attractive, and the result of such a government premium under Gresham's Law is uredictable—but not obvious. It may not be even noticed—the public, of course, does not see the provocative film which winds up on the cutting room floor.

My point is not that this is an intended result under the Fairness Doctrine regulation. Quite the contrary. The stated objective of the Fairness Doctrine is more provocative news coverage and a broader flow of information to the public. But the Fairness Doctrine has a basic infirmity—it is a government standard enforced by a government agency upon the press.

The experience of earlier societies and of contemporary closed societies more than demonstrates the inhibiting effect on the press of a government licensing system. This experience is what led to the First Amendment. The Fairness Doctrine when applied to news must be seen as a regression.

Let me give you the opinion of a working newsman, NBC's Bill Monroe, who is more familiar with Washington than most because that's where he works. In a recent comment, he points out that the government requiring television stations and networks to be fair in dealing with issues and elections is something that sounds reasonable. But the concept of government as a referee of news coverage is alien to the concept of a free press:

> "The newspaper editor and the television editor have the same basic instincts about what is fair and what isn't. The newspaper editor can go ahead and make his decisions on the basis of his own conscience. But the television editor has got to think also about what the FCC rules are, how those rules fit a particular case and what the FCC might think about it. And the Federal Communications Commission is not a board of independent journalists. It's a seven-man commission appointed by the President. It has a Democratic majority when President Johnson is in the White House and a Republican majority under President Nixon. So it is a board with a certain political tone to it that is guiding television editors on certain decisions in areas where no government body would dare tell newspaper editors what to do. Under these circumstances, is television a free element of a free press? No sir, it is not."

Mr. Monroe goes on to note:

> "Sometimes members of the FCC make speeches urging broadcasters to go in for bold, creative journalism. When they make such speeches, I'm sure they mean them. But the system they're a part of works in the opposite way, because the FCC has no way to reward you for bold, controversial journalism. All it has is a way to harass you. And you can be almost certain that, if you engage in hard-hitting, investigative journalism, you will make important people in one faction or another mad, they will complain to the FCC, the FCC will ask you for an explanation, and you'll have to spend as much time on a carefully researched and prepared document of explanation as you did on the original news project."

When we balance the public's right to know with the value of the Commission's inquiry, it would seem more in keeping with our historical tradition for the Commission to dismantle that part of the Fairness Doctrine apparatus that regulates television news. News reports should not be subject to editing by the government.

At the least, the Doctrine should be modified in its implementation. Overregulation is denying broadcast news the breathing space the Court has stated is essential for the press to play its constitutional role.

The Commission should refrain from acting upon complaints about isolated instances of alleged imbalance or unfairness. Its inquiries should be limited to documented allegations charging a pattern of bias, a practice of one-sided discussions.

I don't believe the Commission sees itself as required to pursue every viewer complaint about news operations. The Commission itself, for example, abandoned the Personal Attack Doctrine on hard news coverage. Would not regulation by the Commission's own standards be more affirmative if confined to allegations of a pattern of behavior? It should look for basic fairness on an overall basis.

This would also reduce the danger of inadvertent regulation from Commission inability to gauge the impact of its raised eyebrow. Increasingly critics of the Commission have observed the hazards of such indirect censorship.

The Commission should not require its licensees, in effect, to justify news coverage upon receipt of a complaint objecting to some particular news report. The usual procedure, however, now appears to be just that. Only after the broadcaster has supplied the requisite justification does the Commission then say that editorial judgment is not a proper subject for its inquiry—that such an inquiry is "inconsistent with our concept of a free press," or that the inquiry would involve the Commission "much too deeply in broadcast journalism."

Just eliminating the minute analysis of news programs to determine whether the material complained of is indeed a view on a controversial issue or an objective report of the facts would free the energies of all involved for more useful tasks. Fairness would not suffer. It is the rare, exceptional broadcaster who does not feel an obligation to report all significant views. The vast majority would strive for overall balance in any event. They merely want to be permitted to do their daily job of gathering the news, editing, organizing and presenting it without the ever-present threat that every decision may be scrutinized and dissected.

Lawyers have a special responsibility to see that the press stays strong, that its work stays free of government surveillance and regulation, that its reporters do not have reason to be apprehensive about legal strictures, so that people can learn what's going on.

BEFORE THE FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,

WASHINGTON, D.C.

FCC 71-623, 63540, Docket No. 19260

In the Matter of The Handling of Public Issues Under the Fairness Doctrine and the Public Interest Standards of the Communications Act.

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Adopted June 9, 1971; Released June 11, 1971

By the Commission: Commissioner Robert E. Lee absent; Commissioners Johnson and Wells concurring and issuing statements.

I. INTRODUCTION

1. The purpose of this Notice is to institute a broad-ranging inquiry into the efficacy of the fairness doctrine and other Commission public interest policies, in the light of current demands for access to the broadcast media to consider issues of public concern. It is important to stress that we are not hereby disparaging any of the ad hoc rulings that we have made in these areas. Rather, we feel the time has come for an overview to determine whether the policies derived largely from these rulings should be retained intact or, in lesser or greater degree, modified. We have divided the inquiry into four parts: (i) the fairness doctrine generally; (ii) access to broadcast media as a result of the presentation of product commercials; (iii) access generally for discussion of public issues; and (iv) application of the fairness doctrine to political broadcasts. Obviously, these parts overlap. Indeed, each is an aspect of the underlying problem of access. Interested parties may address any or all these aspects, or they may structure their comments in accordance with their own definition of the problem.

2. Several issues to which we direct particular attention have been the subject of recent Commission decisions in which both the legal and policy considerations have been treated in depth. We will not here repeat the extensive majority and minority opinions. Rather, we refer interested parties to the cited cases where they will find full treatment of the pertinent policy matters here under review.

3. We stress that we are interested in fundamental policy—not in a re-hash of legal considerations nor in recommendations of statutory revision. Thus, this Commission cannot abandon the fairness doctrine or treat broadcasters as common carriers who must accept all material offered by any and all comers. The Communications Act is explicit in these respects (see Section 315(a) and Section 3(h)) and we take the Act as a "given" from which this inquiry necessarily proceeds. Furthermore, there are court appeals pending on several disputed legal decisions will, of course, be appropriately taken into account in the course of this proceeding.

4. This Notice thus deals with Commission-made policy—derived from the Act and from the standards set down therein. But, in view of the broad nature of these standards, there can and must be considerable leeway in both policy formulation and application in specific cases. The goal is clear: to foster "uninhibited, robust, wide-open" debate on public issues (New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270). That is the profound, unquestioned national commitment embodied in the First Amendment. The basic issue we pose here is whether Commission-made policies indeed promote that goal to the maximum extent. Or, are there revisions or even entirely new policies that would serve it more effectively?

5. Finally, by way of introduction, we note that promotion of the goal cited above must be consistent with the "public interest in the larger and more effective use of radio" (Section 303(g)). It is most important to note in this connection that, to a major extent, ours is a commercially-based broadcast system and that this system renders a vital service to the nation. Any policies adopted by this Commission in the areas covered in the present inquiry should be consistent with the maintenance and growth of that system and should, among other appropriate standards, be so measured. We urge all interested parties to keep this pragmatic standard centrally in mind in forwarding specific comments and proposals. Proposals that in the short run might afford great insight into public issues but in the long run might tend to undermine the existing broadcast system—e.g., nothing but informational programming in a debate format—would not, in this view, serve the public interest.

II. THE FAIRNESS DOCTRINE GENERALLY.

6. The fairness doctrine has evolved over some forty years as the guiding principle in assuring to the public an opportunity to hear contrasting views on controversial issues of public importance. Enunciated as early as 1929 by the Federal Radio Commission,[1] the fairness doctrine was most fully fleshed out in the Report on Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 FCC 1246 (1949), and has been sustained by the Supreme Court as within the Commission's statutory authority (Section 315(a)) and in full accord with the First Amendment. Red Lion Broadcasting Co., Inc. v. F.C.C. 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

7. The fairness doctrine is grounded in the recognition that the airwaves are inherently not available to all who would use them. It requires that those given the privilege of access hold their licenses and use their facilities as trustees for the public at large, with a duty to present discussion of public issues and to do so fairly by affording reasonable opportunity for the presentation of conflicting views by appropriate spokesmen. The individual licensee has the discretion, and indeed the responsibility, to determine what issues should be covered, how much time should be allocated, which spokesmen should appear, and in what format. Only in the case of personal attacks or an editorial taking sides among competing candidates is there a specific requirement as to the person to whom the station must make time available. And even this exception rests not upon an individual's right to be heard but, rather, upon the proposition that the public's right to be informed will be best served if the person attacked or the candidate opposed presents the contrasting viewpoint. The guiding premise, as the Supreme Court put it, is not "an unabridgeable First Amendment right to broadcast comparable to the right of every individual to speak, write, or publish" but rather "the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral, and other ideas and experiences . . . ." Red Lion Broadcasting Co., supra, at p. 390. Indeed, it is this right that goes far to explain the amount of spectrum space devoted to broadcasting.

8. With the exception of the personal attack and political editorializing rules, it has not been found necessary to formulate detailed and definitive guidelines for licensees applying the fairness doctrine in their day-to-day operations. Rather, the doctrine has been refined case-by-case in particular and concrete situations. See Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine to Broadcast Licensees (Fairness Primer), 29 F.R. 10415 (1964).[2] We by no means denigrate this manner of proceeding. It has in its broad effect served the nation well, and Commission rulings have been realistically and thus, we believe, soundly based. But, at the same time, it does seem to us desirable to take the longer view that an overall inquiry affords—thus permitting all interested parties to be heard and not just those involved in specific complaints. It has been about twenty-two years since we issued our 1949 Report on Editorializing, supra, and we think it is time for another overview. If our policies are sound, they should have stood the test of time and application. If they are not sound—if they unreasonably restrict the journalistic functions of boardcasters or permit broadcasters unreasonably to restrict access—then corrective action is called for. Indeed, in the personal attack and political editorializing fields, we pledged that we would act promptly if we were shown that in actual operation our policies did not promote the fundamental purposes of the First Amendment. 22 Fed. Reg. 11531, 11532; 33 Fed. Reg. 5363, 5364. This also is the thrust of the Supreme Court's opinion in Red Lion (395 U.S. at pp. 392–93).

---

[1] See Great Lakes Broadcasting Co., 3 F.R.C. Annual Rept. 32 (1929), reversed on other grounds 37 F. 2d 993 (C.A.D.C.), certiorari dismissed, 281 U.S. 706.

[2] We have outstanding one Notice of Proposed Rulemaking in the fairness area. See Docket No. 18859. That Notice deals with a specific proposal, however, and not the broad overview here contemplated.

9. This part of the inquiry thus gives broadcasters and all other interested parties the opportunity to advance their ideas, concerning the fairness doctrine generally, for improving, refining, or even drastically revising Commission policies. They may direct their attention to any aspect of the policies set out in the Fairness Primer or in more recent cases. We cite the following as just a few examples of important issues in this area:

(i) How have the personal attack and political editorializing rules worked in actual practice? Should they be revised in any way to achieve their stated goals?

(ii) Has the fairness doctrine in fact promoted the "more effective use of radio" in the discussion of controversial public issues, or has it served to inhibit wide-open debate? (In this connection, we also direct attention to our processing policies—see Fairness Primer, 29 F.R. at p. 10416; Letter to Hon. Oren Harris, FCC 63–851; and Letter to Mr. Allen Phelps, 21 FCC 2d 12 (1969)).

(iii) Should the Cullman rule, 40 FCC 576 (1963), which lays down the principle that the right of the public to hear contrasting views on significant public issues is so important that licensees must make time available without charge if necessary—be expanded or restricted, or otherwise refined?

10. We repeat: these are examples only. All intersted parties are invited to frame their own questions in addressing the strengths and shortcomings of the fairness doctrine generally.

III. ACCESS TO THE BROADCAST MEDIA AS A RESULT OF CARRIAGE OF PRODUCT COMMERCIALS.

11. This aspect of the inquiry is prompted by a recent court decision and several complaints in which very broad-ranging policy questions appeared to be raised—questions that reach beyond the concrete situations involved. Thus, we deal first with the policy questions raised in the opinion of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in Retail Store Employees Union v. F.C.C., Case No. 22, 605, decided October 27, 1970. We refer specifically to the issues raised in Part III of the opinion.[3] The factual setting is simply stated: a department store (Hill's) had access to a station's facilities (WREO) to present frequent advertisements of the standard commercial nature (". . . extolling the virtues of Hill's stocks, bargains, and services and on that basis urging listeners to patronize the various Hill's outlets"—pp. 2–3, Sl.Op.). The employee union at the store decided on a strike and boycott to gain its bargaining objectives. It sought to support the boycott by purchasing time for one-minute announcements stating that there was a strike at Hill's and urging listeners to respect the picket lines. These bare facts are sufficient to pose the basic issue: namely, does the union have a right to purchase time for its spots in these circumstances?

12. In view of its holding on another matter not relevant here, the Court did not resolve the above issue. But it did indicate that the issue ". . . deserves

---

[3] The court noted that unlike the issue in Part II of the opinion, the issues in Part III do not call into question the renewal of license of the station involved and, therefore, the Commission might wish to separate those issues from the license renewal proceedings (n. 50, Sl. Op.). We think that such separation is clearly appropriate and accordingly have done so. See Order released April 26, 1971 in Radio Enterprises of Oh, Inc., FCC 71–401.

We also note that the Amalgamated Meat Cutters case, 25 FCC 2d 279 (1970), raises the same basic issue, and for that reason we requested its remand from the Court. The parties to the two above proceedings should accordingly address themselves in this proceeding to the questions raised by the Court in Retail Store.

fuller analysis than the Commission has seen fit to give it" (part A, p. 20, Sl. Op.). The Court then noted (part B, p. 20, Sl. Op.):

> "Central to the Union's argument on this point is the proposition that, in urging listeners to patronize Hill's Ashtabula Department Store, Hill's advertisements presented one side of a controversial issue of public importance. Hill's copy, of course, made no mention of the strike or boycott, or of the unresolved issues between the Union and the store. But the advertisements did urge the listening public to take one of the two competing sides on the boycott question—they urged the public to patronize the store, i.e., not to boycott. It seems to us an adequate answer to tihs argument merely to point out that Hill's copy made no specific mention of the boycott. In dealing with cigarette advertising, the Commission has recognized that a position represented by an advertisement may be implicit rather than explicit . . . ."

The Court noted a further analogy to the Cigarette Advertising ruling—that here also there is an established Congressional policy involved. In this instance, the policy is even-handedness in labor-management relations in which both Union publicity and Hill's commercials might be viewed as weapons of "economic warfare." In the Court's words (part C, pp. 21–22):

> "If viewed in this light, it could well be argued that the traditional purposes of the fairness doctrine are not substantially served by presentation of advertisements intended less to inform than to serve merely as a weapon in a labor-management dispute. But the fairness doctrine, as we have pointed out, is only one aspect of the FCC's implementation of the statutory requirement that broadcast stations operate to serve the public interest. [Footnote omitted.] The public policy of the United States has been declared by Congress as favoring the equalization of economic bargaining power between workers and their employers. [Footnote omitted.] It is at the very least a fair question whether a radio station properly serves the public interest by making available to an employer broadcast time for the purpose of urging the public to patronize his store, while denying the employees any remotely comparable opportunity to urge the public to join their side of the strife and boycott the employer. If the Union's claim is to be rejected, we believe this question should be dealt with by the Commission."

13. The Court noted that it had not attempted a full canvass of all the issues involved but had merely indicated some of the principal questions to be answered. In the circumstances, we believe that an overall inquiry is the best way to proceed, thus allowing for maximum participation and maximum opportunity for sound policy formulation. The issue has been posed here in terms of Retail Store but, clearly, it has wider ramifications. The issue really is the right of access, if any, to the broadcast media to respond to product commercials.

14. Two of the Court's basic considerations—that product commercials can carry implicit messages and that pertinent national policies should be taken into account—have very wide applications indeed. For example, we might consider the national policy of avoiding environmental pollution (see National Environmental Policy Act of 1969, 83 Stat. 852, Section 101(a)). As we indicated in our Letter to Mr. Soucie, 24 FCC 2d 743 (1970), appeal pending sub nom. Friends of the Earth v. F.C.C., Case No. 24556, C.A.D.C., a great number of products commonly advertised over the broadcast media have pollution consequences: cars because of their gasoline engines; gasoline itself; airplanes; detergents; and, indeed, every product that is normally packaged in a non-biodegradable container. Commercials urging use of these products or services thus can be argued to raise implicit ecological questions. Other product commercials, similarly, could be argued to raise significant national policy questions: commercials promoting the use of aspirin, tranquillizers, soporifiers, etc., on the ground that they indirectly promote overuse of drugs generally and thus might lead to harmful, illegal drug use; commercials depicting women in a manner charged to be offensive to the national policy of equal rights and equal treatment of the sexes; etc.[4]

---

[4] There is also the issue raised by armed forces recruiting announcements, both commercial and of a public service nature, see, e.g., the policy issues considered in such recent rulings as Letter to Mr. Albert A. Kramer, FCC 70–596, and Letters to Mr. Donald A. Jellinek, FCC 70–595.

It is not necessary to list more examples. The contention is that, almost without exception, product commercials can be argued to raise some significant, controversial issue—and as public awareness grows, so, too, does the occasion for making such arguments. On the other hand, the Court notes in Retail Store (Sl. Op., pp. 21–22, n. 67) that the ". . . Commission repeatedly emphasized that its holding in [Cigarette Advertising]—that stations broadcasting cigarette advertisements must regularly provide free time if necessary for the presentation of arguments opposing cigarette smoking—was limited to cigarette advertising. . . ." The Court further stated that this holding was based on the ground that "the implicit and explicit messages normally carried by advertising do not concern controversial issues of public importance." (Sl. Op., p. 21).

In this connection, we also note that the Court in Banzhaf v. F.C.C., 405 F. 2d 1082 (C.A.D.C., 1968), certiorari denied, 396 U.S. 842 (1969), pointed out that cigarettes were ". . . in fact the product singled out for special treatment which justifies the action taken" and emphasized that ". . . [its] cautious approval of this particular decision does not license the Commission to scan the airwaves for offensive material with no more discriminating a lens than the public interest or even the public health."

15. Free time. On the important issue of extending the Cigarette Advertising ruling to cover all product commercials,[5] we set out our position in Letter to Mr. Soucie, supra, and in Complaint of Alan F. Neckritz and Lawrence B. Ordower, FFC 71–526, released May 13, 1971. We specified in those rulings and will not here repeat our reasons for believing (i) that most product commercials are distinguishable from cigarette advertising and (ii) that, in any event, it would not serve the public interest to hold that for nearly every product commercial the licensee must make free time available—on a virtually daily basis, in a set ratio, in part during prime viewing hours—for counter-commercials informing the public why they should not purchase the product or services in question. In Neckritz, the Commission majority indicated its view that the advertisements for Chevron advanced a claim for product efficacy, that this is not the same as arguing a position on a controversial issue of public importance, and that it "would ill suit the purposes of the fairness doctrine, designed to illumine significant controversial issues, to apply it to claims of a product's efficacy or social utility." We indicated in Neckritz the desirability of an overview of the policy issues involved, and we here invite interested parties to address such issues as the following:

(i) Ought there be some public interest responsibility beyond that of fairness to carry material opposing or arguing the substance of product commercials? If so, should time be afforded free or only on a paid basis?

(ii) What account should be taken of the Court's observation (in Retail Store) that spot announcements may not add substantially to public knowledge and, on the other hand, that repetition is a significant factor to be considered?

(iii) What should or must be the licensee's area of discretion in this entire matter—and is there some workable standard for distinguishing various categories or commercials, some of which would give rise to fairness or public interest duties and some of which would not?

(iv) Finally, what would be the predictable effect of any new policy adopted here on the carriage of product advertisements and thus on the continued growth and health of the commercial broadcasting system?

16. Paid time. This brings us to the heart of the inquiry posed by the Retail Store decision—namely, the right of paid access to inform the public why a product or service advertised over the station's facilities should not be purchased. The Court in Retail Store posed the issue in terms of a national policy for equalizing economic bargaining power between workers and employers, and we have noted that other national policies might be pertinent in other circumstances. The broad issue posed is whether fairness and/or the public interest standard[6] imposes a kind of "equal opportunities" obligation on the broadcaster—that is, if he sells time for the promotion of products and services, must he also sell time to others, to consumer and public interest groups for example, who wish to argue against public use of these products or services? We call for comment, pro and con, on the policy implications and the pragmatic effects of this equation.

---

[5] In Letter to Mr. Soucie and the Neckritz ruling, we pointed out that there can be product commercials that do deal directly with controversial issues of public importance. In such cases of course the fairness doctrine, including the Cullman principle, is clearly applicable.

17. Alleged false and misleading advertising. We direct the attention of interested parties to Commission policy in the area of advertising that is alleged to be false and misleading—as, for example, in the recent Chevron case. Complaint of Alan F. Neckritz and Lawrence B. Ordower, FCC 71–526, released May 13, 1971. The Commission majority held that the Letter to Mr. Soucie was applicable and that to prohibit such advertising in advance of a pending Federal Trade Commission ruling would be a case of "sentence first, verdict later." It also stated that the issues raised were of such broad-ranging importance as to warrant an overall inquiry; and the present proceeding is in part responsive to that finding. We thus specifically raise the question whether the public interest calls for any revision or refinements in existing Commission policy with respect to false and misleading advertising, or allegations thereof, and whether we might lay down new policy guidelines for the benefit of broadcasters and the public alike.

18. The foregoing by no means exhausts the possible issues that are involved in the area of product commercials. We have simply raised those that appear to us to be of the greatest current importance. We stress again that we hope to evolve or reaffirm policies that are fair to all concerned, that promote the commercial broadcasting system, and above all that serve "the public interest in the larger and more effective use" of the broadcast media.

IV. ACCESS GENERALLY TO THE BROADEST MEDIA FOR THE DISCUSSION OF PUBLIC ISSUES

19. It has also been urged that, quite aside from the fairness obligation of broadcasters, there is a right of access—at least on a paid basis—for all those wishing to express a viewpoint on a controversial public issue. The Commission has rejected this blanket claim on the ground that there is neither Constitutional nor statutory right for any individual or group to present their views, and that as a matter of policy it would not serve the public interest to act as if there were. See, e.g., the Democratic National Committee ruling, 25 FCC 2d 216 (1970), appeal pending, Democratic National Committee v. F.C.C., Case No. 24,537, C.A.D.C.; Business Executives' Move for Vietnam Peace v. F.C.C., Case No. 24,942, C.A.D.C. The legal issues are thus before the Court, and the policy issues are sharply pointed up in the majority and minority opinions of the Commission. We request comment on the question whether there is any feasible method of providing access for discussion of public issues outside the requirements of the fairness doctrine. More specifically, we ask that comment be addressed to the differing problems raised by paid and free time; the specific standards that should be followed for determining the basis on which time is to provided, if such a course is recommended; the effect of any such new procedure on the licensee's general responsibility to the public; and the impact of such procedure on the licensee's duties under the fairness doctrine. The essential purpose of this part of the inquiry is to ascertain, if possible, the general patterns of licensee practice as to access on a paid or sustaining basis (e.g., for discussion of controversial issues generally or of ballot issues; for fund solicitation generally or for parties or committees organized around ballot issues), and whether it would be appropriate for this Commission to lay down criteria or guidelines for these purposes. If so, what would they be? Or, are the problems in this area so varied that decisions should be left to the judgment of thousands of licensees and, in cases of complaint, to the adjudicatory process? In other words: should we reaffirm present Commission policy and practice?

---

[6] In Retail Store, the Court noted that the purposes of the fairness doctrine might not be advanced by presentation of the boycott advertisements but nevertheless raised the question whether the public interest did not require such presentation. See also Banzhaf v. F.C.C., supra, where the Court, in affirming our Cigarette Advertising ruling, held that the Commission's action was based in fact on the public interest standard. The issue posed here is thus not one of trying to fit concepts into the fairness mold but, rather, what the public interest calls for.

V. APPLICATION OF THE FAIRNESS DOCTRINE TO POLITICAL BROADCASTS

20. The Fairness Primer contains a number of rulings concerning the application of the doctrine to political broadcasts. There have been a number of important recent rulings in this area. As examples, we point to such rulings as the Letter to Mr. Nicholas Zappic, 23 FCC 2d 708 (1970); the Republican National Committee ruling, 25 FCC 2d 283, 299–301, 739 (1970), appeal pending, CBS v. F.C.C., Case No. 24,655, C.A.D.C.; Complaint of Committee for the Fair Broadcasting of Controversial Issues, 25 FCC 2d 283. 294–298 (1970). The first two set forth a quasi-equal opportunities approach—namely, that if a licensee sells or gives time to one political party, it should sell or give comparable time to the rival party, but that the Cullman principle is inapplicable here. The last cited case declined to extend the equal opportunities concept to such appearances by public officials as Presidential Reports to the nation—although it did hold, on the particular facts, that time for one uninterrupted presentation should be afforded to opposition spokesmen. We request comment on such relevant questions as the following: whether the quasi-equal opportunities approach should be restricted, expanded, or left alone, with a specific description of the feasibility and effect of any proposed revision on the underlying policies of the statute (see Section 315(a)). We recognize, of course, that actions by the Congress will be decisive in this area and that many statutory amendments are presently under consideration. If Congress does act, Commission policies will be appropriately revised.

VI. CONCLUSION

21. We have gone at some considerable length into the ranges of problems that have led us to propose this comprehensive overview. But interested parties will doubtless be able to suggest additional questions and variations on those we have raised. We welcome every approach. In view of the considerations discussed above (in para. 5), however, we urge that every comment be specific with reference to the practical effect of any proposals put forward.

22. It may also turn out that a further inquiry, narrowing the focus of consideration, would be useful. If we determine that new rules are appropriate, there will of course be a further opportunity to comment. It is also possible that the material submitted in response to this Notice will permit the adoption of a new policy statement without further proceedings, just as it is possible that no changes in present policy will be found to have merit. The response to this Nation will be largely determinative of our future course of action. In any event, we intend to employ special procedures and perhaps a select staff in this highly important inquiry.

23. Pursuant to applicable procedures set forth in Section 1.415 of the Commission's Rules and Regulations, interested parties may file comments on or before September 10, 1971, and reply comments on or before October 25, 1971. Comments may be filed as to any or all parts of the inquiry and should clearly delineate the focus of consideration. In accordance with the provisions of Section 1.419 of the rules, an original and 14 copies of all comments, replies, briefs, and other documents shall be furnished the Commission. All relevant and timely comments and reply comments will be considered by the Commission before final action is taken in this proceeding. In reaching its decision, the Commission may also take into account other relevant information before it, in addition to the specific comments invited by this Notice.

24. Authority for this inquiry is contained in Sections 4(i), 303, 307, 3 315(a), and 403 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended.

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION*
BEN F. WAPLE
Secretary.

FAIRNESS DOCTRINE NOTICE OF INQUIRY

[In re Notice of Inquiry into the Handling of Public Issues Under the Fairness Doctrine and the Public Interest Standards of the Communications Act]

Concurring Opinion of Commissioner Nicholas Johnson.

---

* See attached statements of Commissioners Johnson and Wells.

It is becoming increasingly clear that the Fairness Doctrine, rather than serving as a means of satisfying legitimate demands for access, is increasingly functioning as an "Unfairness Doctrine" by legitimizing broadcaster frustration of those demands. See, e.g., my dissenting opinions in Chevron F–310, FCC 71–526 (May 12, 1971); Friends of the Earth, 24 F.C.C. 2d 743, 452 (1970); Democratic National Committee, 25 F.C.C. 2d 216, 230 (1970); BEM, 25 F.C.C. 2d 242, 249 (1970); Armed Forces Recruitment Messages, 24 F.C.C. 2d 156, 158 (1970); Robert Scott, 25 F.C.C. 2d 239, 240 (1970); Dorothy Healey, 24 F.C.C. 2d 487, 495 (1970). Indeed, there is not a scintilla of hope in this discouraging line of cases that the FCC majority has the slightest intention of ever opening up the public's airwaves to the public under any set of circumstances. It has denied access to United States Senators, 14 Senators, 25 F.C.C. 2d 283, 305 (1970), businessmen prepared to pay for commercial spot time that was available, BEM, supra, and citizen groups attempting to reply under the fairness doctrine to "commercials" that do argue "controversial issues of public importance" Chevron F–310, supra (which the Commission once said could raise fairness obligations, Friends of the Earth, supra). It is hard to imagine any more appealing set of cases than these.

Moreover, given the timing of this "Notice of Inquiry," one cannot help but wonder whether the majority is not trying to affect the outcome of currently pending cases. Several of the cases mentioned above are now on appeal before the U.S. Court of Appeals. E.g., Chevron F–310, supra, appeal docketed sub nom Alan F. Neckritz v. U.S.A. and F.C.C., No. 26,335, 9th Cir., May 24, 1971; Dorothy Healey, supra, appeal docketed sub nom Dorothy Healey v. F.C.C. and U.S.A., No. 24,630, D.C. Cir., September 16, 1970; Friends of the Earth, supra, appeal docketed sub nom Friends of the Earth v. F.C.C., No. 24,556, D.C. Cir., August 19, 1970; D.N.C., supra, appeal docketed sub nom Democratic National Committee v. F.C.C. and U.S.A., No. 24,537, D.C. Cir., August 13, 1970; Armed Forces Recruitment Messages, supra, appeal docketed sub nom G. I. Association et al v. F.C.C. and U.S.A., No. 24,516, D.C. Cir., August 7, 1970; BEM, supra, appeal docketed sub nom Business Executives Move for Vietnam Peace v. F.C.C. and U.S.A., No. 24,492, D.C. Cir., July 31, 1970.

One can only hope that the Commission will not represent—and that the Courts will not accept—this hollow gesture of a "Notice of Inquiry" as the basis for altering or postponing the Court's decisions in these cases. (1) There is no reason whatsoever to believe the Commission majority is likely to change a position that has been so forcefully and repeatedly stated in such extreme cases. (2) I am fearful that this "Inquiry" may well have the serious national consequences—whether intended or not—of leaving the law in its current state of uncertainty and inequity through the 1972 Presidential election. (3) Those who now have cases on appeal, or who may be coming before the Commission in the near future, are entitled to the prompt rendition of justice on their complaints.

Needless to say, the law couldn't be any worse than it now is; it is unlikely the Inquiry will do much more harm. On the assumption that it will not affect the case-by-case resolution of these conflicts by the Commission and the Courts, therefore, I concur in the issuance of this Notice of Inquiry.

CONCURRING STATEMENT OF COMMISSIONER WELLS

With some reservations I concur in today's action. While I recognize that acting on an overall legislative basis is a perfectly legitimate alternative to our past practice of evolving the fairness doctrine on a case by case basis, I believe that the latter is the best way to proceed in this sensitive area. Our practice of reviewing the licensee's judgment for reasonableness in concrete factual situations has been effective. It is difficult to try to legislate fairness for all situations, and I doubt that we can define with significantly more precision the position that has emerged from our several recent decisions. But because of the majority's desire to review the entire doctrine after this long passage of time, I concur in this inquiry.

Commissioner Johnson's concurring statement requires some comment. Unlike Commissioner Johnson, I do not disparage the recent cases which he finds so objectionable. I believe that they are correct and reflect sound policy. I am particularly concerned by the implication in his statement that today's action is not seriously undertaken, but is some kind of tactical maneuver designed to influence pending appeals of Commission decisions.

There is no mystery as to why this inquiry was undertaken. It has been under consideration for some time, and the reasons have already been given in several prior Commission actions. One reason is the Retail Store decision which necessitated Part III of the Inquiry. We also said in Neckritz that we would undertake a broad ranging inquiry. The Chairman, in an April speech to the National Association of Broadcasters, stated that it was time for another review of the fairness doctrine—that since the 1949 Report, we had been proceeding on an ad hoc basis and, after 22 years, it was time to look again at the whole subject—to let all interested persons participate in this important policy formulation, not just those involved in particular cases. To obtain such an overview is the sole purpose of today's action.

Certainly no one suggests that it will somehow obviate court review. On the contrary, the notice recognizes that pending cases will be decided, and expressly states that the decisions in these cases will be taken into account in this proceeding. Furthermore, there is not the slightest thought that other cases coming before the Commission in the near future should be denied prompt consideration. We shall certainly act on these cases in line with our established processes.

BEFORE THE

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

WASHINGTON, D.C.

Docket No. 19260, Phase Two

In the Matter of The Handling of Public Issues Under the Fairness Doctrine and the Public Interest Standards of the Communications Act.

To: The Commission.

COMMENTS OF

COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC.

ROBERT V. EVANS,
JOSEPH DEFRANCO,
RALPH E. GOLDBERG,
Its Attorneys.

Of Counsel: J. Roger Wollenberg, Joel Rosenbloom, Stephen A. Weiswasser.
DECEMBER 20, 1971.

Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. (CBS) submits herewith its comments in the second phase of the Commission's fairness doctrine inquiry—dealing with the fairness doctrine generally (including the personal attack rules) and the applicability of fairness doctrine principles to political broadcasters.

The subject to which this inquiry is addressed may well be the single most important and far-reaching matter now pending before the Commission. The oft-stated goal of the fairness doctrine is to secure "the paramount right of the public in a free society to be informed and to have presented to it for acceptance or rejection the different attitudes and viewpoints concerning . . . vital and . . . controversial issues. . . ." Report on Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 F.C.C. 1246, 1249 (1949). The question raised in this proceeding is one of the proper roles of government and the broadcast press in securing that public right. There can be no more fundamental problem for a free society which has come to rely upon broadcasting more than any other medium as a source of information on public affairs.

The outlines of the problem are set by the Supreme Court's decision in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969). That decision permits a form of government regulation which has never been thought appropriate for other press media. It does not, however, give the Commission "a free hand to vindicate its own idiosyncratic conception of the public interest or of the requirements of free speech." Id., at 395. Nor does it validate Commission action which involves government censorship or "the official government view dominating public broadcasting." Id., at 396.

The problem is thus to reconcile the kind of government regulation which the fairness doctrine in practice entails with the vigorous pursuit of its calling by a free broadcast press. In the comments which follow, we show that the Commission's course in recent years has been hostile to independent broadcast journalism—that the Commission has too often come to assume the wholly inappropriate (and we believe unwanted) role of editor-in-chief of the nation's views. We propose certain steps designed to held extricate the Commission from this role and to restore the balance between broadcaster freedom and government responsibility.[1]

I. THE OPERATION OF THE FAIRNESS DOCTRINE GENERALLY

The danger of government domination is inherent in any attempt to apply the fairness doctrine. For any enforcement of its basic restriction on broadcaster discretion necessarily involves governmental review of the very stuff of journalism—the determination of what should be covered and what coverage should be provided. "[O]fficial prescription in detail or in quantity of what the press must say can be as offensive to the principle of a free press as official prohibition." Banzhaf v. FCC, 405 F.2d 1082, 1103 (D.C. Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 842 (1969).

The Commission itself has refused to act as a "national arbiter of the truth" on the ground that government review of the editorial decisions of broadcasters for consistency with "some precise line of factual accuracy" would be "inconsistent with the First Amendment."[2] Review of those same editorial decisions for consistency with a precise rule of balance prescribed by a national arbiter of fairness can have equally destructive consequences for the journalistic enterprise. For "a policy of requiring fairness, statement by statement or inference by inference, with constant Governmental intervention to try to implement the policy, would simply be inconsistent with the profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be 'uninhibited, robust, wide-open' (New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270." National Broadcasting Co., 25 F.C.C.2d 735, 736–37 (1970).

In its traditional articulation, the fairness doctrine recognizes the need to limit Commission intervention and respect the discretion of the broadcast journalist. Thus, when the Commission reviews a station's performance under the doctrine, "the action of the station in carrying or refusing to carry any particular program is of relevance only as the station's actions with respect to such program fits into its overall pattern of broadcast service." Report on Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, supra, 13 F.C.C. at 1255 (emphasis supplied). Moreover, "the question is necessarily one of the reasonableness of the station's actions, not whether any absolute standard of fairness has been achieved." Ibid. In passing upon complaints, "the Commission's role is not to substitute its judgment for that of the licensee . . ., but rather to determine whether the licensee can be said to have acted reasonably and in good faith." Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine in the Handling of Controversial Issues of Public Importance, 40 F.C.C. 598, 599 (1964). Thus, in principle, the doctrine eschews any effort by the Commission to dictate the definition or treatment of controversial issues or, more generally, the manner in which the fundamental goal of public information is to be achieved.

---

[1] As indicated, these comments do not attempt to deal with every problem that might be thought to be related to the fairness field. Thus, we do not repeat here our comments and reply comments in Docket No. 18859 on the Commission's proposals to implement certain particularized aspects of the fairness doctrine, but merely ask that the Commission consider those comments as part of this more general inquiry.

As to those applicability of the fairness doctrine to political broadcasting, we have heeded the Commission's statement that it is not interested "in recommendations of statutory revision." For example, we do not argue here in support of CBS' long-standing and wellknown view that the equal opportunities requirements of Section 315 of the Communications Act should be repealed.

Similarly, we note here our disagreement with the recent ruling by the Commission's staff that the Cullman doctrine—requiring presentation of views on public issues contrasting with those in paid broadcasts even if spokesman willing to purchase time for that purpose are unavailable—applies to the sale of time for the expression of positions on ballot issues. Letter to Mrs. W.T. Emmet, October 26, 1971 (Ref. No. 8330; C10–1108). However, full development of our view that this ruling creates an unwarrented intrusion of the fairness doctrine into the financing of ballot issue campaigns would trench on questions presented in Business Executives Move for Peace v. FCC, D.C. Cir., Nos. 24,492 and 24,537, decided August 3, 1971, which have not finally been resolved in light of the possibility of review by the Supreme Court. The same questions are involved in the third phase of this inquiry—Access Generally to the Broadcast Media for the Dicussion of Public Issues. We think it appropriate to reserve further comment for that phase of the proceeding.

[2] Complaint Concerning the CBS Program, "The Selling of the Pentagon," 30 F.C.C.2d 150, 152 (1971), citing Complaints Concerning the CBS Program, "Hunger in America," 20 F.C.C.2d 143 (1969); Network Coverage of the Democratic National Convention, 16 F.C.C.2d 650 (1969).

In practice, however, there has been an erosion of these principles, an increase in the Commission's willingness to second-guess broadcaster judgments and an ever-expanding demand that those judgments be justified and explained. In recent years, the Commission has increasingly sought to apply the doctrine by ruling on individual complaints, rather than weighing the licensee's "overall pattern of broadcast service" at the time an application for renewal of license is considered. See Letter to Hon. Oren Harris, 40 F.C.C. 582 (1963).

Having separated consideration of particular complaints from the renewal process and undertaken to direct specific relief in individual controversies, the Commission gradually has come to focus less upon the overall reasonableness of licensee performance and more upon the achievement of what it (and a reviewing court) will regard as fair in some absolute sense. In consequence, the Commission has taught individuals and groups discontented with the treatment afforded by broadcasters to resort immediately to Commission processes, not only as a means of testing broadcaster judgments, but also as a means of obtaining access for themselves. And the result has been a multiplicity of inquiries and rulings addressed to licensees during the course of each license term.[3]

As Chairman Burch recently observed, "in the fairness area, the bond of theory and implementation has come unstuck. . . ." Complaint of Wilderness Society (Esso), 31 F.C.C.2d 729, 734 (1971) (concurring opinion). This result is apparent in both the substantive standards applied and the procedures utilized. Although the two are inter-related, we discuss them separately as a matter of convenience in exposition. Thereafter, we set forth our views on the minimum steps needed to reverse the process.

A. The Substantive Standards Applied

Determination by the Commission of whether a broadcaster has made reasonable efforts to achieve fairness has not traditionally depended upon a weighing of minutes and seconds or lines of copy devoted to different sides of an isue. Increasingly, however, more recent fairness rulings by the Commission or its staff have come to turn upon just such a process. For example, in Complaint of Wilderness Society (Esso), supra, the Commission confronted the question of whether NBC had afforded reasonable opportunities for the discussion of issues relating to the projected Alaska oil pipeline. Its decision apparently relied upon a minute-by-minute analysis of NBC coverage for a substantial period, classifying presentations as "pro" or "anti."[4]

Again, in a letter of January 28, 1971 to Sunbeam TV Corporation, licensee of Station WCKT(TV), Miami, Florida (Ref. No. 8330–K; C6–1075), the Commission's staff found a fairness doctrine violation, relying upon a similar mode of analysis. Thus, the staff weighed a one-hour documentary on legalized gambling (shown the night before a local referendum) which it analyzed as 47 minutes "anti" and 6 or 7 minutes "pro," a thirty-minute program on the same subject (broadcast four days before the referendum) which was "evenly divided between proponents and opponents" and news reports of which "approximately 425 typed lines were devoted to expression of views opposing the legalization of casino gambling whereas approximately 115 lines were devoted to the proponent's views." The staff concluded that "one viewpoint was given heavily predominant exposure in your overall broadcasts" and stressed also the presentation of the allegedly one-sided documentary "on election eve."

---

[3] The Commission has also displayed an increased willingness to define issues as being controversial or having public importance and to judge whether broadcast matter not directly addressed to such must be viewed as inferentially commenting upon them, without regard to the judgments of broadcasters on these subjects. Thus, the Commission was previously unwilling to regard broadcast church services as an implicit comment on disputes between theists and atheists. See, e.g., Mrs. Madalyn Murray, 5 Pike & Fischer, R.R.2d 263 (1965). More recently, it has held that cigarette commercials not addressed to any question of smoking and health were inferential comments on that public issue. Television Station WCBS–TV, 8 F.C.C.2d 381 (1967), reconsideration denied sub nom., Cigarette Advertising, 9 F.C.C.2d 921 (1967), aff'd sub nom. Banzhaf v. FCC, 405 F.2d 1082 (1968), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 842 (1969). (See our comments in the first phase of this proceeding.) Most recently of all, the Commission has held that public service announcements for the United Appeal of Dayton, Ohio, not directed to a local dispute concerning the operation of that charitable fund, were nonetheless to be treated as comments on the dispute which invoked fairness doctrine obligations. Avco Broadcasting Corp., 23 Pike & Fischer, R.R.2d 111 (1971). The Commission has thus expanded greatly the scope of broadcaster activities which it reviews under the fairness doctrine.

[4] Id., at 735, 738–39 (concurring opinion). According to Chairman Burch, in concluding that the fairness doctrine had been satisfied, the Commission found that, excluding the gasoline company announcements thought explicitly to raise this controversial issue, NBC had devoted twice as much time to the anti-pipeline views as to pro-pipeline views, and that, taking account of the commercials in question, the pro-pipeline views received a two-to-one advantage in exposure. Ibid.

These are not isolated or aberrant cases.[5] They exemplify, rather, a tendency inherent in any effort by the Commission to go beyond a determination of whether the public has been informed and decide whether there has been an appropriate "balance" in the access afforded to contending forces. And the Commission has more and more undertaken to make just such an effort. For example, in Committee for Fair Broadcasting, 25 F.C.C.2d 283 (1970), dealing with Presidential addresses on the Indo-China war, the Commission announced that, where "there has been an extensive but roughly balanced presentation on each side [of an issue] and five opportunities in prime time for the leading spokesman of one side to address the nation on this issue," there must be at least "one more uninterrupted opportunity by an appropriate spokesman [for the opposing view] to discuss this issue. . . ." Id., at 297, 298 (emphasis in original).

The Commission could not and did not hold in Committee for Fair Broadcasting, supra, that, absent such an opportunity, the American people would have been left uninformed on the views of the President's opponents or on the issue of the war. The Commission had indeed found that, apart from the Presidential speeches, the coverage provided was not only balanced but "extensive." In dealing with a similar question, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit later took what amounted to judicial notice that no "live American has been left uninformed about the desirability or undesirability of military service, the draft, or the Vietnam War," and that "these issues have been ventilated in extenso for years on (probably) every television and radio station in the land." Green v. FCC, 447 F.2d 323, 329, 330 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

Clearly, the Commission's attention was not focused on whether the public was informed on the war issue. Indeed, it conceded that there was "some support" in "the 'theory' of the fairness doctrine" for the position that the goals of the doctrine had already been met. 25 F.C.C.2d at 298. It thought, however, that " 'practicalities'—or, stated differently, what is 'reasonable' in the circumstances of five prime time addresses by one side—clearly call for the greater effort by the networks which we have noted above." Ibid. Plainly, in Committee for Fair Broadcasting, the Commission was motivated not by fairness doctrine considerations but by the notion that it had a duty—as a sort of chancellor of instant fairness equity—to redress what appeared to it as an imbalance in the access afforded contending spokesmen. And the Commission took this action without regard to whether the goal of an informed public had been adequately served without Commission intervention.

If "balance" is to be the goal—and access is to be supplied to redress imbalance—it is all but inevitable that the Commission will analyze fairness doctrine issues in terms of hours and minutes, lines of copy, "uninterrupted opportunity" or some other quantitative or qualitative measure of "opportunities" afforded each side. As the Chairman noted in the Wilderness Society matter, a weighing of sheer quantity is only the beginning of the process. 31 F.C.C.2d at 736. The end to which this approach must lead is represented by full-blown "content analysis," conducted in accordance with statistical and scientific procedures purportedly designed to quantify and objectify every conceivable factor that may bear upon the treatment of opposing sides.

---

[5] Nor is it material that the WCKT(TV) case involved a ballot issue. Such issues are in many respects like political campaigns, and the Commission has applied a "quasi-equal opportunities" rule to the sale or gift of time to supporters of candidates in such campaigns, as well as to station editorials endorsing or opposing candidates. The Commission has not previously applied such a rule, however, to the journalistic efforts of broadcasters in political campaigns. The WCKT(TV) ruling goes very far in this direction, applying a standard of mathmatical balance to a station documentary, a discussion program and to news reports. Compare Complaint by Citizens for Responsible Government, Tulsa, Oklahoma, 25 F.C.C.2d 73 (1970), cited in the WCKT(TV) ruling, where the Commission's staff apparently applied the standards of the political editorializing rule to find a fairness doctrine violation in a ballot issue case where a radio station had provided thirty minute programs expressing the views of proponents and opponents of a proposed city charter, had editorialized 52 times (at 2-½ minutes per editorial) in favor of the charter and broadcast 5 responses of similar length.

Any such effort must involve the Commission in certain minimum steps. First, in every dispute, the Commission must define what the relative positions on a particular controversial issue are and identify the person to be viewed as a spokesman for each position. Second, the Commission must classify each program or program segment carried by a station or network relating to the issue, in terms of whether it constitutes an expression of "opinion" or "position" or conversely, is "neutral" or "factual." Third, the Commission must assign "opinions" or "positions" expressed to the sides determined to exist. Fourth, the Commission must decide how each program unit (minute, second or line) devoted to particular positions is to be weighed on a comparative scale—that is, it must take account of such matters as the frequency with which certain views are expressed, the size of the likely audience reached, the prominence of spokesmen on each side and the intensity with which they appear to hold their views, and the degree of editorial control exercised by the licensee. Fifth, the Commission must decide how to treat time devoted to programming that is relevant but "neutral."[6]

The Chairman's concurring statement in Wilderness Society raises the question "whether a process of categorizing and quantifying presentations, times, and formats, in order to rule on the reasonableness of a licensee's judgment, does not involve the Commission too deeply in day-to-day journalistic practices." 31 F.C.C.2d at 737. We think it plainly must. A licensee faced with the potential of such agency overview must ultimately be forced to devise programming designed to satisfy, not the public, but the standards laid down by the Commission. If the Commission measures fairness by the stopwatch and counts lines, licensees will do so also. If the Commission views "uninterrupted preentations" as critical, so will licensees. And if the Commission forces the expression of particular ideas into categories, licensees will be forced to do the same.

Such a process is utterly inconsistent with anything approximating vigorous journalism. The effort to achieve balanced access inherently tends to ignore material that is not easily identifiable as the expression of a particular side. But it is precisely this kind of material, independent of partisan expressions, that may most illuminate the issues facing the public. Similarly, the replacement of journalistic judgment by mechanical rules of balance necessarily frustrates efforts to inform the public effectively, for it destroys the process of selection and emphasis that is the very heart of any journalistic enterprise. In focusing only on the opportunities of partisans to speak, it ignores the concerns of those who must listen.

In the final analysis, the process we have described all but forces broadcasters to abandon any independent function and to limit themselves to the role of the gate-keeper who provides access to opposing speakers. Such a role may perhaps be adequate to maintain a public park as an arena of free speech in a democratic society. It is wholly insufficient to maintain the vitality of the medium upon which our society uniquely depends for the dissemination of information and the effective communication of diverse views.

B. The Procedures Employed

Over the past eight years, there has been a dramatic 400% increase in the number of fairness complaints received by the Commission.[7] This increase has occurred despite the Commission's efforts to stem the tide by issuing a "fairness primer." Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine in the Handling of Controversial Issues of Public Importance. 40 F.C.C. 598 (1964). And the corresponding increase in inquiries and rulings addressed to licensees has occurred despite the Commission's requirement that complainants make a prima facie case of unreasonable licensee conduct. Id., at 600; Allen C. Phelps, 21 F.C.C.2d 12, 13 (1969).

---

[6] The cases we have discussed above are illustrative. In Wilderness Society, the Commission found a two-to-one ratio to be reasonable. The staff found a four-to-one ratio unreasonable in Citizens for Responsible Government (160 minutes for the charter, 42 minutes against), and a three or four-to-one ratio unreasonable in Letter to Sunbeam TV Corp. (62 minutes and 425 lines against legalization, 20 minutes and 115 lines for). The differences in result did not stem solely from the differences in the ratios, but were based on a subjective weighing of factors—such as the frequency and scheduling of appearances—leading to the conclusion that one side did not obtain fair exposure, without regard to whether the public understood the conflicting positions.

[7] See the Commission's Brief in the pending case of Democratic National Committee v. FCC, Nos. 71-1637, 71-1723 (D.C. Cir.), p. 36n. 20: "Complaints alleging fairness doctrine violations numbered 1,736 in 1970 and 409 in 1962."

This process has been due, we suggest, partly to the Commission's offer to provide case-by-case relief to individual complainants, but even more to the Commission's movement toward a standard of "absolute fairness" and "balanced access."[8] The chances that a complainant will prevail on the merits become measurably greater if the Commission is prepared to overturn reasonable license judgments about the need to inform the public whenever there is a showing that, regardless of the need, particular views have not been given relatively comparable treatment. The Commission has thus invited a process in which it has become the constant focal point for attempts by organized groups of all kinds and political parties in particular to obtain the kind of access to broadcast facilities which those groups or parties regard as fair. See, e.g., Committee for Fair Broadcasting, supra; Democratic National Committee, 31 F.C.C.2d 708 (1971).

Increased numbers of letters of inquiry to licensees create a serious possibility of inhibition. As the Department of Justice has stated:

> "[A] continual process of demanding explanations as to why particular news items or programs were or were not shown would come dangerously close to the kind of program censorship which is barred by the First Amendment and Section 326 of the Communications Act.
>
> The Commission has not been given 'supervisory control of programs, business or policy' (FCC v. Sanders Bros., 309 U.S. at 475)." Brief for Appellant United States of America in No. 21147, D.C. Cir., United States v. FCC, p. 108. (ABC–ITT merger case).[9]

Licensees must divert staff, devise procedures and devote substantial time to handling inquiries. Such procedures—if present trends continue—will involve substantial recordkeeping and program timing not necessary to the journalistic process. Indeed, because such procedures will require news personnel to devote time that could be allocated to the preparation for and broadcast of news and public affairs programs, the procedures are hostile to the journalistic process. And these procedures can form particularly serious impediments to the presentation of high quality news programming, where there is usually a need for quick judgment and on-the-spot editing.

For the most significant and controversial issues—the ones covered on a continuing basis—the burden of demonstrating compliance with the fairness doctrine is exceedingly large. For example, in connection with its response to the Committee for Fair Broadcasting complaint, CBS prepared an exhibit documenting the coverage of the Indo-China War on the network and WCBS–TV for a six-month period. The exhibit exceeded 100 pages in length and required 240 manhours of work by CBS News Research Department personnel, including three weeks of work by researchers and two weeks of work by the Department's Director. Additional substantial manhours in the preparation of that exhibit were spent by WCBS–TV personnel. And substantial time in evaluating the complaint and preparing the response was spent by CBS lawyers, CBS News executives and other personnel.

Even issues involving lesser coverage can require substantially comparable time for the preparation of responses to Commission inquiries. Staff must still scan the range of news and public affairs programs carried during the relevant period to cull out the material related to the issue being considered. In 1970, for example, the CBS News Research Department devoted well over 1,400 hours to finding the factual material needed to answer fairness doctrine inquiries from the Commission and members of the public. That figure does not include the time devoted to handling informal requests for information. Nor does it include the countless hours spent by News Department personnel (including journalists), lawyers and company executives in evaluating Commission inquiries and preparing responses to them.

---

[8] There is no ground for belief that the increase is due to any substantial propensity of broadcasters to behave unfairly. Precise data are difficult to obtain, but we believe that the information submitted by the Commission in 1968 to the Special Subcommittee on Investigations of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is reasonably indicative. Between March 1, 1967 and February 29, 1968, the Commission received approximately 1,700 complaints alleging violations of the fairness doctrine or the equal opportunities requirements of Section 315. The Commission found a failure to comply with the fairness doctrine in only sixteen instances. See Panel Discussion on the Fairness Doctrine and Related Subjects, Hearings before the Special Subcommittee on Investigations of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 90th Cong., 2d Sess., Serial No. 90–33, p. 121 (1968).

[9] The Commission has also "recognized that vague complaints about unfairness without substantiation may stifle controversial programming." Brief, Democratic National Committee v. FCC, supra, note 7, at 35.

These procedural burdens may be less inhibitory for those with a burning commitment to broadcast journalism and the resources to defend their judgments. The resources available, however, are never unlimited or free from competing demands. And there is danger in any process that repeatedly tests a broadcaster's commitment to journalism by forcing an ever-increasing devotion of those resources to defending yesterday's news judgments. Where the broadcaster invokes the burden himself by robust programming, the temptation not to repeat the process often is a strong one.

For the burden is indeed avoidable. It is a burden that falls most heavily upon those broadcasters who seek to treat the controversial issues of the day in depth and who do not shrink from controversy. Devotion of less time to news and public affairs, or constriction of controversial issue programming, provides an escape from FCC scrutiny. Therefore, as the pressure of inquiries increases, and their scope broadens, the likely result will be an increased number of licensees seeking to avoid confrontation with the government by moving toward the bland and non-controversial or reducing the scope of their news and public affairs efforts.

It is no answer, in this context, to argue that the Commission has the power to compel licensees to give adequate attention to public issues. Even if government can command that a role be played, it cannot command that role's enthusiastic and aggressive performance. Even if it can require broadcasters to devote time to tne discussion of public issues, it cannot by fiat create a willingness to invest in effective and imaginative presentations that will seriously and effectively engage poblic attention, will explore the hard questions partisans often prefer to ignore or will attempt to set partisan views in a perspective that is not itself a product of partisan ideology.

We repeat, moreover, that Commission inquiries take their toll not only of ordinary licensee resources but of the time, the energy and the morale of the journalists responsible for news and public affairs programming. A licensee cannot protect its personnel against a process that effectively requires newsmen to justify and explain their news judgments to a government agency.

We have no ready way to demonstrate the extent to which these procedural burdens on licensees and their personnel have in fact impaired the service which the public might otherwise have received. The effects which concern us most are subtle and slow-maturing. They result from the pervasive attitudes created by an on-going process, and they can easily be masked by the many other factors that bear upon the performance of broadcasting as a journalistic medium.

The danger is nontheless real. As the Commission seeks more and more to dispense instant "fairness" justice in individual situations, that danger grows. The process cannot bode well for the growth of broadcasting as a medium for the effective presentation of robust debate.

II. RESTORING THE BOND OF THEORY AND PRACTICE

There is no obvious, all encompassing solution for the problems we have described. There are, however, a number of steps which can help to establish a more coherent relationship between the Commission's practice and its theory. If implemented, these steps would at least mitigate the evils that have grown from the case-by-case adjudication process.

First, and foremost, the Commission must abjure any effort to weigh or balance the coverage provided contending sides and focus instead upon whether there has been reasonable opportunity for the public to be informed of substantial viewpoints, without regard to any comparative judgments of the treatment appropriate for each viewpoint.

It may be argued that such an approach would leave open the possibility of coverage in ratios of as much as 50 or 100-to-1 and that any such ratio must necessarily reflect a deliberate effort by a licensee to "stack the cards." See. e.g., Complaint of Wilderness Society, supra, 31 F.C.C.2d at 737 (concurring opinion). Any policy that places real responsibility on the licensee to make news judgments free of inhibitory governmental surveillance and control is subject to the possibility of such theoretical abuses, but the risk is worth taking.

Even the rare, badly motivated broadcaster is sufficiently aware of the risks of challenge at renewal time and adverse public reaction to tread warily. And in the case of irresponsible and reckless broadcaster conduct, it will be obvious that the coverage provided the disfavored side is unreasonably inadequate on its own terms. No quantitative or qualitative coverage and content analysis will be needed.[10]

We suggest that, if the Commission is to take seriously the duty to refrain from substituting its judgment for that of the licensee, it must recognize that there will be cases that may offend its own notions of what is fair but fail to provide grounds for government interference. The effort to go beyond an inquiry into whether particular points of view have been wholly excluded or given wholly unreasonable treatment (in a non-comparative sense) necessarily involves the Commission in an analytical process that is deadly to a free press.

Second, we urge the Commission to go further than it has in the past to limit the occasions on which it makes inquiry of a licensee. The 1964 airness Primer encourages complaintants to communicate first with the licensee involved. Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine in the Handling of Controversial Issues of Public Importance, 40 F.C.C. 598, 600 and note 4 (1964). We suggest that such prior communication with the licensee be required, absent a showing that the matter is urgent and that the dictates of time imperatively and unavoidably demand immediate recourse to the Commission. We suggest also that the complaintant be required to submit the licensee's response (or a showing that the licensee has unreasonably failed to respond) together with a statement of why the licensee's response is thought unsatisfactory.

Many complaints can be and have been resolved without any need for Commission intervention.[11] If a legitimate complaint has been brought to the licensee's attention before the Commission has been called in, the licensee has the opportunity to engage in self-correction more rapidly (and with less concern for the regulatory consequences) than if the inquiry is initiated by the Commission. Ultimately, the public will benefit by a swifter resolution of complaints dealing with continuing issues of public importance.

Third, we urge the Commission to adhere rigorously to the requirement of the Fairness Primer that complainants make a prima facie showing of licensee failure to comply with the fairness doctrine*before* any Commission inquiry is made of the licensee. As stated in Allen C. Phelps, 21 F.C.C. 2d 12, 13 (1969), this requires the complainant to "(a) specify the particular broadcasts in which the controversial issue was presented, (b) state the position advocated in such broadcasts, and (c) set forth reasonable grounds for concluding that the licensee in his overall programming has not attempted to present opposing views on the issue."

---

[10] We note additionally that some of the cases in which the Commission has been moved to engage in the comparative weighing process fall in sui generis categories beyond the scope of normal fairness doctrine adjudication. Thus, Times-Mirror Broadcasting Company, 40 F.C.C.2d 531 (1962), where the Commission first weighed the "continuous, repetitive opportunity" available to one side against the "minimal opportunity" available to the other, involved effective endorsements of a political candidate and was (in its alternative holding) the source of what is now the Commission's political editorial rule. Id., at 532–33. That rule, as the Chairman has noted, follows something very close to a "quasi-equal opportunities" principle, rather than the policy of the fairness doctrine. Complaint of Wilderness Society, supra, 31 F.C.C.2d at 735.

Compare also the "quasi-equal opportunities" rule of Letter to Mr. Nicholas Zapple, 23 F.C.C.2d 707 (1970) and its "political party" corollary, created in Committee for Fair Broadcasting, supra, 25 F.C.C.2d at 299–301, reconsideration denied sub nom. Republican National Committee, 25 F.C.C.2d 739 (1970), reversed on other grounds sub nom. Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. v. FCC, D.C. Cir., Nos. 24,655 and 24,659, decided November 15, 1971.

[11] Similarly, we believe that the goals of the personal attack rules can be attained under a procedure which grants licensees substantially greater flexibility and discretion in interpreting and implementing them than is presently permitted. The present rules threaten penalty for licensee failure to identify a personal attack and comply with the seven-day notification and transcript requirment, despite the fact that, by the very nature of the concept, it is not easy to determine whether a personal attack has occurred. See, e.g., Thomas J. Kenney, 22 Pike & Fischer, R.R.2d 505 (1971); Port of New York Authority, 25 F.C.C.2d 417 (1970); Robert G. Ryan, 25 F.C.C.2d 884 (1970). Given the difficulty in determining whether particular words constitute an attack, the Commission should eliminate the seven-day requirement, thereby affording licensees a reasonable chance to make a considered judgement as to whether particular words constitute an attack, and should assume that a licensee who has determined that a personal attack has occured will comply with the affirmative obligations of the rule within a reasonable period.

It is often argued that the complaining member of the public lacks easy access to the precise facts with respect to station or network coverage of an issue, and that it is unreasonable to impose the fact-gathering burden upon them. In large degree, the burden is as great for the broadcaster. Many do not retain verbatim tapes or transcripts of news and public affairs programs. And where such materials do exist, they are not neatly classified or catalogued so as to make it possible to say precisely what coverage an issue (as formulated by a complainant) has been given without extensive sifting aided by the memories of those most involved in particular coverage. In any event, if complainants are required to address themselves first to licensees, licensees in responding to legitimate qustions will have adequate incentives to supply such factual information concerning their planned and actual coverage as is reasonable.

We are under no illusion that adoption of these steps would eliminate the dangers which enforcement of the fairness doctrine holds for broadcast journalism. So long as the government undertakes to review the substance of news judgments, there is a risk of undue intrusion and inhibition.[12] The Commission can, however, go a long way to repair the damage which has been wrought over the past years, to establish standards and procedures that will act as a hedge against government domination and to create a relationship with its licensees that will leave the broadcast press maximum freedom to perform the high functions which the First Amendment commands.

As the Supreme Court has said, "a free press stands as one of the great interpreters between the government and the people. To allow it to be fettered is to fetter ourselves." Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 250 (1936). This insight, we submit, must be the constant concern of an agency that attempts to enforce fairness.

Respectfully submitted.

COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC.

By /s/ Robert V. Evans,
ROBERT V. EVANS

/s/ Joseph DeFranco,
JOSEPH DEFRANCO

/s/ Ralph E. Goldberg,
RALPH E. GOLDBERG
Its Attorneys.

Of Counsel: J. ROGER WOLLENBERG, JOEL ROSENBLOOM, STEPHEN A. WEISWASSER.

DECEMBER 20, 1971.

ABC NEWS,
New York, N.Y., October 26, 1971.

LAWRENCE M. BASKIR, Esq.,
Chief Counsel and Staff Director, Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BASKIR: In the course of his testimony before the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, Mr. Elmer Lower, President of ABC News, agreed to provide the Subcommittee with a list of "Fairness Doctrine" inquiries received from the Federal Communications Commission. I am therefore attaching a list of FCC inquiries relating to the "Fairness Doctrine" which were directed to the ABC networks during the past year.

I would like to point out for your information that the first five inquiries stemmed from the content of radio or television network newscasts or public affairs programming. The last four inquiries on the attached list relate to product commercials or public service announcements carried on our radio or television networks.

---

[12] For this reason, we urge the Commission to examine carefully recent proposals to modify or suspend the fairness doctrine in the field of radio. If the goal of an informed public can be achieved without involving the government at all in regulating journalistic decisions, surely the First Amendment requires that such a less inhibiting and less restrictive course be followed.

In submitting this list, I would like to reiterate Mr. Lower's observation that ABC does not consider the number of inquiries received from the FCC during the past year as onerous.

Thank you again for your consideration.

Sincerely yours,

SAM ANTAR.

Attachment.

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION FAIRNESS INQUIRY

During the past year, ABC has been a party to the following "Fairness Doctrine" Complaints:

1. Complaint of John Kleylcin:
   Re: Alleged anti-firearm commentary of Howard K. Smith.
2. Complaint of Anthony Martin-Trigona:
   Re: Radio Network newscast on natural gas shortage (alleged implied comment on need for increased gas rates).
3. Complaint of DNC:
   Re: Presidential appearances and specifically 3/22/71 interview of President Nixon.
4. Complaint of RNC:
   Re: 4/22/71 appearance of Democratic spokesmen responding to earlier Presidential appearance.
5. Complaint of F. W. Bromley:
   Re: "How to Stay Alive" documentary and alleged unfair treatment of animal fats as a cause of heart disease (10/71)
6. Complaint of Wm. Rogers:
   Re: Phosphate-based detergent commercials.
7. Complaint of John DeTar and Rep. John Schmitz:
   Re: Radio Network "Planntd Parenthood" public service announcements.
8. Complaint of Center for Auto Safety:
   Re: Ford "Air-Bag" commercial.
9. Complaint of Consumers Arise Now:
   Re: Trash Compactor Commercials.

In addition, ABC was added as a party to a suit in the Court of Appeals by the G. I. Association.

Re: Request of free time to respond to recruitment spots (6/71).

Finally, ABC received a telephone inquiry from the FCC concerning our plans to balance Cavett show on SST issue (3/71).

SECTION 399: THE CONSTITUTION GIVETH AND CONGRESS TAKETH AWAY

THE DENIAL OF FIRST AMENDMENT RIGHTS TO PUBLIC BROADCASTING STATIONS

(By Daniel W. Toohey)*

This article is an opinion: something a public broadcasting station cannot give. Its theme might be taken from the beginning of the per curiam decision of the Supreme Court in the celebrated New York Times Case,[1] upholding that newspaper's right to print "the Pentagon Papers":

> Any system of prior restraints of expression comes to this court bearing a heavy presumption against its constitutional validity.[2]

A prior restraint may be defined as any deterrent to expression that operates in advance of publication or utterance. The repugnance of such restraints to those freedoms protected by the first amendment to the United

---

* Daniel W. Toohey is a graduate of St. Louis University School of law, and partner in the law firm of Dow, Lohnes & Albertson, Washington, D.C. He is secretary of the Young Lawyers Section, D.C. Bar Association, and a member of the Board of Editors, Federal Communications Bar Journal. The author gratefully acknowledges the valuable comments of his colleague Suzanne Meyer.

[1] New York Times Company v. United States, 91 S. Ct. 2140 (1971).

[2] Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U.S. 58, 70 (1963). Also see Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931).

States Constitution predates that document. For example, it was a classic theory of English constitutional law, treated by Sir William Blackstone in his Commentaries:

> The liberty of the press is indeed essential to the nature of a free state: but this consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published.[3]

Suffice it to say that the principle that prior restraints of expression are inimical to freedom of speech and of the press is not a novel theory nor a modern radical doctrine. It is a uniquely consistent and well tried maxim of constitutional law. Therefore, when a "system of prior restraint" expressed in clear and unambiguous language turns up in a Federal statute, it may be viewed with a certain astonishment.

Section 399 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended by the Broadcasting Act of 1967,[4] provides that:

> No commercial educational broadcasting station may engage in editorializing or may support or oppose any candidate for political office.[5]

What could be clearer? Commercial broadcasting stations can and do editorialize, and endorse or oppose candidates. Noncommercial broadcasters may not—so says Congress.

When the Public Broadcasting bill was under consideration by the House of Representatives, certain Congressmen insisted on the addition of the editorializing prohibition, which did not appear in the Senate version.[6] Those who observed the course of the bill in the House say they had the prohibition not been added, the bill would not have passed. The judgment was apparently made by the proponents of the bill that the ban on editorializing was tolerable because of the importance of other measures such as those creating the Corporation for Public Broadcasting and extending the educational television facilities financing. The amendment met little or no resistance, and, when President Johnson signed the Act into law on November 7, 1967, Section 399 became part of the Communications Act. During all of this legislative activity, the financial independence the Public Broadcasting Act seemingly provided for educational broadcasting apparently obscured the offensiveness of Stction 399.

However actual funds appropriated since the original enactment have been considerably below what was expected. A precious responsibility of public broadcasting—to illuminate public issues by sharing its views with its audience—proved cheaply bought. The unhappy result is that anyone in the United States can stand up and give his opinions—except a noncommercial educational broadcasting station.

BROADCAST EDITORIALIZING

Only recently, with the arrival of some new thoughts about the First Amendment, has broadcast editorializing become a widespread licensee activity. Even today there are commercial stations that do not editorialize, probably because they are not required to and because they are uncomfortable about doing so because of license renewal every three years. As the public has generally become more sophisticated in FCC protest procedures, the risk of generating undue displeasure must inevitably be considered by the licensee in selecting editorial subjects.

Until twenty-two years ago, editorializing by broadcast stations was prohibited by the FCC's decision in Mayflower Broadcasting Corporation,[7] which held that "a truly free radio cannot be used to advocate the causes of the licensee."[8] It took nine years for the Commission to release its ban on broadcast editorials; during those nine years, curiously enough, no licensees challenged the prohibition. In 1949, however, there was released the widely read report on Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees,[9] which concluded that overt broadcast editorializing was not per se contrary to the public interest. This report was, however, a guarded and hesitant statement, carefully finding an absence of vice, rather than the presence of virtue, in the practice of broadcast editorializing. At one point in the report tht Commission seemed about to encourage the practice, but whatever endorsement it intended was defeated by its syntax:

---

[3] 4 Blackstone Commentaries 151, 152.
[4] Public Law 90–129, November 7, 1967.
[5] 47 U.S.C. Section 399.
[6] S. 1160, passed by the Senate on May 17,
[7] 8 F.C.C. 330 (1940).
[8] Id. at 340.
[9] 13 F.C.C. 1246 (1949).

> The Commission is not persuaded that a station's willingness to stand up and be counted on these particular issues upon which the licensee has a definite position may not be actually helpful.[10]

Fortified with this grudging permission, some broadcasters began editorializing; others declined the opportunity. In subsequent years, as broadcasters began to evolve their own particular journalism, editorializing increased. At the same time the FCC became more positive in its view of the broadcast editorial, particularly in recognizing the importance of the editorial as part of overall programming service. For example, in one major television renewal hearing, the quality of the incumbent licensee's past performance was found to be diminished by its failure to editorialize.[11]

Some people criticize commercial broadcasters for not choosing more important and controversial issues upon which to give management's views. Some licensees feel that it is best to maintain a low silhouette where management's views are concerned. Still other stations do not editorialize at all. But all commercial stations enjoy the right to editorialize. Why should noncommercial educational stations be treated differently?

LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

Section 399 was said by its supporters to be a "safeguard" against the Corporation for Public Broadcasting becoming a propaganda machine for political parties or presenting only a particular point of view.[12] Despite the fact that in 1954 Congress had already codified the FCC's "fairness doctrine" preventing that very thing,[13] some Congressmen wanted a specific ban. As a result, House Report No. 572, (to accompany HR 6736) declares that Section 399 was added "[o]ut of abundance of caution." [14]

Though the Senate bill imposed no ban on editorials, the bill which emerged from joint conference showed that the House view had won out.[15] The conferees carefully noted that the provision against editorializing was limited to prohibiting editorials representing the opinion of the management of such stations,[16] but a fair reading of the provision does not require such limited interpretation.

Some emphasis was also placed in the House Report on the fact that "considerable testimony" had been heard to the effect that no noncommercial educational station editorializes.[17] Presumably, Congress saw nothing wrong with codifying the status quo and making it permanent.

In any event, the most accurate insights into the legislative background of Section 399 are not found in these various reports. The real motivations behind its adoption are set forth in the pages of the Congressional Record for Thursday, September 1, 1967.[18]

Congressman Springer of Illinois was quite explicit about why he wanted Section 399: he didn't like any television stations (commercial or noncommercial) taking positions on candidates and he wanted to close any loopholes that might permit noncommercial broadcasters to immitate their colleagues. He also promised that he was going to watch the documentaries closely to ensure their impartiality.[19] Congressman Jones of Missouri wanted to see "kept out" the kind of editorializing newspapers do, he said, in their news columns—"they slip a needle in before we know what has happened."[20] Congressman Jones thought, however, that educational stations could editorialize about some things; "improvements in the community and things like that."[21]

---

[10] Id. at 1254.

[11] WHDH, Inc.. 16 F.C.C. 2d 1 (1969).

[12] 1967 C Q Almanac, p. 1042.

[13] 47 U.S.C. Section 315(a) (referred to as the "equal time provision") states: "Nothing in the foregoing sentence shall be construed as relieving broadcasters, in connection with the presentation of newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, and on-the-spot coverage of news events, from the obligation imposed upon them under this chapter to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance."

[14] 1 U.S. Code Congressional & Administrative News 1810 (1st Session, 1967).

[15] H. Rept. 794, October 18, 1967.

[16] 1967 C Q Almanac, p. 1050.

[17] Ibid, n. 9.

[18] Volume 113, No. 149.

[19] Id. at H 12277. (Presumably a reference to Section 396 which goes the fairness doctrine one better by requiring each program, unless it is part of a series, to be fair and impartial.)

Mr. Keith of Massachusetts didn't want a repeat of what happened in his district when a film was made supporting certain legislation which might have affected some candidacies:

I did not happen to vote for that program. It is conceivable that I could be tied in with the opposition to that program through this film and it could then have adversely affected my candidacy for re-election. This kind of film is the kind of program that we must guard against.[22]

By now the reader should have a notion as to whom the so-called "safeguard" was designed to protect. Mr. Keith was applauded by Congressman Joelson of New Jersey, who added that "a public official is a sitting duck" and "the right of editorializing should be very, very carefully scrutinized."[23] Mr. Watson of South Carolina urged "Let them go ahead and editorialize. Give me the right to control program content and others can editorialize all they want to . . ."[24] Congressman Brown of Ohio inserted a chapter from George Orwell's 1984 in the record, which he said described a kind of "public television."[25] Mr. McClure of Idaho declared "What Orwell had in mind may seem like something of a lark in 1984 if this bill is permitted to pass."[26]

At least for these gentlemen, the purpose of Section 399 was clear: to prevent Congress from creating a monster that might someday turn on its creator. Therefore, to achieve its own self-protective ends Congress simply legislated away a significant part of educational broadcasters' right of free speech.

The lawmaker may argue that the amount of money being dedicated by law to the support of public broadcasting would inevitably create suspicion that in editorials the stations were mouthing "governmental propaganda." Yet, in what matter of controversy or public debate does government ever take a uniform, completely concurring position? Would it be legislative, executive or judicial propaganda? One may ask: what subsidized industry has been denied its right of free speech as a condition of the subsidy? Or what Congressman refrains from speaking his opinion because his entire salary comes from the U.S. Treasury?

The reported legislative history of the editorializing prohibition is rather consistent in claiming that the provision was enacted to protect someone, presumably the public, from the sinister evils of a government-subsidized propaganda machine. However, if Section 399 is to be considered a safeguard or cautionary measure, then the beneficiary must be admitted to be the Congress, not the public whose access to a certain source of information and ideas has been interdicted by that provision. No one explains why it is written in such a way that a noncommercial educational broadcasting station could not editorialize even if it chose not to be subsidized, not to be a beneficiary of CPB. Why is the prohibition not directed against CPB, which receives the money directly from Congress? Why does the prohibition read "engage in editorializing" instead of "broadcast editorials"?

The prohibition was obviously intended to have broad applicability, certainly beyond the scope of those who receive CPB funds, and it may be intended to frustrate the expression of opinions other than those of the station's management. Whatever else it is, the concern or fear implicit in Section 399 is a salute to the spreading influence of radio and television, which has surpassed other mass media in supplying what Woodrow Wilson called the "raw material of opinion."[27]

THE UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF SECTION 399

The New York Times case mentioned earlier is the latest expression of the law's antipathy to prior restraint of speech or press. A long line of cases preceding that decision and too numerous here consistently found prior restraint to be the antithesis of first amendment freedoms. As Professor Thomas Emerson of the Yale Law School states it:

---

[20] Ibid.
[21] Ibid.
[22] Id. at H 12280.
[23] Id. at H 12281.
[24] Ibid.
[25] Id. at H 12282.
[26] Id. at H 12289.
[27] Address to the Associated Press, April 20, 1915.

> [T]he essence of a system of freedom of expression lies in the distinction between expression and action. The whole theory rests upon the general proposition that expression must be free and unrestrained, that the state may not seek to achieve other social objectives through control of expression, and that the attainment of such objectives can and must be secured through regulation or action.[28]

Thus, assuming that any legal consequences might follow the broadcast of an editorial, such as a libel or slander action, freedom of expression guarantees the right to broadcast it first, even though an action at law might lie against the broadcaster for doing so if, for example, he acted maliciously.

Even if Congress were to be able to prove that public broadcasting would become a "propaganda machine" if permitted to editorialize, the Constitution does not allow the blanket restriction on expression which Section 399 imposes, but rather requires that Congress or any offended party act with respect to the consequences of that expression.

In the fifty years or so that broadcasting has taken to become a major social force, there never has been a case which clearly decided how the first amendment applies to it. It does indeed apply; this much we have been told by the Court.[29] But exactly how it applies remains in doubt. The best insights to date are found in the decision in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C.,[30] and they provide some additional evidence that Section 399 is unconstitutional.

The most important premise of Red Lion is the recognition that a licensee is a trustee for the viewers or listeners who rely upon him for access to ideas and information.[31] Thus, the Court speaks of the Government's power to require the licensee "to conduct himself as a proxy or fiduciary with obligations to present those views and voices which are representative of his community and which would otherwise, by necessity, be barred from the airwaves." [32] It is conceivable that, in fulfilling this duty to inform his viewers and listeners concerning a major issue, a licensee might feel compelled to editorialize. However, if he were a non-commercial educational licensee, Section 399 would frustrate the fulfillment of his obligation as he saw it. Moreover, in that context, Section 399 would cause the abridgment not only of the licensee's right to speak his opinion, but of his viewers and listeners right to hear it:

> It is the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral, and other ideas and experiences which is crucial here. That right may not constitutionally be abridged either by Congress or by the FCC.[33]

Some may argue that Red Lion's teachings apply only to commercial licensees and that Red Lion spoke only to the obligations of that particular group. No foundation for such a distinction is articulated in the Red Lion decision, nor do other first amendment theories justify this approach. Educational licensees must operate in the public interest, they must renew their licenses every three years, and they occupy frequencies to the exclusion of others, which is a major premise for the obligations enunciated in Red Lion. True, their goals and their system of financing may differ, but they are no more or no less licensees by reason of those differences. And they most certainly do not, by reason of their licenses, forfeit their constitutional rights.

Perhaps the most significant statement by the Court in terms of this discussion of Section 399 occurred in this observation:

> There is no question here of the Commission's refusal to permit the broadcaster to carry a particular program or to publish his own views; of a discriminatory refusal to require the licensee to broadcast certain views which have been denied access to the airwaves; of government censorship of a particular program contrary to Section 326; or of the official government view dom-

---

[28] Emerson, Toward a General Theory of the First Amendment, 72 Yale L. J. 877, 955 (1963).

[29] U.S. v. Paramount Pictures. Inc., 334 U.S. 131 (1948).

[30] Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C., 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

[31] While this opinion is the antithesis of the F.C.C.'s Mayflower decision mentioned above, the decisions in each case are summed up in almost the identical phrase: "the public interest—not the private—is paramount."

[32] Red Lion, supra n. 30 at 389.

[33] Id. at 390.

inating public broadcasting. Such questions would raise more serious First Amendment issues. (Emphasis supplied).[34]

There is some comfort to be taken from the Court's observation, for it indicates that if the Supreme Court were to face the issue of Section 399's constitutionality, it would undoubtedly find that it abridges freedom of speech and of the press. But if that opinion were handed down today, no amends could be made for the many editorials that never were broadcast in obedience to the statute. The effect of Section 399 has been to delay the complete fulfillment of the mandatory fiduciary relationship between educational broadcasters and their public, as well as to abrogate in part the basic assumption of the first amendment: "that the widest possible dissemination of views and information from diverse and antagonistic sources is essential to the welfare of the public."[35] Unfortunately, the Court has not yet found Section 399 to be constitutionally invalid, and noncommercial educational broadcasters remain disabled.

CONCLUSION

Section 399 prevents noncommercial educational broadcasting licensees from exercising the same right of free expression that they must safeguard in behalf of those who come to use their facilities. It creates a class of persons who have lost, by reason of the kind of broadcasting service they provide, a portion of their constitutional rights.

Congress may assert that in imposing restraints upon public broadcasting, it left open an abundance of other channels of ideas and expression. But, if Congress is free to determine that because one or two or several channels of opinion are open, others may be limited or prevented, then the First Amendment means nothing and its freedoms exist at the pleasure of Congress. The House acted in disregard of these freedoms in forcing the addition of Section 399, and it is unfortunate that public broadcasting did not withstand it on principle, whatever the need for financing.

That Section 399 may never be enforced is true enough. It is equally true that it stands as a dangerous precedent for those who would encroach further upon freedom of expression for self-serving reasons. Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr., of North Carolina, a noted Constitutional lawyer, is greatly concerned about the increasing insensitivity to these freedoms by those who are sworn to protect them and warns:

> We can never rest upon the laurels won by our ancestors, nor can we delude ourselves into thinking that our liberties, once having been obtained, are forever secure.[36]

The lesson is that no matter how rich are its immediate rewards, any statute which infringes upon Constitutional guarantees costs too much.

Too often, educational licensees are thought of as instructional licensees, whose duties extend only to the classroom and to whom the problems and issues of community and nation are foreign considerations. Obviously, in recent years this view has changed, but in 1967 it may have been partly responsible for the lack of resistance to Section 399. Now, with noncommercial educational broadcasting's general purposes in better perspective, it could be effectively argued that the public broadcaster who holds himself out as a reliable source of ideas and information on any worthy subject has a greater obligation to inform the public, by the expression of his own views when necessary, than do his commercial colleagues.

We read that the Public Broadcasting Service plans to become a major news source and has made a considerable commitment to that end. The National Public Affairs Center for Television has been created, NET News established, and National Public Radio developed. All of the agencies will someday be a significant source if the ideas and information to which access is guaranteed by the Constitution. It may be assumed that their activities will involve more than the mere reporting of news; if not, these agencies will never become major contributors to public opinion, since commercial broadcasting has already evolved a new journalism, transcending the reportorial function. The editorial is the most mature form of journalism. Without the right to editorialize, public broadcasting will be relegated to permanent adolescence.

---

[34] Id. at 396.

[35] Associated Press v. U.S., 326 U.S. 1, 20 (1945).

[36] Ervin, The Freedom to Speak, N. Y. Times, October 3, 1971, at E 13.

AN EMERGING FIRST AMENDMENT RIGHT OF ACCESS TO THE MEDIA? *

(By Jerome A. Barron **)

[The pervasive social and political changes which have characterized this decade have resulted more than anything else from the newly articulated, although long justified, demands of minority groups for social and legal justice. The dissenters, however, often have turned to unorthodox means to voice their protest—often utilizing passive civil disobedience and even violence. Indeed, the tendency no doubt has been stimulated, at least in part, by the failure of traditional notions of first amendment guarantees to provide viable avenues for expression of social protest. The concentration of ownership of the mass media in a relatively few hands, resulting in a form of private censorship, and the changed physical characteristics of our population—changed in its composition, location and habits—have frustrated adequate presentation of the voices of dissent. Modern realities have demonstrated that the goals of the first amendment can be fully achieved only by imposing an affirmative duty on the owners of the media and government to provide access for protest. This article will examine the propriety of such an affirmative duty in the various media, with particular attention to the role which government should assume in promoting access in each area.—Ed.]

THE RIGHT OF ACCESS TO PUBLIC FACILITIES AND THE PRESS

Government and the Right of Access

Since Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right[1] was published, there have been some encouraging signs that a new approach to the first amendment indeed is emerging. Something of the relationship between a stable and vital political order and adequate access for protest to the significant means of communication is at last being understood. In Adderley v. Florida[2] Mr. Justice Douglas gave some expression to this idea when, joined by three other Justices, he dissented from Mr. Justice Black's opinion for the Court that using the jailhouse as a forum for protest was not a constitutionally protected practice. Mr. Justice Douglas viewed the issue as essentially a problem in the search for access for protest:

> Conventional methods of petitioning may be, and often have been, shut off to large groups of our citizens. Legislators may turn deaf ears; formal complaints may be routed endlessly through a bureaucratic maze; courts may let the wheels of justice grind very slowly. Those who do not control television and radio, those who cannot afford to advertise in newspapers or circulate elaborate pamphlets may have only a more limited type of access to public officials. Their methods should not be condemned as tactics of obstruction and harassment as long as the assembly and petition are peaceable. . . .[3]

Particularly in the lower federal courts, the importance of access to a forum increasingly is being emphasized. An illustrative recent case is Kissinger v. New York City Transit Authority.[4] The Students for a Democratic Society sought to advertise in New York City subway stations through posters opposing United States participation in the Vietnam War. The New York City Transit Authority and the New York Subways Advertising Co., Inc., which had contractual responsibility for advertisements in the subways, refused to accept the advertisement although the students were willing to pay the regular advertising rate. The advertising company gave two reasons for declining the advertisement: space limitations, and the constitutionally significant reason that the posters were too controversial.[5] The Transit Authority claimed that the advertisements did not come within established categories for advertising and also that the posters were provocative and would cause distrubances and vandalism.

---

* This article is based on a paper prepared for and discussed at the 1968 (June 20–25) American Civil Liberties Union Biennial Conference at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Michigan on "The Affirmative Obligations of Government in the First Amendment Area."

 Professor of Law, The George Washington University. A.B., Tufts College; LL.B., Yale University; LL.M., The George Washington University.

[1] Barron, Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right, 80 HARV. L. REV. 1641 (1967). The article examined whether governmental means are constitutionally available to restrict the opportunities which the privately owned mass media presently have for private, and presumably constitutional, censorship. The importance of re-thinking the constitutional status of the privately-owned opinion-making machinery, closely concentrated in relatively few hands, should not, however, divert attention from the new era of access which appears to a rising with regard to public facilities as a medium for civil rights protest. It is in this area that the affimative role of government in the first amendment area is coming to be most visibly evident.

[2] Id. at 50–51.

[3] 385 U.S. 39 (1966).

[4] 274 F. Supp. 438 (S.D.N.Y. 1967).

The court denied the Authority's motion for summary judgment, holding that the Authority and the advertising company could not accept some posters and refuse others. Judge Bonsal pointed out that posters involving ideological matters had previously been accepted, for example "Radio Free Europe—She can't come to you for the truth" and "Read Muhammed Speaks newspaper."[6] Judge Bonsal quoted statements of the Supreme Court that the guise of "conserving desirable conditions" could not be used to "unduly suppress free communication of views."[7] Quoting from Terminiello v. Chicago,[8] he emphasized the Supreme Court's insistence there that "a function of free speech * * * is to invite dispute."[9]

There are some significant aspects to Kissinger. For one thing, if the New York Advertising Company is a private company, then it is the first time in American law where a court has suggested that a private organization has a constitutional duty to deny freedom of expression to those with whom it deals. To be sure, the advertising company is viewed in the decision as a delegate or agent for the Transit Authority, providing the requisite "state action" under the fourteenth amendment; nevertheless, it is significant that the private advertising company as well as the public Transit Authority was a party defendant.

Another aspect of Kissinger has significance for the emergent right of access: In these situations is it not really very easy for the controller of the medium in question to free himself from any obligation to satisfy an affirmative conception of the first amendment? Isn't the solution, practically speaking, for the advertising company never to reject advertising as "too controversial" but rather on the more innocent ground that "space will not permit?" Similarly, aren't the first amendment considerations in these cases really equal protection arguments? For example, in Kissinger the Black Muslims were allowed to advertise, so why not the Students for a Democratic Society? But suppose the subway were to ban all political advertisements? Presumably in such a case there would be neither a first amendment nor an equal protection argument.

A similar problem arises in the context of broadcasting's "fairness" doctrine. The extent of the licensee's affirmative obligations actually is dictated by the licensee's own past performance. If he indulges in personal attack or in one-sided presentations of controversial issues, then he has created the measure of his own obligation. The argument often has been made that this approach leads to less rather than more discussion, for if the price of airing controversy is that one must provide still more time for controversy, the common-sense solution is to present as little controversy as possible. Particularly is this the case when the station may have broadcast the reply without payment for the time. In broadcasting this problem theoretically is relieved, however, because broadcast licenses must be renewed every three years. Since the test of renewal is performance in the "public interest," and since even-handed presentation of controversial public issues can be a criterion of operation in the public interest, extended evasion of public issue programming is within the reach of sanctions. Similarly, the significance of Kissinger is the court's indication that merely abandoning controversy might not satisfy the subway's constitutional obligation; the court raised without deciding the question of whether public entities such as the Transit Authority have an affirmative obligation to facilitate presentation of controversial public issues.[10]

In another federal case in New York, Wolin v. Port of New York Authority,[11] two anti-Vietnam War organizations were denied permission to distribute leaflets in the main concourse and passageways of the Port of New York Authority Terminal Building. The district court held that the organizations were entitled to distribute anti-war leaflets in the terminal so long as they did not substantially or unduly impede traffic.[12] Without speaking of the positive role of government in securing the first amendment goals, the court held that if property is dedicated to public use, it is also dedicated to the exercise by the public of constitutional rights such as freedom of expression. This awareness that public facilities have a role to play in stimulating the communication of ideas in addition to the activity to which the facilities are presumably directed is a most creative one. The court also noted that historically the streets have always played a part in the freedom of expression, with the implication that perhaps quasi-public facilities such as the New York City bus terminal, through which hundreds of thousands of people pass every day, occupy the place the streets may once have enjoyed. This approach recognizes that the scope of permissible uses of governmentally controlled facilities for the expression of opinions must be broadened if the first amendment is to be relevant to the mass transportation realities of urban life. The emergence of a first amendment right of access to public facilities is also encouraging because it rejects the alternative means approach in the context of access to the public forum. In this regard, Judge Mansfield in Wolin said quite simply: "Nor does the fact a person might impart his ideas effectively in another place provide any reason for denying a person's right to manifest his views in a spot of his own choosing." [13]

---

[5] In addition the copy submitted is entirely too controversial to be posted on the stations publicly owned by the New York City Transit System. Our policy has always been to refrain from accepting business, the display of which would be objectionable to large segments of our population. Id. at 441.

[6] Id. at 442 & n.2.

[7] Id. at 443, quoting Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 308 (1940).

[8] 337 U.S. 1 (1948).

[9] 274 F.Supp. at 443 n.4.

[10] Id. at 442.

[11] 268 F.Supp. 855 (S.D.N.Y. 1967), aff'd, 392 F.2d 83 (2d Cir. 1968).

On appeal, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that a bus terminal is an appropriate place for distributing leaflets, carrying placards and in general acquainting passers-by, especially servicemen, with the anti-war views of the protesters.[14] The perplexing question of the necessary degree of intimacy between the forum selected for protest and the object of the protest was squarely before the court. The issue is one which the Supreme Court has yet to amplify clearly, and yet cases like Wolin continue to raise it. Judge Kaufman's response to this problem, in his opinion for the court, was that sometimes the forum selected for protest is the object of the protest, and at other times it is selected because that is "where the relevant audience may be found." [15] Apparently the court views an use of the public forum for either purpose as entirely consistent with first amendment objectives.

The Second Circuit's concern that dissent or protest have an audience is an important and novel development in first amendment case law. Certainly it must be recognized that a constitutional breakthrough has occurred when the Second Circuit declares that an anti-war group has "a constitutionally cognizable interest in reaching a broad audience." [16] Creating a constitutionally cognizable right to access certainly is a more sensitive response to first amendment problems that the laissez-faire "market place of ideas" concept, which assumed that if the dissenter could speak or write somewhere, society at large somehow would find the message and respond to it. Of course, Judge Kaufman was writing in the context of a public forum rather than a private one, but the concern for access, once it is recognized, surely cannot stop there. Judge Kaufman indicated an awareness of the relationship between a multiplicity of forums and a stable and healthy public order. The momentum of this new awareness must certainly reach all the mass media. The influence of the privately-owned mass media on the information and opinion process is too great for an access-oriented first amendment theory to be halted in its tracks because the monopoly newspaper, for example, is privately rather than publically owned.

---

[12] 268 F.Supp. at 862.

[13] Id. at 863.

[14] 392 F.2d at 88–91.

[15] Id. at 90.

[16] Id. at 94. On the Supreme Court level, the importance of access for ideas as a central, if not the central, factor in first amendment litigation was given expression by Justice Harlan's concurrence in the draft card burning case. United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968). The Court has said that a governmental regulation could withstand first amendment attack if the governmental interest served was not directed at suppression of free expression and if the resulting restriction on freedom of expression was no greater than that necessary to secure the governmental objective. Mr. Justice Harlan wrote a special concurrence, however, to make clear his view that this holding did not preclude first amendment defenses where the restraint upon expression has the "effect of entirely preventing a 'speaker' from reaching a significant audience with whom he could not otherwise lawfully communicate." Id. at 388–89. This recognition in Mr. Justice Harlan's concurrence of a constitutional right to an audience for unpopular social and political protest is a most significant observation and is entirely consistent with Judge Kaufman's opinion in Wolin.

This emerging right of access to public facilities is, of course, not yet fully developed. In two recent cases the Supreme Court divided over what kinds of public buildings could be used for social and political protest. The Court held that a library[17] could be so used but that a jail[18] exists for security purposes alone. Mr. Justice Douglas and three other Justices disagreed. For him, apparently, public buildings are less restrictedly available for political protest.[19]

A more recent case which suggests a real recognition of the pivotal nature of access in terms of making the first amendment operational is Food Employees Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza, Inc.,[20] which involved informational picketing in a privately-owned shopping center. A state court enjoined the picketing on the ground that private property could not be used for such a purpose contrary to the wishes of its owners. The United States Supreme Court held that such picketing could not be enjoined; the fact of private ownership was not itself a bar to the exercise of first amendment rights. The Court stressed the quasi-public aspect of the shopping center, relying on Marsh v. Alabama,[21] where the Court had held that a company town was sufficiently public in nature that the exercise of first amendment rights could not be abridged. despite the claim of private ownership. The Court conceded that the situation before it was different from Marsh in the sense that total denial of access to the community was not present as it had been in Marsh. But because the shopping center serves as the community business block, the Court held that the state should not permit its trespass laws to be used against "those members of the public wishing to exercise their First Amendment rights on the premises in a manner and for a purpose generally consonant with the use to which the property is actually put."[22] The Court's theory appears to be the "dedication to a public use" approach found in the public facilities cases in the lower federal courts. What is novel about the approach is that it is being used in the context of what is, after all, private rather than public property.

The Court in Logan Valley paid the conventional deference to the alternative means test, i.e., whether there are equivalent opportunities for expression available, and resolved the question in the negative. If the state court order were obeyed, the Court reasoned, the picketers would be confined to the paths adjoining the shopping center. But since the picketers were trying to bring home to the customers of a particular store in the shopping center that its employees were non-union, the Court apparently considered ease of access to that audience as crucial. The Court pointed out that if the pickets were kept away from the shopping center their placards would be at such great distances from the store that they would be unreadable.

What is truly significant about Logan Valley is that it represents a confrontation between modern land use and the first amendment. The Court states its awareness of the historic role that access to public places such as sidewalks, streets and parks has played in the enjoyment of freedom of expression in the United States. Moreover, we have examined the manner in which the lower federal courts have broadened the kinds of public facilities where such access must be permitted. What Logan Valley does is to forge a similar extension at the Supreme Court level as a result of the Court's awareness of changes in residential patterns. Just as in Wolin and Kissinger the courts were anxious to point out that access to the bus terminal and the subway may be as important as access to the public street, in Logan Valley the Court attempts to point out the significance which the shopping center has acquired in American life. The Court reasoned that in the automobile-centered suburb, the shopping center is a focal point for the community, so that access to its parking lot may be indispensable to secure access to that community. The Court qualified the sweep of this observation, however, by remarking that the store being picketed was located in the shopping center at issue and that the message in controversy was related to the operations of that particular store. The Court said it was not necessary to decide whether the shopping center's property rights could, under the first amendment, prevent picketing unrelated to the uses of the shopping center. But the implication seems clear that even unrelated picketing would be viewed sympathetically by the Logan Valley majority when conducted in a shopping center which is the only quasi-public facility in a community.

---

[17] Brown v. Louisiana, 383 U.S. 113, 142 (1965).
[18] Adderley v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39, 41 (1966).
[19] Id. at 49.
[20] 391 U.S. 308 (1968).
[21] 326 U.S. 501 (1946).
[22] 391 U.S. at 319–20.

Particularly intriguing, and signifying a major step in the development of an access-oriented approach to the first amendment, is the Court's comparative indifference to whether the facilities in question are publically or privately owned. Mr. Justice Marshall's somewhat deprecatory remark on this point was that "Naked title is essentially all that is at issue."[23] The rise of a first amendment perspective indifferent to whether the source of restraint on freedom of expression is public or private is of course what rouses Mr. Justice Black to dissent. In retrospect, his dissent is rather ironic, in that the majority in Logan Valley relied so heavily on Marsh, an opinion written by Mr. Justice Black. For him, however, Marsh is really a sport among the cases for it is that rare case where all the attributes of a town are in private hands. It appears that so long as anything less than a total deprivation of first amendment rights is involved, Mr. Justice Black would not make any new inroads on property rights. But whatever the misgivings of Mr. Justice Black and the other dissenters on the point, the majority of the Court now appears ready to expand the opportunities for access to a wider class of forums than ever before. The test of such access, however, apparently is not going to proceed on any simplistic private-public dichotomy but rather on the following inquiry: how crucial to the communication at issue is access to the forum in question?

A vital question is whether or not the protest must be somewhat related to the function of the public facility which is being used. In Wolin the fact that the bus terminal was primarily designed for large crowds was, in the court's view, just what made it an appropriate place for communicating political views.[24] Apparently the court held that wherever there are public facilities through which large numbers of people can be easily reached, there is a right of access to those facilities by groups interested in using them for purposes of political expression. This is not true, of course, where the expression might injure the primary purpose for which the facility exists. This approach may well become, if in view of Logan Valley it is not already, the constitutional law of access to public facilities for purposes of political and social protest.

The implications of these developments are quite significant. If public use of government facilities imposes on government a duty to permit use of the acilities for the communication of ideas, the significance of this development or privately-run facilities is fairly clear. If such facilities, even though pri-ately sponsored, are also "dedicated to a public use," then presumably the ame affirmative obligations are placed on those facilities. The blurring of hat is "private" and what is "public," which has come to characterize so uch of our life, eventually may create an access-oriented approach to first mendment values which will endow any natural or obvious forum in our ociety with responsibilities for stimulating the communication of ideas. To e sure, the new concern with the public forum is a form of judicial response o the constitutionally sanctioned irresponsibility of the privately controlled ass communication system. To the extent that responsibilities are placed on e latter, and to the extent that they are voluntarily assumed, the pressure n the public facility to serve as an arena for protest in default may be ssened, but it should not be relieved entirely. An access-oriented approach the first amendment implies affirmative obligation on government as well as e private sector and its concerns.

he Pragmatics of a Right of Access to the Press

Government as well as the private sector must begin to assume the burden stimulating the communication of ideas just as it has done with the most vious sources of the communications of ideas—radio, television and the ess. The affirmative obligation of the press and of government facilities to be nsitive to their responsibility to adequately present the contemporary life ideas is, outside the electronic media, best secured for the moment through e courts. The courts need not be powerless to prevent public facilities and the press from taking refuge in an anemic approach to affirmative duty by dodging attacks in order to avoid the duty to provide expression for counterattack. Entry to the press, like entry to circulate leaflets in a bus terminal, can be judicially evaluated in terms of the public use and public need. It is, after all, no more complex a judicial task than is presently involved in analyzing the puzzles of apportionment, school desegregation and obscenity. However, more extended oversight—oversight in forums other than the judiciary at least for the forseeable future—should be given the most cautious study. Licensing of the press has the least honorable history of any enduring constitutional problem in the history of Anglo-American law. The structure of broadcasting, the weaker legal claims to a property right, the mesmerizing capacity of the electronic media themselves, make its regulatory pattern tolerable, even desirable, but not necessarily transplantable to the press.

---

[23] Id. at 324.
[24] 392 F.2d at 90.

That an merging right of access can, at least to begin with, best be handled in the courts is supported by analogues in other sensitive constitutional areas. For example, in Jacobellis v. Ohio[25] the Supreme Court squarely held that the question of what is "obscenity" is a constitutional question to be decided by judges rather than government administrators or juries. Relying on Lockhart and McClure's observation that judges have no special qualities which entitle them to choose which "movies are good or bad for local communities," the Court nevertheless supported the following conclusion about judges:

> But they [the judges] do have a far keener understanding of the importance of free expression than do most government administrators or jurors, and they have had considerable experience in making value judgments of the type required by the constitutional standards for obscenity. If freedom is to be preserved, neither government censorship experts nor juries can be left to make the final effective decisions restraining free expression. Their decisions must be subject to effective, independent review, and we know of no group better qualified for that review than the appellate judges of this country under the guidance of the Supreme Court.[26]

In holding in Jacobellis that obscenity is a question of constitutional law of the highest order, the Court really accepted the views on this point which had been argued by Mr. Justice Harlan in Roth v. United States.[27]

> Every communication has an individuality and "value" of its own. The suppression of a particular writing or other tangible form of expression is, therefore, an individual matter, and in the nature of things every such suppression raises an individual constitutional problem, in which a reviewing court must determine for itself whether the attacked expression is suppressable within constitutional standards.[28]

If the suppression of a communication on grounds of obscenity is a question of such constitutional significance that it insists on judicial treatment, then certainly the issue of whether a particular group ought to be permitted an opportunity for expression—for participation in the life of ideas—is also a question solvable by judges. It is by the judicial process that we shall establish the contours for answers to questions which a working right of access obviously presents. What is a minority point of view? When and where shall such opinions be heard? Has some significant space already been given to the particular controversy? Must every issue of the publication contain a reference to a particular controversy? Isn't it possible to reach saturation of a given subject? When is the decision not to publish based upon an effort to obstruct the opinion process? Surely resolving these problems is no less baffling than deciding when a book is "without redeeming social importance" or when it is marketed against a "background of commercial exploitation." But which judicial task accommodates itself more easily to the basic theory of the first amendment? A task which winnows out that which is to be suppressed, or a task whose point of inquiry is whether the communications media have been in default and whether a particular point of view has been suppressed?

The procedure recommended here is already asserting itself in the decisions. In Wolin and Kissinger, the courts engaged in an inquiry into the reason for suppression and the need for access which should be far more widely undertaken. That such a procedure will not render the work of the communications industry unduly miserable is demonstrated by another recent case, Avins v. Rutgers University.[29] Plaintiff sued Rutgers University for declaratory and injunctive relief, alleging that the Rutgers University Law Review had refused to publish an article he had written in which he argued for an emphasis upon the primacy of the legislative history of the fourteenth amendment in interpreting that amendment. He complained that the liberal ideology of the law review staff was hostile to such an approach and that they rejected his article for that reason. Plaintiff used essentially the argument that a state university law review is a public instrumentality, in the columns of which all must be allowed to present their ideas. In declining relief the court pointed out that the author himself had said that he had been published in other reviews and would eventually be able to publish the article involved here.[30] What the court's ruling in essence amounts to is that editorial discretion is not threatened by a public instrumentality concept for ideas. Moreover, the court apparently concluded that the case was not a true access problem since the author had himself acknowledged the inevitability of publication.

---

[25] 378 U.S. 184, 188 (1964).

[26] Lockhart & McClure, Censorship of Obscenity: The Developing Constitutiona Standards, 45 Minn. L. Rev. 5, 119 (1960).

[27] 354 U.S. 476 (1957).

[28] Id. at 497.

The inquiry concerning whether there is need to require publication may turn upon whether a restraint on expression actually is present. In Avins, as in Ginzburg v. United States,[31] an important issue was motivation. In Ginzburg the question was whether "pandering" was the motivation for the offending publication. Similarly, in an access situation an important question is whether ideological considerations were the dominant reason for refusal to publish. The court's response to that question in Avans is illustrative:

> The plaintiff's contention that the student editors of the Rutgers Law Review have been so indoctrinated in a liberal ideology by the faculty of the law school as to be unable to evaluate his article objectively is so frivolous as to require no discussion.[32]

But even a showing of an ideological reason for refusal to publish is, of course, not sufficient; it must be coupled with a showing of need for access. Since the law review audience is a national one, unlike, for example, that of a monopoly newspaper in a single city, the showing of a need for access in such a context ought to be far more demanding.

It might be concluded from the foregoing that if this is all that is advocated, then it is not, in terms of immediate consequences, such a large step. And that is true. The larger step would be a utilization of an over-all approach to first amendment problems regardless of the immediate beneficial results. Yet, beneficial results from a constitutionally-based doctrine of press responsibility will be created by voluntary utilization of right to access principles as well as by the purely legal advantage of being able on occasion to demand access to the printed media. Managers of publicly sponsored facilities are now able to tell offended superiors what newspaper editors would then be able to tell offended advertisers—that they have no choice and that they must take the offending advertisement. Indeed, the pangs of conscience about the present status of newspaper as a "privileged industry" are already exhibited in the best section of the American press. After Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right[33] was first published, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch commented on it in the following editorial:

> The newspaper (which is in no way licensed by the Government as a broadcasting station) has an obligation to the community in which it is published to present fairly unpopular as well as popular sides of a question. Enforcing such a dictum by law is constitutionally impossible, and should be. As a practical matter, a newspaper which consistently refuses to give expression to viewpoints with which it differs is not likely to succeed, and doesn't deserve to.[34]

Whether it is true, as the Post-Dispatch suggests, that the wicked do not prosper, it has been the effort of this article to not take the chance that they might and to show that a right of access is both constitutionally possible and practicably workable.

---

[29] 385 F.2d 151 (3d Cir. 1967).
[30] Id. at 153.
[31] 383 U.S. 463 (1966).
[32] 385 F.2d at 154.
[33] Barron, supra note 1.
[34] St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Aug. 24, 1967, at 2E, cols. 2–3 (emphasis added).

A Right of Access and Broadcast Regulation

With regard to the printed media, the emphasis was on utilization of the judicial process to resolve the problem of access along the well-traveled paths established by other first amendment problems such as obscenity and libel. Concerning the electronic media, positive direction to first amendment theory can best be achieved by emphasizing the desirability of approaching the existing structure of broadcast regulation with a realistic rather than romantic view of first amendment purposes. The relationship of the "fairness" and "equal time" concepts to the first amendment objective of the widest possible dissemination of controversial ideas has been insufficiently appreciated. The merit of programming standards should not depend upon whether radio is no longer a limited access medium or whether television still is.[35] Diversity of ideas, not multiplicity of forums, is the primary objective of the first amendment. To be sure, it is hoped that a greater number of forums will create a more diverse opinion process. A flick of the radio dial should be sufficient to dispel that illusion, however. Since the sameness of programming has come to be the dominant characteristic of American radio, the mere abundance of radio stations should not be sufficient for first amendment compliance. An abundance of radio stations no more guarantees diversity of opinion than the scarcity of television stations assures onesidedness.

A positive approach to free expression in broadcasting requires less new legal architecture than is the case with the printed media. Some affirmative obligations already exist—for example, the "equal time rule" and the "fairness" doctrine, both found in section 315 of the Federal Communications Act.[36] To be sure, since their inception these efforts to assure debate have been unceasingly attacked by the industry and their allies in the press who realize that their own lack of legally imposed responsibility to the communications process stands in direct contrast to the situation in broadcasting. What is needed is not more legislation, but a wider appreciation of the relationship of the section 315 responsibilities to basic first amendment goals. If meaningful interchange of ideas is to be anything but an oratorical term, the constitutional underpinning—the decisiveness of opportunity of access to the public—must be stressed in order to obtain wider industry understanding and cooperation. [As it is, the communications industry, by creating in the public's mind an identity between itself and the first amendment, has achieved the public relations triumph of the twentieth century over the eighteenth.]

Some background on the development of the "fairness" doctrine is useful in order to understand the controversy which has arisen concerning it and broadcast regulations generally. The language of section 315 defines the basic outline of the doctrine. Broadcast licensees are required "to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance."[37] It is instructive to note that the language of the statute itself goes a long way toward the goal of imposing an affirmative duty of access for controversial issues. Of course, it has not been so broadly interpreted. Rather, it has been viewed by the FCC as merely giving statutory force to the "fairness" doctrine. The FCC administratively promulgated the doctrine in 1949, and it imposed upon station licensees an affirmative obligation to provide an opportunity for counter-attack on controversial public issues—assuming, of course, that one side of the controversy has already been presented by the station licensee.

It would seem, however, that a statutory duty "to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views" is a command to do more than merely provide an opportunity for response once the station has decided to give time to a particular issue. If the statute were administered to require licensees to provide access for significant public issues, one of the most important means for evasion of the "fairness" principle would be weakened. At the present time, dislike of a particular side of an issue or unwillingness to be required to give free time for reply are frequently sufficient reason for a licensee to decide to avoid a particular issue altogether. An access approach to the language of section 315 would make the road to evasion of the fairness doctrine a little steeper. If section 315 were read as a command requiring access for controversial public issues as well as a restatement of the "fairness" principle, then we would have a structure to stimulate access to ideas in broadcasting similar to that advocated above for the press.

---

[35] See ACLU Staff Paper, Affirmative Obligation of Government to Implement the Exercise of the First Amendment 10.

[36] 47 U.S.C. § 315 (1964).

[37] Id. § 315(a).

In broadcasting, however, access would necessarily have more teeth. The fact that station licenses must be renewed every three years means, at least in theory, that the extent of a licensee's performance in the public interest is evaluated by the FCC when it decided whether to renew the license for another term. If persistent evasion of the principles of access and fairness has been a routine feature of a licensee's programming, then there is no reason why another applicant should not be licensed in its stead. But the remedy need not be that drastic. Informal agency rulings, cease and desist orders, and renewals for one year terms rather than the normal three year term are all milder ways of dealing with the problem of enforcement.

What this illustrates is that the existing structure of broadcast regulation permits an understanding of the problem of access which can be inclusive enough to reach failure to recognize or seek out dominant public issues. These orders, of intense concern to the vitality and stability of the public order, are given minimal attention in broadcasting as a routine matter. The area of race relations is a prime example of an issue where access is not so much denied as underplayed.

The portrayal of the races on the mass media effectively illustrates the defects of an approach to freedom of expression which is entirely concerned with protecting expression only after it has satisfied admission criteria formulated by managers of the mass media with no analysis of how these criteria work. A solution to the problem of access in terms of black-white relationships is more subtle and intratable than merely structuring the law so that if a Negro group seeks a reply to an anti-Negro or anti-civil rights editorial, or wishes space for a political advertisement, the mass media will have an obligation to take it. Moreover, the underrepresentation of the Negro as a normal citizen on television and in the daily press is more than an access problem. The mass media not unsurprisingly reflect the society which they mirror. It is no accident that one of the most distinguished Negro novels is called the Invisible Man. That certainly is the image of the Negro in mass communications. Until recently, the Negro simply did not exist in the world of television advertising, and he is only barely present now. Political and constitutional theorists have speculated over definitions of speech—speech which is protected and speech which is unprotected—but every communication, whatever its primary purpose, also doubles as an idea. Professor Charles Black has explained that commercial advertising itself, with its insistence on acquisitiveness, is an idea from which he at least would like to shield his children.[38] Similarly, the white world of television advertising reflects the idea that normally is white—the reality of twenty million Negroes simply is not visible in mass communications as a matter of routine presentation. It is, of course, true that the Negro is presented, but most often he is presented as a social irritant and disturber of the peace.

How can a more representative presentation of the Negro be secured? Presumably as a response to the death of Martin Luther King and also to deal with the problem of understating or ignoring the Negro in broadcasting, a questionnaire recently was circulated by FCC Commissioners Kenneth Cox and Nicholas Johnson. This action is extremely instructive in terms of illustrating what can be done under existing authority. The inquiry was directed to broadcasters in a single state, Oklahoma, and asked how many members of minority groups the broadcasters employed in their stations and how much programming they devoted to problems of the Negro community and to problems of race relations generally.[39] Such inquiries have more potential, at least in the long run, than elaborate procedures for governing television or radio during riots. Certainly the dilemma of the electronic media in a time of violence is how to inform the public without inflaming it.[40] But, as noted in the Kerner Commission chapter on mass media, the failure of the mass media is not in riot reporting but in the day-to-day portrayal or nonportrayal of Negro life:

---

[38] Black, Jr.. He Cannot Choose But Hear: The Plights of the Captive Auditor, 53 COLUM. L. REV. 960, 969 n.18 (1953), in THE OCCASIONS OF JUSTICE 125 n.18 (1963).

[39] Broadcasting in America and the FCC's License Renewal Process: An Oklahoma Case Study, 14 F.C.C.2d 1 (1968).

> [T]he communications media, ironically, have failed to communicate. They have not communicated to the majority of their audience—which is white—a sense of the degradation, misery, and hopelessness of living in the ghetto. They have not communicated to whites a feeling for the difficulties and frustrations of being a Negro in the United States. They have not shown understanding or appreciation of—and thus, have not communicated—a sense of Negro culture, thought, or history.
>
> The absence of Negro faces and activities from the media has an effect on white audiences as well as black. If what the white American reads in the newspapers or sees on television conditions his expectation of what is ordinary and normal in the larger society, he will neither understand nor accept the black American. By failing to portray the Negro as a matter of routine and in the context of the total society, the news media have, we believe, contributed to the black-white schism in this country.[41]

Commissioners Cox and Johnson have been attacked within the broadcasting industry merely for inquiring into the number of Negro personnel employed by broadcasters and the amount of race-connected programming performed by them in a single state. The industry's attack is based on allegations of restraint upon freedom of expression.[42] But would a requirement that the conventional means of communication give some coverage to the nation's largest racial minority as a part of their day-to-day programming thwart the industry's effort to secure freedom of expression? Of course, the first amendment shields the communications industry and all others from government censorship. But is this in any way inconsistent with requiring the industry as a matter of its internal practice to make some attempt to represent the major social components in our national life, particularly when dialogues between the races is so urgently needed?

THE "FAIRNESS" DOCTRINE AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT: THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION

What I have called the public relations triumph, the exploitation of a romantic theory of the first amendment for completely commercial and nonideological ends, is presently being utilized in a renewed attack on the "fairness" doctrine—particularly the so-called "personal attack" provision.[43] In July 1967 the FCC adopted a provision which requires that when licensees attack the "honesty, character, integrity or like personal qualities" of a person or group, the licensee must furnish a tape or script to whomever is attacked and offer him—free of charge in most cases—air time for reply. The Commission defended its rule on the ground that it embodied the first amendment goal stated in New York Times v. Sullivan that "debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and . . . may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials." [44]

Recently, in the context of the libel field, the Supreme Court in an 8–1 decision has emphasized the wide ranging scope afforded to newspapers to make "unpleasantly sharp attacks." [45] But the Court has yet to focus on the most important aspect of the constitutional principle enunciated in New York Times v. Sullivan—that the underlying goal is debate. Affording newspapers relative immunity from libel actions without imposing some obligation that they provide space for reply is not constitutionally encouraged debate but judicially supported monologue or, worse, harangue. The application of the “fairness” principle to the “personal attack” situation in broadcasting is a well considered response to the first amendment goals stated by the Supreme Court and stands in sharp contrast to judicial silence on the affirmative obligation of newspapers to allow their quarry some measure of response.

---

[40] Laurent, Riots Demand Responsible Coverage, Wash. Post, Apr. 8, 1968, at B–8, col. 1.

[41] REPORT OF THE NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMISSION ON CIVIL DISORDERS 383 (Bantam ed. 1968).

[42] See Laurent, Censorship or Responsibility at FCC?, Wash. Post, Apr. 19, 1968, at C–9, col. 5.

[43] For a discussion of this attack on the "fairness" doctrine, see Green, The Troubled Air: Which Way Fairness?, Wall Street Journal, Apr. 23, 1968, at 18, col. 3.

[44] 376 U.S. 254, 270 (1964).

[45] St. Amant v. Thompson, 390 U.S. 727 (1968).

The FCC’s performance in the “fairness” area has always been fairly uneven. One reason is that the broadcasting industry has exhibited a tendency to overreact to the “fairness’ principles. Moreover, until quite recently the constitutional position of the “fairness” doctrine really had not received direct judicial consideration. Recently, however, the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC,[46] squarely upheld the constitutionality of the “fairness” doctrine as entirely consistent with the first amendment.

The Supreme Court accepted review in Red Lion but deferred decision until resolution of a similar case in the Seventh Circuit that has just recently been decided.[47] In considering the personal attack and political editorial rules issued by the FCC subsequent to Red Lion, which presented issues similar to those in Red Lion, the Seventh Circuit disagreed with the District of Columbia Circuit. Although it did not consider the constitutionality of the “fairness” doctrine, the court held that “In view of the vagueness of the Commission’s rules, the burden they impose on licensees, and the possibility they raise of both Commission censorship and licensee self-censorship, we conclude that the personal attack and political editorial rules would contravene the first amendment.”[48]

The facts of Red Lion are illustrative both of the operation of the “personal attack” aspect of the “fairness” doctrine and of the manner in which the “fairness” doctrine implements debate instead of retarding the objectives of free expression. In November 1964 a Pennsylvania broadcaster carried a program by the Rev. Billy James Hargis, who attacked a book by Fred Cook which had been critical of Barry Goldwater, the Republican candidate for President. Cook requested an opportunity to reply to Hargis, but the radio station said that the “personal attack” aspect of the “fairness” doctrine required it to supply free time for reply only if no paid sponsorship could be found. The station wished Cook to affirm that he could not obtain such sponsorship. Cook complained to the FCC, which replied essentially that the station had the duty to make reply time available, paid or not. The FCC stated that it was not necessary for Cook to show that he could neither afford nor find sponsored time before the station’s duty to provide reply went into effect. The Commission reasoned that the public interest required that the public be given an opportunity to learn the other side and that this duty stood even if the expense of the reply time had to be sustained by the station. A formal order to that effect was entered and the station appealed to the United States court of appeals.

Judge Tamm for the court of appeals pointed out that federal courts have continuously held that regulatory action by the FCC does not violate the first amendment because broadcasting is a limited access medium.[49] He reasoned that fairness does not restrict “free speech” but implements it:

> After having independently selected the controversial issue and having selected the spokesman for the presentation of the issue in accord with their unrestricted programming, the Doctrine, rather than limiting the petitioners’ right of free speech, recognizes and enforces the free speech right of the victim of any personal attack made during the broadcast.[50]

Judge Tamm approved the FCC’s use of the limited access idea to justify fairness by holding that the purpose of the Federal Communications Act is to permit the Government to license frequencies without interfering with free speech—licensing which is, after all, supposed to be in the public interest. However, the irony of allowing such licensees to “themselves make radio unavailable as a medium of free speech”[51] was at last pointed out by a court. Hopefully, this kind of analysis will be extended as a matter of constitutional doctrine to all components of the communications industry. The economic interdependence of the media and the fact that the one or two newspapers which presently exist in our large cities usually also own one of the important radio and television stations in the community give the media enormous power for private censorship. What is necessary is not to point to the lack of a "fairness" principle with regard to the legal responsibilities of newspapers but rather to point to the "fairness" principle as a standard which should have some analogue in the press as well.

---

[46] 381 F.2d 908 (D.C. Cir. 1967).

[47] Radio Television News Directors Ass’n v. United States, 400 F.2d 1002 (7th Cir. 1968).

[48] Id. at 1020.

[49] 381 F.2d at 923.

[50] Id. at 924.

[51] Id., quoting In re Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 F.C.C. 1246, 1248 (1949).

Another useful perspective on this problem arises from Judge Tamm's refusal to hold that the "fairness" principle infringes upon the political rights of the people, justifying the Commission's rule that when a licensee has chosen to sponsor a program which presents one side of an issue and has been unable to obtain "paid sponsorship for the appropriate presentations of the contrasting viewpoint or viewpoints, he cannot reject a presentation otherwise suitable to the licensee—and thus leave the public uninformed—on the ground that he cannot obtain paid sponsorship for that presentation."[52] Again, for government to require some observance to the informing function of the first amendment seems entirely in order. The broadcasters contended that the "fairness" doctrine operated as a prior restraint, i.e., that they were forced to become the "first censors" of all public interest broadcasting because if a licensee might have to broadcast an opposing view, indeed give free time to it, it might not broadcast the particular matter at all.[53] Judge Tamm rejected this argument:

> I do not find in the operation of the Fairness Doctrine any restriction upon the rights of the people to engage in political activities. . . . Broadcasters alone determine the programs they will carry, the format to be followed, and the personnel to be utilized in these broadcasts.[54]

Moreover, he pointed out that no broadcast material is required to be first submitted to the FCC, and that the licensees' latitude "in the selection of program material, program substance, and identity of program personnel is founded only by their own determination of the public interest of their end product."[55] To the spectre the industry is fond of raising that the FCC's disapproval of a licensee's responsiveness to the "fairness" doctrine may result in loss of the license at renewal time, Judge Tamm observed that the Commission had made it clear that no sanction would be invoked "against any broadcaster for an honest mistake in judgment."[56]

---

[52] Id. at 926, quoting Cullman Broadcasting Co., 25 P & F RADIO REG. 895, 897 (FCC 1963).

[53] In Radio Television News Directors Ass'n the Seventh Circuit found a similar argument to be convincing.

> [T]he Commission's rules are too vague because they lack standards precise enough to enable a licensee to ascertain whether he is subject to the rules' obligations. When a licensee considers the vagueness of the rules, the mandatory and pervasive requirements of the rules, and the threat of suffering serious sanctions for noncompliance with them, it is likely that he will become far more hesitant to engage in controversial issue programming or political editorializing.

400 F.2d at 1016.

In Banzhaf v. FCC, No. 21,285 (D.C. Cir. Nov. 21, 1968), the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia distinguished Radio Television News Directors Ass'n and at the same time suggested that access to broadcasting could be required as a first amendment matter even apart from the "fairness" doctrine. The Banzhaf court affirmed an FCC ruling requiring radio and television stations which carry cigarette advertising to "devote a significant amount of broadcast time to presenting the case against cigarette smoking." Slip opinion at 4. The court attemped to distinguish Radio Television News Directors Ass'n by saying that if the "fairness" doctrine is ultimately held to be unconstitutional it would be because its attempt to assue balanced presentation of controversial issues may result in no presentation of such issues at all. In the cigarette advertising situation, on the other hand, the court said the first amendment interest is futhered by the Commission's ruling:

> But where, as here, one party to a debate has a financial clout and a compelling economic interest in the presentation of one side unmatched by its opponent, and where the public stake in the argument is no less than life itself—we think the purpose of rugged debate is served, not hindered, by an attempt to redress the balance.

Slip opinion at 36–37.

Even that most venerable constitutional cliche, the marketplace of ideas concept of the first amendment, received a candid reappraisal from Judge Bazelon in his opinion for the court in Banzhaf:

> A primary First Amendment policy has been to foster the widest possible debate and dissemination of information on matters of public importance. That policy has been pursued by a general hostility toward any deterrents to free expression. The difficulty with this negative approach is that not all free speakers have equally loud voices, and success in the marketplace of ideas may go to the advocate who can shout loudest or most often.

Slip opinion at 36 (footnote omitted). This and similar statements in the court's opinion reflect a newly emerging and more realistic awareness of the positive dimension of the first amendment than has characterized the law in this area of the past. Finally, it should be noted that if the access-oriented approach to § 315, urged in this article, is adopted, the criticism of the courts in both Radio News and Banzhaf that the "fairness" doctrine might muzzle rather than stimulate debate would be met.

[54] 381 F.2d at 926.

Judge Tamm has taken what may be called a "problem-solving" approach to constitutional law and the first amendment; he has given some consideration to making the first amendment work, to analyzing its practice as well as stating its theory. He concluded:

> there is no abrogation of the petitioners' free speech right. On the contrary, I find that the conduct of the petitioners absent the remedial procedures afforded the complainant Cook would, in fact, constitute a serious abridgement of his free speech rights. I find in the Fairness Doctrine a vehicle completely legal in its origin which implements by the use of modern technology the "free and general discussion of public matters [which] seems absolutely essential to prepare the people for an intelligent exercise of their rights as citizens."[57]

The Red Lion determination that the duty of the broadcaster to furnish an unpaid reply to a personal attack was not violative of the first amendment is an important step in the evolution of a constitutional theory that will be sensitive to the unanticipated power which the marriage of technology and capital has placed in the relatively few hands which dominate mass communications. Red Lion suggests the method by which to build a constitutionally rooted opinion-making structure. If the Supreme Court affirms Red Lion, it will augur well for the beginnings of a first amendment theory which will have contemporary revelance. Otherwise the prospects for constructing a public forum model, within the context of privately owned mass media, will be quite dim. And so, ironically, will be the entire future of private broadcasting. Oddly enough, the ultimate role of public television is to a considerable extent contingent upon whether private broadcasting legally can be required to assume some measure of public and social responsibility. Perhaps when Red Lion is finally reviewed by the Supreme Court the centrality of the concept of access to the problem of protecting freedom of expression will be considered. The presentation of such an issue could not help but expose the incomplete nature of the present law in the area where the law of libel and the first amendment intersect. Hopefully, the Court will reflect on the new reading of section 315 suggested earlier insofar as it reveals the necessity to promote access for ideas as well as protection of ideas once they have been admitted to the forum.

In conclusion, Red Lion is a critical case in many ways. The importance the broadcasting industry attaches to the case is illustrated by the substantial briefs amici curiae filed by the major networks in support of the station and against the "fairness" doctrine. The case may settle the future of program regulation generally, not merely for public issue programming. At the least, it raises the question of whether the first amendment should receive a different interpretation when the new mass media, radio and television, rather than the press, is involved. Another and broader approach would be to review the impact of the new technology on all the media when viewed against a background of economic combinations continuously concentrating the ownership of the media. Such a review by the Supreme Court might result in an urgently needed inquiry into whether traditional first amendment theory should be rethought so that it can meet the challenge posed by the alliance of modern capital and technology.

The previous defense of "fairness" is undertaken without being unmindful of the problems in the enforcement of the "fairness" doctrine. Of course these problems exist, but seen from a constitutional perspective, many of these difficulties are soluble. Recently a group attacked the free use of broadcast time to advertise the Peace Corps. Should this and similar problems be solved by hunting about for some group opposed to the purposes of the Peace Corps and giving that group free time? Or is it wiser to keep government out of the business of propaganda? For broadcasting to identify with and echo governmentally-sponsored positions would be most unfortunate. This is particularly so since the executive branch often holds a single view on a variety of controversial issues and is in a strong position to exert pressure both on the FCC and on the licensed station holders.

---

[55] Id.
[56] Id. at 929.
[57] Id. at 929–30, quoting Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 250 (1936).

The experience of the mass media in totalitarian countries, as well as the experience of French television in a presumably democratic country, illustrates the dangers to free discussion of controversial issues inherent in a close connection between the media and government. An illustration of this danger is provided by a recent case in which a student newspaper editor at a state university refused to follow a college rule that the paper could print praise of the state government but not criticism. The college expelled the editor. A federal court reinstated him,[58] and the case is now on appeal. There is an important and fundamental difference—a difference which must be stressed—between a positive role for the first amendment which is achieved through a governmentally-sponsored process for stimulating the interchange of ideas and a positive role for the first amendment in which the government contributes substantively to the information process in any institutionalized way. If the new experiment in public television[59] can be sufficiently separated from direct political pressures so that it is a governmentally-sponsored structure for infusing a new and non-commercial approach to programming, it will be successful. But at all costs broadcasting, whether private or public, must be prevented from becoming a mere conduit for the views espoused by the particular political administration in power.

"EQUAL TIME" AND THE MCCARTHY CASE: A PROBLEM OF ACCESS

Reference to another case illustrates both the limitations of the present approach to the affirmative obligations of broadcasting and at the same time indicates that the constitutional dimension of the problem is at last being dimly perceived. The case, McCarthy v. FCC,[60] involves the request of Senator Eugene McCarthy for "equal time" to answer the hour-long interview of President Johnson carried by the three major television networks on December 19, 1967. Senator McCarthy contended that President Johnson was a "legally qualified candidate" within the meaning of section 315 of the Communications Act. The FCC denied the Senator's request on the ground that section 315 only applies to legally qualified persons who, among other things, had previously announced their candidacies, and that Lyndon Johnson had not announced his candidacy. As it turned out, the FCC was a reasonably good phophet, but at the time it did not seem so. Moreover, the FCC refused even to give Senator McCarthy a chance to show that President Johnson was acting as a candidate in fact. But suppose an incumbent President did not announce his candidacy until his party's national convention? Would section 315 be unavailable to provide "equal time" for announced candidates in the President's party to answer the incumbent President's "non-political" speeches? What of the opposition candidates? Is it not difficult to think of a more efficient way to maximize the already significant institutional aura of an incumbent President and to further minimize the chances for unseating him?

The court of appeals did give a little encouragement to those who think that political change can be achieved through conventional means of communications, however. The court indicated that the question of the right to "equal time" is a sensitive problem which requires more than a simple-minded inquiry into whether the previous speaker is an "announced" candidate. The court therefore suggested that the approach to the problem could not be mechanical. Moreover, the court provided some guide to a definition: "program content, and perhaps other criteria, may provide a guide to reality where a public figure allowed television or radio time has not announced for public office."[61]

But the court nevertheless declared, in an understatement which is perhaps a disservice to the gravity of the problem, that "no rule in this sensitive area can be applied mechanically without, in some instances at least, resulting in unfairness and possible constitutional implications."[62] This use of governmentally licensed facilities to aid an incumbent President suggests a kind of media-government alliance or implicit endorsement which seems contrary to the basic purposes of the first amendment. If the central meaning of the first amendment is to allow criticism of government, as some have said, then unimpeded praise of the government would itself seem to present a first amendment violation. But the constitutional dimension of the problem of access to the major communications media is just beginning to be understood.

---

[58] Dickey v. Board of Educ., 273 F. Supp. 613 (M.D. Ala. 1967).

[59] See Public Broadcasting Act of 1967, 47 U.S.C. §§ 390–99 (Supp. III, 1965–67).

[60] 390 F.2d 471 (D.C. Cir. 1968).

[61] Id. at 474.

CONCLUSION

It would be misleading to ask what the affirmative role of government should be in implementation of first amendment goals if that suggests that the halo which private managers of the media have long assumed is now, somewhat threadbare, to be placed intact on government. What must be emphasized is the positive dimension of the first amendment. The first amendment must be read to require opportunity for expression as well as protection for expression once secured. Provision of opportunity for expression is, under an affirmative approach to the first amendment, the responsibility of both governmentally-controlled as well as privately-controlled means of communication. No illusions are entertained about government power as compared with private power. The need is to build counterbalances into each sector to stimulate them to develop a responsiveness to the longing for an information process which is truly participatory. Moreover, any dichotomy which suggests that government is the ally or that private power is the enemy, or vice versa, of contemporary civil liberties is overly simplistic, particularly when the determination of what is public and what is private becomes an increasingly difficult task.

In the area of communications we are on the verge of a more comprehensive and sensitive idea of what freedom of expression should mean in a technological age. The rise of an affirmative approach in broadcasting indicates that the eighteenth century associations which still insulate the press are not present in broadcasting, making possible a more realistic appraisal of the electronic media. But there is a need for such an appraisal of other forums as well—forums such as the press and public facilities, whose capacities for censorship have received little attention until recently. Similarly, attempts to identify procedures created to assure debate with the suppression of ideas must be understood for what they are: the unreflecting use of hallowed symbols for purposes which are antithetical to debate and discussion.

[Reprinted by Permission, Virginia Law Review, Vol. 57: 636, May 1971]

FREE SPEECH AND THE MASS MEDIA

(By James A. Ruebright)

Any individual or group with muscle or wealth has power to suppress the speech of others. Accordingly, free speech is an artifact: it can exist only where its antagonists are subject to social restraint.

Government, an agency of restraint, has power to protect free speech. Ironically, government has power to censor and supress as well; but government is not unique in this respect. Other institutions, like "private" corporations, enjoy similar power. For example, the private companies that govern the mass media—the newspaper syndicates and the radio and television networks—regulate the form and content of substantial portions of public discourse. Further, substantial evidence indicates that these institutions can, and do on occasion, exercise their power in a censorial fashion.[1]

---

[62] Id.

[1] Commentators contend that the custodians of the median permit only established views to enter the marketplace of ideas. See Barron, Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right, 80 HARV. L. REV. 1641 (1967); Johnson & Westen, A Twentieth-Century Soapbox: The Right to Purchase Radio and Television Time, 57 VA. L. REV. 574 (1971); Note: Resolving the Free Speech—Free Press Dichotomy. Access to the Press Through

The framers of the first amendment contrived to restrict the censorial power of government.[2] Commentators and critics, sensitive to the effective censorship emanating from other sources, contend that analogous restraints are now required in areas where private power restricts free expression.[3] For example, in this issue of the Virginia Law Review Commissioner Nicholas Johnson of the Federal Communications Commission argues that radio and television broadcasters should be, and are in fact, constrained by the first amendment and by statute to sell broadcast time to persons wishing to communicate political speech. He maintains, in short, that the broadcaster's power to regulate the form and content of political speech transmitted in his medium is subject to a right of access-for-purchase, inhering in anyone with the means to buy and the will to speak.[4] This Note examines Commissioner Johnson's argument and questions his conclusion: The constitution does not compel a right of access, policy does not support it, and Congress has foreclosed judicial innovation by adopting a regulatory scheme protecting the interests of the media and the public.

The analysis here is structured by three questions. First, are the custodians of the mass media subject to first amendment restraints? Second, if they are, does the first amendment require them, specifically, to sell air time (or advertising space) to those who wish to buy? Third, do statutes impose such a requirement, if the first amendment does not?

FOUR THEORIES OF STATE ACTION

The first amendment protects free speech by restricting the power of government, but in a proper case the conduct of private individuals may be subject to the same restraint. This occurs where governmental power facilitates private conduct in such a way that the private act becomes, in a constitutional sense, action by the state. If the custodians of the mass media are in fact constrained by the first amendment, it is for this reason.[5]

Advertising, 22 U. FLA. L. REV. 293 (1969). One reason for this may be the technology of mass communication:

> We have seen that the very technology and especially of broadcasting can be realized only when they are reaching very large audiences. . . . This technological fact predisposes all the mass media to conform to an already widely accepted taste. It also makes it very difficult for a novel point of view or a just emerging problem to gain access to network broadcasts or other mass components of the mass communications system.

D. LACY, FREEDOM AND COMMUNICATIONS 69 (1961). The economic problems of maintaining subscriptions and ratings dictate an editorial policy calculated to woo the majority. As Mr. Justice Douglas, a staunch defender of the press, has noted:

> Money makers have taken over the press. They want readers and advertisers; and so they cater to the low common denominator of the populace.

Quoted in C. LINDSTRUM, THE FADING AMERICAN NEWSPAPER 163 (1960). Generally, the absence of price competition (a circumstance obtaining, to some extent, in both publishing and broadcasting) eliminates economic pressure as a means of controlling discriminatory conduct engaged in by the media. See Q. VILLARD, THE DISAPPEARING DAILY at V (1944); J. R. WIGGINS, FREEDOM OF SECRECY 178 (rev. ed 1964); Robinson, The FCC and the First Amendment: Observation on 40 Years of Radio and Television Regulation. 52 MINN. L. REV. 67, 88 (1967).

[2] The press, originally the most significant communications medium, was singled out by the framers of the first amendment as a vehicle of debate to be insulated from governmental restraint. Firstamerica Dev. Corp. v. Daytona Beach News-Journal Corp., 196 So. 2d 97, 99 (Fla. 1966); Barron, Law and the Free Society Lectures, 48 TEX. L. REV. 766, 744 (1970). Radio and television have long been recognized as forms of communication protected by the first amendment. See, e.g., Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367, 386 (1969); United States v. Paramount Pictures, 334 U.S. 131, 166 (1948); cf. Z. CHAFEE, FREE SPEECH IN THE UNITED STATES 545–46 (1941).

[3] See, e.g., Barron, supra note 1, at 1641.

[4] Johnson & Weston, supra note 1, at 633.

[5] The term "state action," and the concept embodied in it, emerged and developed in cases involving the fourteenth amendment. See The Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883). In that context the word "state" referred to political entities like New York, or Louisiana. Here the term "state action" is employed, by analogy, to describe activity by the Federal Government. If the conduct of broadcasters constitutes "state action" in this sense, it is not because their conduct is facilitated by the power of a state (and is subject, therefore, to the prohibitions of the first amendment, through the operation of the fourteenth), but because their conduct is facilitated by federal power (and is subject directly to the first amendment restraint). Commissioner Johnson relies on this analogy by arguing from cases that construe the "state action" requirement in the fourteenth amendment context. See pp. 642–44 infra.

State Action and the Newspapers

In recent cases courts have recognized a constitutional right of access to public forums.[6] The courts have held, essentially, that the managers of public facilities—bus terminals,[7] busses,[8] subways,[9] and high school newspapers[10]—cannot exclude some speakers from their forums, while granting access to others. Once the managers have opened the forums to the public, they cannot close them discriminatively. An operative fact in every case was public ownership of the facility in question, yet in some instances direct control over the contested forum was exercised by a private agency, not the Government itself.[11] Thus the discriminatory conduct was that of a private individual, not an officer of the state. In that event the controlling issue was whether the conduct of the private party (the manager of the forum) betrayed "state action." In each case the fact of public ownership appears to have been critical to the affirmative result.

Elsewhere, individuals have sought to vindicate a right of access to privately owned forums, and in some cases they have met with success. In Marsh v. Alabama[12] and Food Employees Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza,[13] for example, the Supreme Court held that the Constitution secures a right of access to a privately owned facility, like the streets of a company town or the sidewalks of a shopping center, where the facility serves a function of the kind ordinarily served by a governmental entity.

Few private facilities, however, take the place of a governmental entity In Chicago Joint Board, Amalgamated Clothing Workers v. Chicago Tribune,[14] for example, a union submitted a full page editorial advertisement to each of the four general circulation newspapers in Chicago. The ad showed a picket line in front of Marshall Field & Co.'s store and set forth the union's reasons for picketing the company. Each of the newspapers refused to publish the advertisement. The union then sought injunctive relief in the federal district court to compel the newspapers to publish its advertisement. The District Court granted the newspapers' motion for summary judgement on the ground that the newspapers' conduct did not violate the first amendment.[15] On appeal, the Seventh Circuit affirmed. The state involvement in the publication of the newspapers did not constitute "state action." The first amendment did not constrain the publishers to sell advertising space.[16]

Relying on Marsh v. Alabama and Food Employees v. Logan Valley Plaza, the union had argued that a special relationship exists between the state and the newspapers in light of state laws which exempt newspaper employees from jury service; require newspapers to publish legal notices, notices of elections, and municipal ordinances; and grant newspapers certain tax exemptions. The union also cited a Chicago regulation which restricted newsstand sales on public streets to daily newspapers printed and published in Chicago, and the common custom of providing a designated space in public buildings for the use of the press and other news media.[17]

Rejecting this argument, the circuit court concluded that, whatever the relationship between government and the press, newspapers do not serve a "public function" of the kind comtemplated by the Court in Marsh and Logan Valley. The contention that they did was inconsistent with traditional notions about the role of the press in American society. Rather than "exercising delegated powers of a governmental nature, the press has long and consistently been recognized as an independent check on governmental power."[18] Interpreting the public function theory narrowly, the court viewed Marsh and Logan Valley as holding that private property remains unburdened by constitutional obligations unless it becomes a functional equivalent of municipal streets or sidewalks.[19] The court then distinguished the present case on the grounds that (1) the sidewalks and streets of a company town or shopping center are not analogous in function to the advertising pages of a newspaper. and (2) the newspapers do not grant the general public unrestricted access to their advertising pages Rather, the newspapers select their advertisers by contract.[20]

---

[6] For a discussion of recent developments relating to the rights of access to public forums see Barron, An Emerging First Amendment Right of Access to the Media?, 37 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 487 (1969).

[7] Wolin v. Port Authority, 392 F.2d 83 (2d Cir. 1968).

[8] Wirta v. Alameda-Contra Costa Transit Dist., 68 Cal. 2d 51, 434 P.2d 982, 64 Cal. Rptr. 430 (1967).

[9] Kissinger v. New York City Transit Authority, 274 F. Supp. 438 (S.D.N.Y. 1967).

[10] Zucker v. Panitz, 299 F. Supp. 102 (S.D.N.Y. 1969).

[11] See Barron, supra note 6, at 489.

[12] 326 U.S. 501 (1946) (company town's refusal to permit distribution of religious literature on streets held to violate first amendment).

[13] 391 U.S. 308 (1968) (shopping center's refusal to permit picketing on shopping center property held to violate first amendment).

[14] 307 F. Supp. 422 (N.D. Ill. 1969).

[15] Id. at 425–29.

[16] Chicago Joint Board, Amalgamated Clothing Workers v. Chicago Tribune, 435 F.2d 470 (7th Cir. 1970).

[17] Id. at 473.

The union had also relied on Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority.[21] In that case the Supreme Court found state action in the discriminatory conduct of a private restauranteur, who leased space in a publicly owned building and operated his enterprise in furtherance of "public purposes." The circuit court distinguished Burton on the grounds that a publicly owned building sustained the restaurant and that the private business constituted a "physically and financially integral, and indeed, indispensible part of the State's plan to operate the project as a self-sustaining unit."[22]

The court's conclusion that the Burton concept of state action is inapplicable to newspapers seems correct. In Burton the Supreme Court noted that the Parking Authority could have prohibited the discrimination by inserting appropriate conditions in the lease.[23] Since the state's failure to do so contributed to the discrimination by making it possible in the first instance, the discrimination arguably became state supported. Moreover, the state could have withdrawn its support without invading other legitimate interests, i.e., the state could have insisted on appropriate conditions without unduly burdening the lessee. By contrast, in Chicago Joint Board it is arguable whether the state could have required the newspapers to publish the union's advertisement without invading the newspapers' first amendment rights.

A weakness of the circuit court's opinion was its failure to recognize the broad implications of the public function theory.[24] Thus in Marsh the Supreme Court adopted the following language to describe the theory of the public function approach:

> Ownership does not always mean absolute dominion. The more an owner, for his advantage, opens up his property for use by the public in general, the more do his rights become circumscribed by the statutory and constitutional rights of those who use it.[25]

This statement embodies an expansive conception of the constitutional obligations of property owners. Now unquestionably, recognition of a first amendment right of access was peculiarly appropriate in Marsh, given the facts of the case. But the principle stated there is abroad one. Liberally construed, the principle would subject the management of private property to first amendment restraint whenever the property is opened to public use for the owner's advantage. Thus, in Logan Valley the public function rationale extended to the sidewalks of a privately owned shopping center The Court found that the factual differences between the cases did not require a different outcome. It reasoned that a shopping center served the community in the same way as a business block, and, therefore, the owners of the shopping center could not exclude from their sidewalks "those members of the public wishing to exercise their First Amendment rights . . . in a mannner and for a purpose generally consonant with the use to which the property is actually put."[26]

In spite of its breadth, however, the public function theory should not subject newspapers to constitutional demands. Under the better view of Marsh and

---

[18] Id. at 474 (quoting the District Court opinion below, 307 F. Supp. at 427).

[19] Id. at 474–75.

[20] Id. at 475.

[21] 365 U.S 715 (1961).

[22] 435 F.2d at 476.

[23] 365 U.S. at 725.

[24] Professor Barron suggests that these cases represent an awareness by the Court of the growing importance of private facilities in guaranteeing first amendment rights and a willingness to look beyond the issue of private ownership in finding state action. Barron, supra note 6, at 493–94.

[25] 326 U.S. at 506.

[26] 391 U.S. at 319–20.

Logan Valley, private property serves a "public function" only when it is used as public property is used. Thus, while a newspaper "serves" the public in a general sense, it serves no "public function," because no public property is normally used in an equivalent way. In short, the public function theory comprehends only those public services that have counterparts in the service of facilities that are owned by the public. A newspaper is not one of these.[27]

This "public equivalence" analysis is supported by Evans v. Newton.[28] In that case the Supreme Court found state action in the operation of a public park under the direction of private trustees. The Court stated that its finding was > buttressed by the nature of the service rendered to the community by a park. The service rendered even by a private park . . . is municipal in nature. . . . Like the streets of the company town in Marsh v. Alabama . . . the predominant character and purpose of this park [is] municipal [and should] be treated as a public institution . . . regardless of who now has title under state law.[29]

Even though a newspaper is a public institution to the extent that it provides a service to the public, by no stretch of the imagination can its function be considered municipal. The newspaper has no equivalent in the service of ordinary governmental functions.

The public equivalence theory was properly used by the Chicago Joint Board court as a basis for rejecting the union's argument that state action inheres in the conduct of newspaper publishers, because a newspaper "'enjoys monopoly power in an area of vital public concern.'"[30] The union based its argument on a recent case in which a regional educational association responsible for the accreditation of colleges and secondary schools was found to be subject to constitutional restraints in the performance of its accreditation function.[31] The court quite correctly distinguished this case, noting that the regional educational association, unlike the newspapers, acted "in a quasi-governmental capacity by virtue of its role in the distribution of Federal funds under the 'aid to education statutes.'"[32]

Thus Chicago Joint Board was decided on state action grounds. But the union's complaint presented a more fundamental issue. If the court had found that state involvement in the publishing process was sufficiently intimate to bring the first amendment into play, it would have faced the question whether the first amendment compelled the newspapers to sell advertising space. Did that amendment, conceived to protect the press from the coercion of law, burden the press with legal obligations in and of itself? The union insisted that it did. The issue awaits analysis.[33]

State Action in Broadcasting

If there is a distinction of constitutional significance between the newspaper industry and radio and television broadcasting, it is that state involvement in the latter is more pronounced. Broadcasting, unlike publishing, is a regulated industry,[34] a circumstance which in other contexts has supported a finding of state action.[35] Broadcasters, unlike publishers, are licensees of the state. They broadcast over allocated frequencies under a three year license granted by the Federal Communications Commission.[36] Furthermore, the scope of the Commission's control over the licensees is very broad indeed. It comprehends technical matters, like the allocation of broadcast frequencies and the maintenance of technical and financial competence; but it comprehends policy matters as well. In insuring that licensees operate in the public interest, the FCC exercises a limited power of review over the content of broadcast materials.[37]

---

[27] While the critique of the public function analysis is developed here by reference to newspaper publishing, it applies with equal force where broadcasting is concerned. Commissioner Johnson argues that broadcasters serve a "public function" under the Marsh rationale. Johnson & Westen, supra note 1, at 591. But broadcasting is not a public function in the narrow sense urged here. Broadcasting has no functional equivalent in services rendered by publicly owned facilities, see pp. 650–53 infra.

[28] 382 U.S. 296 (1966). In Evans a state court permitted a municipality to transfer its control over a public park to private trustees who denied Negroes access to the facility. The Supreme Court barred the discrimination. The park had been placed in trust for use by "the white race only," under the terms of Senator Bacon's will.

[29] 382 U.S. at 301–02.

[30] Chicago Joint Board, Amalgamated Clothing Workers v. Chicago Tribune, 435 F.2d at 477.

[31] Marjorie Webster Junior College, Inc. v. Middle States Ass'n of Colleges & Secondary Schools, 302 F. Supp. 459 (D.D.C. 1969), rev'd on other grounds, 432 F.2d 650 (D.C. Cir. 1970).

[32] Chicago Joint Board, Amalgamated Clothing Workers v. Chicago Tribune, 435 F.2d at 476.

[33] See discussion of constitutional right of access at p. 650 infra.

[34] Communications Act of 1934, 47 U.S.C. §§ 301–609, as amended, (Supp. V, 1970). For a background on the problems raised by governmental regulation of the mass media, see Z. CHAFEE, GOVERNMENT AND MASS COMMUNICATIONS (1947); Kalven, Broadcasting, Public Policy and the First Amendment, 10 J. LAW & ECON. 15 (1967); Marks, Broadcasting and Censorship: First Amendment Theory after Red Lion, 38 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 974 (1970); Robinson, The F.C.C. and the First Amendment: Observations on 40 Years of Radio and Television Regulation, 52 MINN. L. REV. 67 (1967).

Any attempt to find state action in broadcasting, however, would be paradoxical. Each element in the regulatory scheme is carefully designed to assure that governmental intervention will not invade the first amendment rights of the broadcasters or destroy the essentially private nature of the media.[38] To treat this limited and necessary state involvement as a predicate for a far broader, constitutionally imposed scheme of limitations on first amendment rights would be bootstrapping at its worst. More importantly, this approach would ignore the basic and desirable antagonism between the Government and the broadcaster. In short, the fact that the broadcaster exercises governmental power in a fiduciary capacity must not obscure his role, within the framework of the first amendment, as a speaker whose basic interests are directly, fundamentally opposed to those of the government, in its role as the potentially most dangerous censor.[39]

In his article Commissioner Johnson relies on Public Utilities Comm'n v. Pollak[40] to support the contention that the conduct of broadcasters constitutes state action. In Pollak the Court found state action in the conduct of a privately owned bus company, a public utility under "the regulatory supervision of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia."[41] Since the broadcast industry is also under the supervision of a regulatory agency, Commissioner Johnson argues that its actions constitute state action as well. This argument is contradicted by judicial decision. In McIntire v. Wm. Penn Broadcasting Co. Reverend Carl McIntire sued a radio station for violating his first amendment right by refusing to broadcast his religious programs.[42] The court held that, although a radio station is a public trustee under the Communications Act of 1934, it "is not a public utility in the sense that it must permit broadcasting by whoever comes to its microphones."[43] Moreover, the court held that broadcasters cannot be regarded as instrumentalities of government for he purpose of establishing state action. This result is consistent with the holding in Chicago Joint Board and with the "public function" analysis advanced above. Broadcasting serves the public, but it does not (indeed, it must not) serve a function analogous to that served by governmental entities or, for that matter, by public utilities. The fact of its service alone must not be regarded as a predicate for the imposition of constitutional restraints.

---

[35] In Public Utilities Comm'n v. Pollak, 343 U.S. 451 (1952), the Court held that a privately owned bus company was to be treated for constitutional purposes as a governmental entity, relying on the fact that the bus company "operate[d] . . . under the regulatory supervision of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia which is an agency authorized by Congress." Id. at 462. Cf. American Communications Ass'n v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382 (1950).

[36] 47 U.S.C. §§ 307, 309 (1964).

[37] The statutory source of regulation of program content is the "public interest" standard of 47 U.S.C. § 309(a) (1964). The Commission requires each broadcaster to cover controversial issues of public importance in a fair manner, presenting opposing viewpoints on each issue under the fairness doctrine announced in 1949. Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 F.C.C. 1246 (1949). Congress implicitly approved the doctrine in amending the equal time for political candidates requirement of § 315 by stating that its action constituted no exception "from the obligation imposed upon [the broadcasters] under this Act to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance." Act of September 14, 1959, § 1, 73 Stat. 557, amending 47 U.S.C. § 315(a) (1964). The Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the fairness doctrine as well as the personal attack and political editorial doctrines, 47 C.F.R. §§ 73.123, 73.300, 73.598, 73.679 (1970), in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

[38] Radio and television broadcasts have long been recognized as forms of communication protected by the first amendment. See Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367, 386 (1969); United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 334 U.S. 131, 166 (1948). In addition, section 326 of the Communications Act of 1934, 47 U.S.C § 326 (1964) prohibits censorship by the FCC. In enforcing the fairness doctrine the FCC has assumed that it lacks authority to require licensees to broadcast specific programs. Cf. Note, Regulation of Program Content by the FCC, 77 Harv. L. Rev. 701, 709 (1964). In fact, "no licensee has ever been disciplined for failure to perform his duties under the fairness doctrine." Marks, Broadcasting and Censorship: First Amendment Theory After Red Lion, 38 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 974, 976 (1970). See also Renewal of Licenses, 9 P.R.F. Radio Reg. 2d 687 (1967); Renewal of Licenses, 10 P.F.R. Radio Reg. 2d 944 (1967); Commercial Practices of Broadcast Licensees, 2 P.S.F. Radio Reg. 2d 885 (1964) (dissent of Chairman Henry, joined by Commissioner Cox); Singer, The FCC and Equal Time: Never-Neverland Revisited, 27 Md. L. Rev. 221, 248 (1967).

[39] Marks, supra note 38, at 993 n.89. The opposite view is expressed by Commissioner Johnson in Johnson & Westen, supra note 1, at 604. See Barron, In Defense of "Fairness": A First Amendment Rationale for Broadcasting's "Fairness" Doctrine, 37 U. Colo. L. Rev. 31 (1964).

[40] 343 U.S. at 451 (1952). See Johnson & Westen, supra note 1, at 592.

[41] 343 U.S. at 462.

State Action and the Courts

Commissioner Johnson urges that state action may be found in the judicial or administrative resolution of controversies that arise between broadcasters and individuals who have been denied access to the media.[44] As authority for this proposition he cites Shelley v. Kraemer.[45] In that case the Supreme Court held that judicial enforcement of private restrictive covenants against Negroes was state action in itself and, as such, was violative of the equal protection clause. But courts and commentators disagree over the implications of Shelley, and the nature and extent of the judicial involvement necessary to constitute state action is unclear.[46] Construing the Shelley rationale narrowly, some commentators accept Justice Black's view that the doctrine applies only in cases like Shelley, where the court refuses to disrupt a transaction between a willing purchaser and a willing seller by enforcing a prior agreement between the seller and a third party.[47] On the other hand, some commentators argue that state action exists wherever the state determines the legal relations of its citizens, and that in such a case the role of the court is to balance the conflicting constitutional rights involved.[48]

According to FCC Commissioner Johnson,[49] the resolution of a right-of-access controversy under the balancing theory must involve a weighing of the plaintiff's right to free speech against the rights of the defendant, who has denied him a forum.[50] Commissioner Johnson notes the analysis adopted in Marsh. There the Court balance[d] the Constitutional rights of owners of private property against those of the people to enjoy freedom of press and religion, . . . [recognizing] that the latter occupy a preferred positions.[51]

---

[42] 151 F.2d 597 (3d Cir. 1945).

[43] Id. at 601.

[44] See Johnson & Westen, supra note 1, at 595.

[45] 334 U.S. 1 (1948).

[46] Shelley has been called "constitutional law's Finnegan's Wake." Kurland, Foreword: "Equal in Origin and Equal in Title to the Legislative and Executive Branches of the Government," 78 Harv. L. Rev. 143, 148 (1964). See, e.g., Henkin, Shelley v. Kraemer: Notes for a Revised Opinion, 110 U. Pa. L. Rev. 473 (1962); Lewis, The Meaning of State Action, 60 Colum. L. Rev. 1083, 1108–20 (1960); Pollak, Racial Discrimination and Judicial Integrity: A Reply to Professor Wechsler, 108 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1 (1959). Shelley has also been subject to severe criticism. Wechsler, Toward Neutral Principles of Constitutional Law, 73 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 29 (1959).

[47] Bell v. Maryland, 378 U.S. 226, 331 (1964) (Black, J., dissenting). Apparently this is also the view of Mr. Pollak. "The line sought to be drawn is that beyond which the state assists a private person in seeing to it that others behave in a fashion which the state could not itself have ordained." Pollak, supra note 46, at 13.

[48] The inquiry is "whether the particular state action in the particular circumstances, determining legal relations between private persons, is constitutional when tested against the various federal constitutional restrictions on state action." Horowitz, The Misleading Search for "State Action" Under the Fourteenth Amendment, 30 So. Cal. L. Rev. 208, 209 (1957). Mr. Henkin takes the view that the state is responsible whenever its courts enforce private discrimination. Limitations on the applicability of the doctrine come from a more restrictive definition of equal protection. He suggests that there exists countervailing rights of liberty and privacy, including a protected right to discriminate preferred by the constitution over the victim's claim to equality. This right the state may constitutionally be permitted to support. Henkin, supra note 46, at 487–88.

[49] Johnson & Westen supra note 1, at 596, 597.

[50] The victim's right to equality must be balanced against the discriminator's countervailing rights to liberty and privacy. In a first amendment context the individual's right of free speech is balanced against the countervailing rights of free speech and the rights of private property.

[51] 326 U.S. at 509.

Commissioner Johnson views Marsh as standing for the proposition that whenever the state determines the legal relations of its citizens, "if it would be unreasonable to prefer [a particular person's] . . . interest[s] [over another's], it would also be unconstitutional."[52] It would seem, however, that the Marsh approach is inappropriate in this context. There are two reasons for this. First, in that case state action inhered, not in the court's resolution of a private controversy, but in the conduct of a private owner, whose facility served a "public function." Second, in Marsh the asserted rights in conflict were, on the one hand, the preferred right of the Jehovah's Witnesses to distribute religious literature[53] and, on the other, the non-preferred right of the owner to regulate access to sidewalks open to public use. Thus the adoption of a "balancing" analysis produced, in Marsh, a happy and a comprehensible result: weighed against the non-preferred right, the preferred right prevailed. In the context of broadcasting, however, two preferred rights collide: the first amendment right of those who seek access to the media, and the first amendment right of the broadcasters themselves. It may be doubted whether a balancing analysis is helpful where the "weights" involved are so nearly equal.

Commisioner Johnson also relies on New York Times Co. v. Sullivan[54] to establish the proposition that judicial denial of a right of access constitutes state action. In Sullivan the Court held that the state courts of Alabama could not apply the common law of libel in a suit between private parties, when application would infringe first amendment rights. While Sullivan did not hold that state action inheres in every adjudication of legal rights, the case did significantly expand the circumstances in which judicial resolution of a private dispute will constitute state action. The case suggests, as Shelley certainly does, that the Court will likely adopt an expansive view of state action when a restrictive approach would jeopardize an interest otherwise subject to constitutional protection.

But Sullivan does not suggest that the concept of state action is flexible enough to comprehend the variety of official conduct contemplated by Commissioner Johnson. When a court or agency refuses to recognize a right of access to a broadcast facility, it acquiesces in the conduct of the broadcaster. If that conduct is discriminatory, the court acquiesces in private discrimination. Mere acquiescence, however, may not qualify as state action. An affirmative exercise of state power enforcing or compelling private discrimination seems to be required. As the Court said in Sullivan: "[t]he test is not the form in which state power has been applied but, whatever the form, whether such power has in fact been exercised."[55] This interpretation of the state action requirement receives substantial support from the decision in Adickes v. S. H. Kress & Co., where the Court held that state power must compel private discrimination before discriminatory state action appears.[56] In many ways this is a sound result. If state action were found in any adjudication where a court "acquiesced" in private discrimination, state action would inhere in virtually every judicial determination of private rights; and few private discriminations would be immune from constitutional prohibition. In that event, those constitutional safeguards that now protect the liberty of the individual from the encroachments of government would operate against the individual himself, with a consequent loss of the liberty the safeguards were designed to protect.

Should the Court accept the argument that state action inheres in a judicial denial of access to the media, it would then confront the difficult task of balancing an asserted right of access against the freedom of the press. The result would depend on the Court's view of the service now rendered by the mass media, assessed in light of the policy underlying the first amendment—the maintenance of free and open debate. If the Court accepts the argument that the concentration of private power over the media now operates to restrict the spectrum of views presented to the public, then the Court might conclude that the right of the press to operate free from restraint is subject to a private right of access. But the persistence of what Professor Barron has called the "romantic view" of the press cannot be underestimated.[57] It would be difficult for the Court to accept the notion that the free press is no longer a fundamental element of American democracy, but is, rather, a threat to its existence. And it is possible that the sheer difficulty of balancing the rights involved would precipitate at the threshold an adverse decision on the state action issue.

---

[52] Johnson & Westen supra note 1, at 596 (quoting Edwards v. Habib, 397 F.2d 687, 695 (D.C. Cir. 1968).

[53] 326 U.S. at 509.

[54] 376 U.S. 254 (1964).

[55] 376 U.S. at 265 (emphasis added).

[56] 398 U.S. 144, 170 (1970).

The Public Domain Theory of State Action

In a recent FCC decision Commissioner Johnson suggests that because broadcast frequencies are "public property," any action taken by the broadcast licensee is state action.[58] To establish the premise that broadcast frequencies are public property, Commissioner Johnson relies on language in United Church of Christ v. FCC,[59] where Judge, now Chief Justice, Burger said: "[a] broadcaster seeks and is granted the free and exclusive use of a limited and valuable part of the public domain; when he accepts that franchise it is burdened by enforceable public obligations." [60] Now if, as the Commissioner contends, the electromagnetic spectrum is part of the public domain, the question here is little different from the question involved in Burton, where the Court found state action in the conduct of a lessee of public property. The licensee's use of the broadcast frequencies is analogous to the lessee's use of the building owned by the Wilmington Parking Authority, and the character of the state involvement in the two cases must be the same. State action inheres in both. But to quote Professor Moore: "There are two things wrong with this argument, its premise and its conclusion." [61]

First of all, it is misleading to characterize the broadcast frequencies as "public property." Modern commentators define ownership in terms of the owner's power to elicit the aid of the state in excluding others from the use or enjoyment of the property in question.[62] But this right to exclude is rarely absolute. The seventeenth century notion of absolute dominion has given way, and today we freely recognize the diverse public obligations attendent upon ownership. Thus the owner of real estate is subject to zoning regulations,[63] the automobile owner is subject to licensing and safety regulations,[64] and the farmer is subject to certain health and output regulations,[65] But it does not follow from the fact of regulation that real estate, automobiles, and farms are "public property." Likewise, it does not follow, as Judge Burger and Commissioner Johnson appear to argue, that the public "owns" the broadcast frequencies simply because Congress has chosen to regulate their use.[66]

But has Congress appropriated the broadcast frequencies for public use, as, in other contexts, it has appropriated real property for the same purpose? Commissioner Johnson argues that Congress has done just that by specifying in section 301 of the Communications Act that licensees do not have an ownership interest in the broadcast frequencies.[67] He contends that if the licensees do not "own" the frequencies, the public must. But the effort to describe the impact of the Act in terms of public ownership obscures the original legislative purpose. Congress passed the Communications Act to regulate the broadcast frequencies, because, potentially, there are more broadcasters than frequencies.[68] Thus the regulatory scheme limits the number of licenses granted and, quite properly, attaches conditions—in the form of public obligations—to licensure.[69] But the traditional justification for this derives from the scarcity of broadcast frequencies, not from the fact of public ownership, and the power to regulate derives from Congress' well-established power to regulate commerce among the several states.[70] Further, the nature and extent of these obligations are severely limited by constitutional and statutory provisions.[71] Finally, to the extent that the "ownership" issue is controlled by congressional intent, evidence indicates that Congress intended to subordinate the public interest in the broadcast frequencies to that of the private user. Thus, while Congress has exempted government-owned stations from the licensing procedure of the FCC, it has subordinated them to privately owned stations by requiring that they "conform to such rules and regulations designed to prevent interference with other radio stations and the rights of others as the Commission may prescribe." [72] If Congress had appropriated the frequencies for the public use, it is not at all clear why it would then have given priority to private users.

---

[57] Barron, supra note 1, at 1642.

[58] In re Business Executives Move for Vietnam Peace, 25 F.C.C.2d 242, 254–55 (1970).

[59] 359 F.2d 994 (D.C. Cir. 1966).

[60] Id. at 1003.

[61] Speech by J. N. Moore, Virginia Law School, Dec. 8, 1970.

[62] See, e.g., Cohen, Property and Sovereignty, 13 CORNELL L.Q. 8 (1927).

[63] Village of Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., 272 U.S. 365 (1926).

[64] Kane v. New Jersey, 242 U.S. 160 (1916).

[65] See, e.g., Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111 (1942).

[66] 47 U.S.C. §§ 151–609 (1964).

[67] Johnson & Westen supra note 1, at 589.

[68] National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 213 (1943); F.R.C. v. Nelson Bros. Bond & Mortgage Co., 289 U.S. 266, 279 (1933). For general background on the problems posed by the technology of the mass media see Z. CHAFEE, GOVERNMENT AND MASS COMMUNICATIONS (1947).

[69] National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190 (1943).

Even if the broadcast frequencies are public property in some sense, Commissioner Johnson's reliance on Burton appears to be misplaced. Burton does not stand for the broad proposition that the conduct of all lessees of public property constitutes state action. Rather, in Burton the operative fact was that the state had neglected to insert a nondiscriminatory clause into its lease, in contravention of a well-established policy requiring governmental encouragement of nondiscriminatory treatment of Blacks. In the words of Justice Clark: "By its inaction, the Authority, and through it the State, has not only made itself a party to the refusal of service, but has elected to place its power, property and prestige behind the admitted discrimination." [73] Thus in a sense, the state action issue was the only real issue in the case. If indeed the contested conduct was state action, there was no doubt about its unconstitutional character. By contrast, there is no well-established governmental policy of providing for individual access to the privately owned broadcast facilities. The very heart of the present controversy is whether such a right exists.[74] And until a court, the FCC, or Congress decides that there is a right of access, it simply cannot be said that the state has a duty to act in the sense required by Burton.

Finally, the public domain theory, as described by Commissioner Johnson, proves too much. If one assumes that the broadcast frequencies are public property and that private use of broadcast frequencies is state action, it is difficult to discern factors that would limit the theory's general application. Would any private use of any public property be state action as well? Arguably, if the Commissioner's principles were the law, the private user of public streets or the private speaker employing the air itself (a part of the public domain) to communicate his speech to others, would be subject to the constitutional restraints that now restrict the exercise of state power.

TWO POSSIBILITIES FOR A RIGHT OF ACCESS

A Constitutional Right of Access

If the conduct of broadcasters or publishers does in fact satisfy the state action requirement, the remaining question is whether a substantive right of access actually exists. To answer the question the first task is to determine whether the cases discussed above which have posited a right of access to "public facilities" are applicable.[75] Are radio and television stations "public facilities?" Sound considerations suggest that they are not. The forum provided by the privately owned media is qualitatively different from the forum provided by public facilities in this sense. The essence of a free press is independence. The private media must have unrestricted freedom to challenge the government's policies and propaganda in the marketplace of ideas. Commissioner

---

[70] 47 U.S.C. § 151 (1964).

[71] Id. at § 326. See Lafayette Radio Electronics Corp. v. United States, 345 F.2d 278 (2d Cir. 1965) (§ 326 should be read with § 303 in determining the extent of the Commission's power).

[72] 47 U.S.C. § 305 (1964). Cf. L. B. Wilson, Inc. v. FCC, 170 F.2d 793 (D.C. Cir. 1948) where the court said:

> That private as well as public interests are recognized by the Act is not to be doubted. While a station license does not under the Act confer an unlimited or indefeasible property right . . . nevertheless the right under a license for a definite term to conduct a broadcasting business requiring—as it does—substantial investment is more than a mere privilege or gratuity.

Id. at 798. See also FCC v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134 (1940) (Communications Act protects the private as well as the public interest).

[73] 365 U.S. 715, 725 (1961).

[74] See text p. 653 infra

[75] See text at notes 6–11 supra.

Johnson compares the broadcaster to the gate keeper of a public park, contending that their functions and obligations are the same.[76] But the analogy does not work. The broadcaster is not merely a custodian, he is an advocate. It is true that the broadcaster must present representative community views as well as his own,[77] but in this respect he is more like a public defender than a custodian of a public forum. The government has effective advocates of its own,[78] and the broadcaster must act as an adversary by presenting contrary points of view. Thus the broadcaster plays a dual role: just as the public defender opposes the government in a court of law, the broadcaster opposes the government in the marketplace of ideas; just as the public defender has duties as an officer of the court, the broadcaster has a fiduciary duty to the public to present representative community views. The question, then, is whether this dual role requires the broadcaster to sell broadcast time.

Professor Barron has addressed this problem and has recognized that the first amendment protects competing interests: the public interest in the free flow of ideas and the public interest in the right of the media to be free from government control.[79] He argues for a constitutional right of access by constructing the following syllogism: access to the media is necessary to accomplish the first amendment policy of encouraging "the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources";[80] the media's freedom to restrict access can be curtailed without impinging on the constitutionally protected freedom of media content;[81] hence, the courts should recognize a constitutional right of access.

Although judicial recognition of a right of access would be consistent with the underlying policies of the first amendment, it does not follow that recognition is constitutionally compelled. A distinction must be drawn between the obligations Congress has power to impose, and the obligations imposed by the Constitution itself. In Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, for example, the Court held that the first amendment does not preclude congressional regulation designed to assure some individuals a right of access in some cases.[82] The Court did not hold, however, that the Constitution itself guarantees a right of access; nor has any other court so held.[83]

From a policy standpoint this approach is apropriate. The difficult task of striking the proper balance between the broadcaster's liberty and the individual's right to use broadcast facilities requires a judicious division of labor between the courts and the legislative branch. Recognition of a right of access would necessarily work substantial changes throughout the broadcast system, changes the courts have little capacity to evaluate. This means that the courts should defer to the superior expertise, fact-finding, and policy-making ability of Congress and the administrative agencies.

One of the changes wrought by legislative or judicial recognition of a right of access would be increased governmental regulation of the content of speech communicated over the media. Effective recognition of a right of access cannot be accomplished by granting unlimited access to all who desire it. Indeed, this would be technically impossible: "what is essential is not that everyone shall speak, but that everything worth saying shall be said. . . ."[84] But what is "worth saying"? Given the diversity of the speech not being heard at a given moment, how is government to determine what speech merits publicity? Professor Barron himself admits that there are many problems here:

> What is a minority point of view? When and where shall such opinions be heard? Has some significant space already been given to the particular controversy? Must every issue of the publication contain a reference to a particular controversy? Isn't it possible to reach saturation of a given subject? When is the decision not to publish on a particular issue a "news" decision and when is

---

[76] Johnson & Westen supra note 1, at 583.

[77] See text at note 97 infra.

[78] In addition to the coverage given to public officials as a matter of course, the Government often has its own mechanisms for disseminating information. An interesting and controversial case study of this phenomenon, The Selling of the Pentagon, was a television documentary presented by C.B.S. on February 23, 1971.

[79] Barron, supra note 1, at 1641, 1656.

[80] Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 20 (1945).

[81] Barron supra note 1 at 1651.

[82] 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

[83] Barron supra note 1, at 1667–69.

[84] A. MEIKELJOHN, POLITICAL FREEDOM: THE CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS OF THE PEOPLE 26 (1960).

it a decision based upon an effort to obstruct the opinion process? Surely resolving these problems is no less baffling than deciding when a book is "without redeeming social importance" or when it is marketed against a 'background of commercial exploitation."[85]

Thus it is apparent that recognition of a right of access would engender content-oriented regulation of speech, under standards difficult to administer. At what point would such regulation become unconstitutional? Would it be possible for Congress to expand the existing statutory right of access, recognized in Red Lion, without infringing first amendment rights?

As the court in Chicago Joint Board pointed out, the American concept of the free press is grounded on the assumption that governmental control over the media should be limited, lest the antagonistic roles of the government and the press be upset.[86] Until now, courts have ignored the right of access problem and have tipped the scales in favor of the media's right to be free from government control. If the pendulum should swing the other way, it should do so only after a regulatory scheme has been devised which carefully preserves the traditional role of the media as an "'independent check on governmental power.'"[87] Congress has conceded power to regulate the broadcast media. Arguably, it has power to expand the limited right of access now secured by the personal attack and fairness doctrines. But, if Congress exercises this power, the courts should, as they have in the past, adopt a strict standard in reviewing the legislation. Any other approach would, in effect, allow Congress to sit in judgment over its own case. In the continuing and desirable controversy between the broadcasters and the Government, the courts, not Congress, should mediate.

Do the facts of the present case demand that the courts assume a more active role than the one suggested above? An enduring justification for judicial activism is legislative inaction.[88] If, under ordinary circumstances, a proper regard for legislative power compels the courts to await legislative initiatives, the courts may take the initiative when the legislature does not.[89] But in the area of broadcasting there is no history of legislative inaction. In fact, Congress and the FCC have been active in dealing with the specific problem of access to the media. In 1949, the FCC used its broad powers under the public interest standard of the Communications Act of 1934 to create the fairness and equal time doctrines,[90] and Congress codified these doctrines in its 1959 amendments to the Act.[91] Moreover, in Red Lion the Court indicated its approval of the broadcaster's performance under the regulatory scheme designed by Congress and the FCC: "The communications industry, and in particular the networks, have taken pains to present controversial issues in the past, and even now they do not assert that they intend to abandon their efforts in this regard."[92]

A Statutory Right of Access

If there is no constitutional right of access, the remaining question is whether Congress has created one. With respect to the electronic media the relevant legislation is the Communications Act of 1934. In two recent decisions, In re Democratic National Committee (DNC)[93] and In re Business Executives Move for Vietnam Peace (BEM),[94] the FCC ruled that there is no general right of access granted by the Act. The Commission held that any right of access under the Act is limited to the equal time and fairness doctrines, and absent the special circumstances which bring those doctrines into play, the broadcasters have complete discretion to deny access. Commissioner Johnson dissented to both decisions,[95] arguing that a right of access was created by the Act.[96]

---

[85] Barron, supra note 6, at 496.

[86] See text at note 18 supra.

[87] Chicago Joint Board, Amalgamated Clothing Workers v. Chicago Tribune Co., 435 F.2d 470, 474 (7th Cir. 1970).

[88] See Cox, Foreward: Constitutional Adjudication and the Promotion of Human Rights, 80 HARV. L. REV. 91 (1966).

[89] See Muskopf v. Corning Hospital Dist., 55 Cal.2d 211, 359 P.2d 457, 11 Cal. Rptr. 89 (Sup. Cr. 1961).

[90] Report of the Commission on Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 F.C.C. 1246 (1949).

[91] 47 U.S.C. § 315(a) 1964).

[92] 395 U.S. at 393.

[93] 25 F.C.C.2d 216 (1970).

[94] 25 F.C.C.2d 242 (1970).

[95] 25 F.C.C.2d at 230; 25 F.C.C.2d at 249.

[96] He also made several constitutional arguments which have been partially dealt with in the previous sections of this Note and which appear elsewhere in this issue. Johnson & Westen, supra note 1.

In DNC the Committee sought a declaratory ruling on the question whether the CBS television network had violated the public interest standard of the Act by refusing to sell prime time to the Committee for an issue oriented program.[97] The Commission found that CBS was substantially fulfilling its obligations under the public interest standard by presenting "representative community views and voices on controversial issues which are of importance to . . . [its] . . . listeners,"[98] and that the public interest standard does not entail a right of access "over and beyond the fairness doctrine right of the public to be informed."[99] The majority argued that the language of section 3(h) of the Act—providing expressly that a broadcast license is not to be regarded as a common carrier—[100] implies that a broadcaster does not have to grant access to all who request it. Rather, the broadcaster satisfies his statutory obligations by presenting representative community views. In this respect, recognition of a right of access would be contrary to the express provisions of the Act. The majority pointed out the danger that a new right of access, together with the established fairness doctrine, would defeat the policy of the first amendment by allowing wealthy and powerful groups to monopolize the issue coverage. Finally, the majority asserted that promotion of FM radio, UHF television, and cable television would be a much better way to increase the total coverage of issues.

In BEM an organization of business executives filed a complaint against a Washington, D.C. television station for refusing to sell time for one-minute announcements urging immediate withdrawal of American troops from Vietnam. The majority, rejecting BEM's argument that this denial of access violated the fairness doctrine, found that the broadcaster had fulfilled its duties under the fairness doctrine by presenting representative community views on controversial topics. At the core of the majority opinion was the principle that > [n]o particular person or group is entitled to appear on the station, since it is the right of the public to be informed which the fairness doctrine is designed to assure, rather than the right of any individual or group to present personal views.[101]

In sum, the majority held that a right of access is not required by the fairness doctrine or by the underlying public interest standard and that a right of access is probably prohibited by section 3(h) of the Act.

Commissioner Johnson differs with the majority on two fundamental points. First, he disagrees with the finding that the media's treatment of public issues is thorough enough to conform to the public interest standard. He argues that it is not in the public interest for broadcasters to deny political ideas access to the marketplace, while granting instant access to the purveyors of "toothpaste or 'feminine deodorant spray.'"[102] Second, he asserts that the majority's interpretation of the Act as prohibiting a right of access is erroneous. Section 3(h) of the Act, according to Commissioner Johnson, does not give the broadcaster complete discretion to deny access; rather, its only purpose is to exempt the broadcast industry from the common carrier provisions in Title II of the Act.[103] Furthermore, he argues, recognition of a limited right of access would be consistent with prior FCC rulings which were not held to violate section 3(h) of the Act.[104] Finally, Commissioner Johnson proposes an access-for-purchase plan which would require licensees to sell up to five percent of their prime evening time for political programming on a first-come first-served basis.[105]

---

[97] A similar request to buy time was granted by NBC. It was not clear whether NBC had been approached. ABC issued a statement, however, that it would make an exception to its general rule of not selling time for controversial issue programs when major political parties made such requests. DNC also requested time to solicit funds for the party. NBC and ABC said they would sell time for advertisements soliciting funds: CBS initially rejected the request but subsequently revised its policy to permit spot announcements for solicitation. The Commission stated its approval of the ABC policy allowing spot announcements for solicitation "on a reasonable basis."

[98] 25 F.C.C.2d at 222.

[99] Id. at 223.

[100] 47 U.S.C. § 153(h) (1964) provides:

> "Common carrier" or "carrier" means any person engaged as a common carrier for hire, in interstate or foreign communication by wire or radio or in interstate or foreign radio transmission of energy, except where reference is made to common carriers not subject to this chapter; but a person engaged in radio broadcasting shall not, insofar as such person is so engaged, be deemed a common carrier.

[101] 25 F.C.C.2d at 244.

[102] Id. at 233.

[103] 47 U.S.C. §§ 201–22 (1964).

While the views of both sides are based on reasonable interpretations of the Act, both the majority and minority overstate their cases. In all probability, the Communications Act neither prohibits nor requires a right of access. The broad public interest standard appears to give the Commission the power to further the policies of the Act by whatever means it deems appropriate. The fact is that the Commission has not chosen to adopt the means advocated by Commissioner Johnson. The Commission has interpreted the public interest standard as requiring that broadcasters present representative community views on controversial issues, and the Commission has found that broadcasters are adequately performing that function. While this may or may not be the best or wisest approach, its propriety is clear; and, in accordance with the principle first established in National Broadcasting Co. v. United States,[106] courts should defer to the Commission's interpretation of its statutory mandate, inquiring only whether its decision in a given case is supported by substantial evidence.[107] In sum, the FCC has acted within its power in denying a right of access; and until Congress or the FCC decides differently, Commissioner Johnson's access-for-purchase proposal remains without authoritative support.

J. A. R.

[Reprinted by permission. The Minnesota Law Review Vol. 52:67, 1967]

THE FCC AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT: OBSERVATIONS ON 40 YEARS OF RADIO AND TELEVISION REGULATION

By Glen O. Robinson*

INTRODUCTION

Congress created the first system of regulation of radio and television with its enactment of the Radio Act of 1927.[1] Although considered a drastic measure at that time,[2] today, some forty years after its creation, comprehensive regulation of radio and television communications has for the most part become an accepted phenomenon. Although regulatory policy has yet to mature completely, the essential features of the policy have been outlined. With this coming of age, it seems appropriate to reflect on an aspect of radio regulation which has been of critical importance from the earliest time: the first amendment implications of the various facets of radio and television regulation.

Virtually everyone accepts the proposition that the first amendment does apply to radio and television. Whatever doubts might once have existed about the applicability of the first amendment to mass communications media were dispelled in United States v. Paramount Pictures[3] where the Supreme Court stated that it had "no doubt" that radio, newspapers, and moving pictures were covered by the first amendment. Even the Federal Communications Commission, which has never shown itself to be keenly aware of the finer points of constitutional limitations, has recognized the applicability of the first amendment as at least some kind of general curb on its regulatory actions which are intended to limit or to aid free speech.[4]

---

[104] Commissioner Johnson relies heavily on the following language from United Broadcasting Co. (WHKC), 10 F.C.C. 515 (1945), to support this point.

> Under section 3(h) of the act, broadcast stations are expressly declared not to be common carriers. These facts, however, in no way impinge upon the duty of each station licensee to be sensitive to the problems of public concern in the community and to make sufficient time available, on a nondiscriminatory basis, for full discussion thereof, without any type of censorship which would undertake to impose the views of the licensee upon the material to be broadcast.

Id. 517–18. This case seems to destroy the majority's argument that a right of access would violate § 3(h), but WHKC cannot be used as authority for the proposition that there is a right of access granted by the Act, because it involved policies which had been voluntarily adopted by the station.

[105] 25 F.C.C.2d at 235.

[106] 319 U.S. 190 (1943).

[107] Id. at 224.

* Associate Professor of Law, University of Minnesota.

[1] 47 U.S.C. §§ 81–83 (1964).

[2] See J. HERRING & G. GROSS, TELECOMMUNICATIONS, ECONOMICS AND REGULATION 226 (1936).

[3] 334 U.S. 131, 166 (1948). See also American Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 110 F. Supp. 374, 389 (S.D.N.Y. 1953), aff'd, 347 U.S. 284 (1954).

Despite this agreement on its general applicability, there continues to be very considerable doubt on the part of many, including the FCC, whether the first amendment really has the same scope in the field of radio and television as it does in the case of other communications media. This doubt is founded on the persistent and widely held, but almost never critically analyzed, assumption that broadcasting is somehow different or unique.

For example, one of the assumed unique characteristics of radio and television is the fact that for technical and economic reasons access to these communications media is limited. Since only a few thousand persons can use the airwaves, it follows that some form of regulation is essential. Many assume that this regulation must include some form of regulation of programming in order to compensate for the supposed monopoly power given to the fortunate few who obtain licenses to use the airwaves. When viewed in this light, there are relatively few outside the industry who are very much concerned about FCC regulation of program operations, even where it represents an intrusion which would be bitterly attacked outside the field of radio and television. So long as the broadcast licensee is regarded as a monopolist who, were it not for regulation, would be able to run free, it is he who is portrayed as the censor and not the Commission. Indeed, the Commission can pass itself off as the champion of free speech, dedicated to ensuring that the licensee gives the fullest expression to all possible viewpoints and addresses itself to all possible tastes. There is no doubt that the Commission is aided in playing this role by dissatisfaction with the average quality of programming, particularly among intellectuals who would be most likely to express concern about infringements on free speech. The Commission's repeated exhortations to broadcasters to upgrade the quality of programming and its efforts to encourage, cajole, or even coerce broadcasters to present better programming "in the public interest," add to the pattern. When the Commission is joined by the newspapers and the irrepressible complaints of the public, it is not surprising that the broadcaster attracts little sympathy.

There is more than a little discrimination and a very noticeable absence of critical judgment in this treatment of broadcasting. Most of those who rail against the poor quality of television programming fare have never given a second thought to the equally poor quality of the newspapers, magazines, and books which flood the newsstands and bookstalls. Those who are disturbed that there are only three television stations in their city, or only three television networks, are not generally as disturbed over the fact that there are only one, or perhaps two, daily newspapers in the same city, and at most a handful of weekly news magazines. These same people are probably not at all disturbed that there are only two major political parties.

But despite first appearances this Article is not intended as an apology for the cause of broadcasters. It is, rather, an attempt to discuss comprehensively the constitutional limits on governmental regulation of radio and television under the first amendment. It is important to emphasize at the outset that the primary concern of this Article is not with the entire scope of the first amendment with regard to mass communications media of all kinds. The principal aims here are to focus on those restraints on radio and television which are clearly extraordinary, to point out those restraints which, though they may appear to be of great moment, clearly are not extraordinary or are not, in any event, unique to radio and television, and to evaluate the first amendment implications of such restraints.

I. REGULATION OF ENTRY AND CONTROL OF ECONOMIC CONCENTRATION

A. The allocations and licensing scheme

It is impossible to present a full history and description of the complex system of allocations and licensing as it has been developed for radio and television. However, a brief outline of the scheme will suffice to set the framework for analyzing the first amendment problems of Commission regulation.

---

[4] E.g., Report and Statement of Policy Re: Commission En Banc Programming Inquiry, 20 P & F RADIO REG. 1902, 1907 (1960).

The Radio Act of 1927 and its successor, the Communications Act of 1934, both of which gave the Commission broad licensing and regulatory powers over radio communications, were the outgrowth of a breakdown of the law during the early 1920's[5] which had permitted the emerging commercial radio industry to develop in chaos. Because of the lack of effective regulation prior to 1927, radio stations were free to begin operation when and where they chose. The new stations used any frequency they desired, changed frequencies, and increased power without regard to interference caused to others. The result was a great waste of radio frequencies because "with everybody on the air, nobody could be heard."[6] The primary purposes of the 1927 Act were to ensure adequate technical service to the public by establishing regulations designed to eliminate objectionable interference and to promote optimum utilization of the radio spectrum through fair, efficient, and equitable distribution of facilities.[7]

To accomplish these objectives, the Commission has allocated different portions of the radio spectrum to different kinds of uses, such as radio and television broadcast, citizens radio, and safety and special services. Secondly, it has allocated the available broadcasting channels on a geographic basis in an attempt to achieve optimum utilization with minimal electrical interference and a fair and equitable distribution of the frequencies.[8]

The most flexible system of allocation is the allocation and distribution of AM frequencies and stations. Standard broadcast (AM) stations are broken down into four major classes.[9] Each class of station is given its own normally protected contour within which its signal is intended to be free of objectionable interference from co-channel and adjacent channel stations.[10] Although some effort has been made to develop a reasonably equitable distribution of the AM facilities to all parts of the country, no fixed assignment scheme, such as has been adopted for FM or television, has ever been established for AM radio.

The FM allocation system was originally the same as that for AM stations. Recently, however, the Commission abandoned the flexible AM approach and, in lieu of the normally protected contour approach, established a system of allocation based on minimum mileage separation between facilities and on specific assignments of FM frequencies to specific communities.[11] The current FM allocation systems is patterned on the allocation scheme for television. At the time when the Commission came to consider allocation of frequencies for television use, it had the benefit of some twenty years experience with its AM broadcast allocations scheme, a system which, due to excessive flexibility, had permitted the spectrum to become overcrowded and, as a result, had failed in its primary purpose of preventing objectionable interference. To guard against overcrowding and the resultant erosion of service because of objectionable interference, the Commission in its Sixth Report and Order in 1952[12] set forth a comprehensive scheme for allocating all television channels on a fixed basis across the country.[13] The heart of the allocations scheme is a table of assignments which assigns all television channels to specific communities. The table is based on a system of minimum mileage separations between stations, designed to eliminate in advance the possibility of objectionable interference in the service areas of existing and potential television stations.

---

[5] The Radio Act of 1912, 37 Stat. 302, granted to the Secretary of Commerce authority to deal with regulatory problems presented by the private use of radio channels for broadcasting including authority to license radio broadcast stations. However, the Secretary's authority to regulate under the Act was virtually destroyed by subsequent judicial interpretation. In Hoover v. Intercity Radio Co. 286 F. 1003 (D.C. Cir. 1923), appeal dismissed per stipulation, 266 U.S. 636 (1924), the court held that the Secretary lacked discretion to refuse to renew a license on the grounds of interference. Subsequently in United States v. Zenith Radio Corp., 12 F.2d 614 (N.D. Ill. 1926), a district court held that licensees were not bound by nonstatutory regulations and could operate on any frequency despite the Secretary's regulations to the contrary. Following Zenith the Secretary abandoned all efforts to regulate and urged, in vain, self-regulation.

[6] NBC v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 212 (1943). For a more extensive history of this early period, the failure of regulation under the Radio Act of 1912, and enactment of the Acts of 1927 and 1934, see L. White, The American Radio 126–54 (1947); Office of Network Study, FCC, Second Interim Report on Television Network Procurement pt. II, 59–69 (1965).

[7] See NBC v. United States, 319 U.S. 190 (1943); W. Jones, Report to the Administrative Conference, Licensing of Major Broadcast Facilities by the Federal Communications Commission 3–6 (1962).

[8] For a useful summary of these two types of allocation of the radio spectrum and of the principal components of the economic structure of the broadcasting industry, see W. Jones, Cases and Materials on Regulated Industries 1032–63 (1967).

[9] 47 C.F.R. § 73.21 (1967).

[10] The normally protected contour concept is far too technical and complex for discussion here. It is sufficient to note that the concept of normally protected contour involves a relationship between (a) a signal by the protected station of specified strength (for most AM stations, the 0.5 millivolt/meter ground wave signal is protected during the day) and (b) the interfering signal of another station which exceeds a specified strength (which varies depending on whether the signal is co-channel or adjacent channel) such that the desired station's service in those areas which it is designed to serve is free of objectionable interference from the undesired station.

[11] 47 C.F.R. §§ 73.202–03 (1967). See Revision of FM Broadcast Rules, 23 P & F Radio Reg. 1859 (1963).

Although the table of assignments is fixed, it is not rigid. Changes in allocations have been made on a selective basis. Although the Commission has generally adhered to the minimum mileage separation requirements and refused to authorize short-spaced assignments,[14] since 1952 it has granted numerous petitions to amend the table and has reassigned channels to different locations.[15]

Within this general allocations framework, the Commission controls entry into broadcasting by a system of licenses renewable every three years.[16] Leaving aside those cases involving comparative choice between two or more mutually exclusive applications, licenses for available frequencies are granted subject to a showing by the applicant that it has complied with the Commission's technical regulations and standards, that it possesses the necessary character,[17] financial,[18] and legal[19] qualifications, and that its program operations will serve the public interest.[20]

B. General outline of economic regulation

Unlike most other federal regulatory schemes, the Communications Act does not comtemplate a system of economic regulation and, accordingly, does not authorize the Commission either to fix the rates charged by the licensed stations or to engage in other general economic regulation.[21] Notwithstanding this supposed limitation on its authority, the Commission has, in fact, exercised its regulatory powers to control certain economic aspects of radio and television to a considerable degree.

---

[12] Sixth Report on Television Allocations, 1 P & F Radio Reg. pt. 3, at 91:601 (1952).

[13] 47 C.F.R. §§ 73.606–07 (1967).

[14] The Commission in Interim Policy on VHF-TV Channel Assignments, 21 P & F Radio Reg. 1695 (1961), undertook consideration of short-spaced VHF assignments in certain specified markets in which only two VHF stations then operated, but refused to adopt a policy under which it would authorize further short-spaced VHF assignments in markets having "serious shortages" of channels. Subsequently, in VHF Drop-ins, 25 P & F Radio Reg. 1687 (1963), the Commission rejected most of the limited drop-in proposals which had been held for consideration under its prior Report and Order in 21 P & F Radio Reg. 1695 (1961).

[15] E.g., VHF Channel Assignments in Nevada, 7 P & F Radio Reg. Bd 1589 (1966); Channel Assignment in Rhinelander, Wisc., c P & F Radio Reg. 2d 1683 (1964). The FM table of assignments possesses the same flexibility and reassignments can be made on petition of interested party or on the Commission's motion. E.g., FM Channel Assignments, 1 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 1545 (1963).

[16] 48 Stat. 1081 (1934), 47 U.S.C. § 301 (1964). Although in the field of radio and television the Commission's authority to regulate entry was originally considered to be limited to radio and television broadcast stations, the Commission has now extended its authority to limit and control entry into the nonbroadcast radio and television area of community antenna television, discussed below. However, the Commission's "regulation" of entry into the field of community antenna television is limited and is incidental to its licensing of radio and television broadcast stations.

[17] This is a negative qualification and the applicant need not affirmatively allege good character. Typically a finding of "bad" character relates to willful refusal to disclose or misrepresentations to the Commission. See, e.g., WMOZ, Inc., 1 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 801 (1964). But it may involve virtually any activity which bears on character, e.g., violation of the Communications Act, FCC regulations, or other laws. See, e.g., General Electric Co., 2 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 1038 (1964) (violation of antitrust laws considered). See generally Brown, Character and Candor Requirements for FCC Licensees, 22 Law & Contemp. Prob. 644 (1957).

[18] Traditionally, applicants were required to show financial resources sufficient to build the station and operate it for three months without advertising revenue. Recently, however, the Commission has established a requirement that all stations demonstrate financial ability to construct and meet fixed and operating costs for one year without revenue or to establish convincingly that such revenue will be forthcoming in an amount sufficient to continue operation. Ultravision Broadcasting Co., 5 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 343 (1965).

[19] Legal qualifications relate chiefly to § 310(a) of the Act, forbidding licenses to aliens, e.g., United Artists Broadcasting, Inc., 7 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 7 (1966), and to compliance with the Commission's multiple ownership rules. See the discussion of multiple ownership rules in text accompanying notes 26–27 infra.

[20] For a discussion of program regulation, see Part II infra.

1. Monopoly, Diversification, and Chain Broadcasting—

Although the Commission does not have power to enforce the antitrust laws as such,[22] it has long undertaken economic regulation along essentially antitrust lines, relying on its general authority to protect the public interest. The Commission's multiple ownership rules, its regulation of certain network practices, and its policy of favoring diversification of control in the mass communications media all reflect economic policy substantially similar to the policies of the federal antitrust laws.

The genesis of the Commission's regulation of economic concentration is its Report on Chain Broadcasting,[23] released in 1941 after some three years of intensive study of problems posed principally by the networks. The present scope of the rules and policies which grew out of this original study[24] can be summarized very generally. The rules prohibit or limit various types of exclusive dealing practices between networks and affiliated stations and network ownership of stations under circumstances where it would restrain competition.[25] In addition, multiple ownership rules limit the total number of stations which can be held under common ownership or under common control[26] and prohibit "duopoly," the common ownership or control of two or more stations of the same class in the same area.[27]

The Commission's original chain broadcasting regulations were upheld in National Broadcasting Company v. United States,[28] against a challenge that they were beyond the Commission's statutory powers. The Commission's multiple ownership rules were subsequently upheld against a rather feeble attack in United States v. Storer Broadcasting Company.[29]

---

[21] E.g., FCC v. Sanders Bros. Radio Station, 309 U.S. 470 (1940). For a brief discussion of the similarities and differences as to the economic characteristics of broadcasting and public utility fields where there is extensive economic regulation, see Levin, Federal Control of Entry in the Broadcast Industry, 5 J. LAW & ECON. 49, 52–56 (1962).

[22] United States v. RCA, 358 U.S. 334, 343 (1959).

[23] FCC, REPORT ON CHAIN BROADCASTING (1941).

[24] The fullest treatment of the problem of economic concentration in radio and television, although now considerably out of date, is the so-called Barrow Report, HOUSE COMM. ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE REPORT ON NETWORK BROADCASTING, H.R. REP. NO. 1297, 85th Cong., 1st Sess. (1958) [hereinafter cited NETWORK BROADCASTING]. See also Hale & Hale, Competition or Control II: Radio and Television Broadcasting, 107 U. PA. L. REV. 585 (1959).

[25] These rules, generally referred to as the "chain broadcasting rules," are substantially identical for radio and television. See 47 C.F.R. §§ 73.131–.138 (AM), .231–238 (FM), .658 (TV) (1967).

For a comprehensive history of the rules up to 1958, see NETWORK BROADCASTING. The principal changes in the rules since 1958 have been the prohibition of television option time, see Television Option Time, 25 P & F RADIO REG. 1651 (1963), and the prohibition of network's representation of affiliated stations in selling national spot sales, see Network Spot Sales Representation, 19 P & F RADIO REG. 1501 (1960), aff'd sub nom. Metropolitan Television Co. v. FCC, 289 F.2d 874 (D.C. Cir. 1961).

[26] Again the rules are substantially identical for radio and television. See 47 C.F.R. §§ 73.35 (AM), .240 (FM), .636 (TV) (1967). With respect to AM and FM stations, the rules place an upper limit on common ownership, interest in, or control of seven stations. With respect to television stations, the upper limit is again seven stations, no more than five of which may be VHF stations. For a brief outline of the history of these rules, see NETWORK BROADCASTING 84.

In 1965 the Commission proposed a further amendment to the multiple ownership rule to limit common ownership of television stations in the "top 50" markets to a total of one UHF and two VHF stations. Television Multiple Ownership Rules, 5 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1609 (1965). Pending such amendment, it adopted an "interim policy" under which it would, in the absence of a compelling showing, designate for hearing any application to acquire a VHF station in the top 50 television markets by a party already having one or more such stations or by a new party to acquire more than one such station. Although this interim policy was undoubtedly intended to have some restraining effect in itself, this effect was almost certainly weakened by the Commission's subsequent refusal to order a hearing on an application by a Chicago station licensee to take over and operate a station in Denver, one of the top 50 markets. Channel 2 Corp., 6 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 885 (1966).

[27] The "duopoly" rules formerly prohibited common ownership, interest in or control of another station in the same class where both would serve "substantially the same area." Under this approach a number of different factors were considered in determining whether two stations would serve substantially the same area. See, e.g., Sheffield Broadcasting Co., 21 P & F RADIO REG. 514j (1962). The current rules, however, have established fixed boundaries to this "area" by proscribing common ownership, interest in, or control of two or more stations where there would result any overlap of specified contours of the respective stations. In AM and FM, any overlap of the respective 1 mv/m contours is proscribed; in television, overlap of Grade B contours is proscribed. 47 C.F.R. §§ 73.35 (AM), .240 (FM), .636 (TV) (1967).

[28] 319 U.S. 190 (1943). The NBC case also considered and rejected a first amendment challenge to the regulations, discussed at note 73 infra.

Apart from the chain broadcasting and multiple ownership rules, the Commission has long purported to follow a general licensing policy of promoting diversification of ownership of all mass communications media[30] in evaluating the respective merits of competing applicants in a comparative hearing.[31] This policy has never been crystallized into written regulations, and, like most of the factors assessed in comparative hearings, it has not been vigorously or consistently applied.[32]

2. Economic Injury Through Competition—

Ignoring dicta in several early circuit court opinions,[33] the Commission persistently refused, until recent years, to consider competitive economic injury to existing licensees as a basis for refusing to license new stations. This policy was approved in FCC v. Sanders Brothers Radio Station,[34] where the Supreme Court held that the Commission was not bound to consider economic injury as such in determining whether or not to grant an application for a new station. However, the Court did indicate that under some circumstances economic injury could be taken into account where it might have an important bearing on the ability of the new station or the existing station to render adequate service.[35] Following Sanders, the Commission continued to disclaim any power to refuse licenses on the grounds of competitive injury, or that if it had such power, it would be in the public interest to exercise it.[36]

In 1958, the policy of refusing to consider competitive injury even where the competitive injury might lead to disruption of service was sharply reversed in Carroll Broadcasting Company v. FCC.[37] The court held that the Commission had misread the Sanders case and that, while the Commission could not consider competitive, economic injury merely for the purpose of protecting the revenue of an existing station, it could and must take it into account where it threatens the ability of the existing station to provide adequate service to the public. Although the primary concern of the court in Carroll seems to have been with competitive injury which would so drastically curtail an existing station's revenues as to cause it to leave the air, it seems clear that the decision was not intended to be limited to such extreme situations. Thus, for example, economic injury which might lead to curtailment of high-cost, local live programming would justify refusal to license a new station.

The Commission's refusal to consider competitive injury in the licensing of new stations prior to the Carroll case was motivated principally by a fear of being deluged by similar protests against every new applicant. The Commission was unwilling to undertake the difficult task of sorting out the valid protests. The Commission explained its refusal to consider economic injury by disclaiming the power to make any such economic determinations, but this seems to have been more of a rationalization than a reason, since the Commission has long rendered economic judgements in converse situations involving economic concentration. The most notable example of the Commission's willingness to consider economic injury on a broad, general plane in which it could choose the time and place to apply economic judgement and policy is its deintermixture proceedings during the 1950's, in which it decided to reallocate VHF and UHF channels to different television markets because of the inability of UHF stations to compete effectively with VHF stations in the same market.[38] Although the Commission has now declared a moritorium on its deintermixture policy because of the enactment of the all-channel receiver legislation,[39] this does not represent an abandonment of the type of economic regulation represented by its deintermixture efforts, but simply the choice of a different remedy; legislation requiring television receivers to be compatible with both UHF and VHF reception.

---

[29] 351 U.S. 192 (1956).

[30] The other media interests generally involved besides radio and television are newspaper interests. However, while ownership, interest in, or control of a newspaper is a comparative "demerit" against an applicant in theory, the fact remains that common ownership of newspapers and broadcast stations is so prevalent as to indicate that newspaper ownership is not a serious liability. See, e.g., the comprehensive list of broadcast stations identified with newspaper and magazine ownership in 1966 BROADCASTING YEARBOOK, at A–92–99.

[31] In noncomparative cases the Commission has only rarely considered an applicant's ownership or control of other communications media where the applicant meets the multiple ownership rules. See NETWORK BROADCASTING 112–13. A rare exception is Laurence W. Harry, 13 F.C.C. 23 (1948), aff'd sub nom. Mansfield Journal Co. v. FCC, 180 F.2d 28 (D.C. Cir. 1960).

[32] As to newspapers, see note 30 supra, and Heckman, Diversification of Control of the Media of Mass Communication—Policy or Fallacy?, 42 GEO. L.J. 378 (1954) (which argues, however, that the diversification policy should not be pursued except to prevent monopoly). For a general criticism of the policy as applied both with respect to newspaper and other radio ownership,. see NETWORK BROADCASTING 121–24; Note, Diversification and the Public Interest: Administrative Responsibility of the FCC, 66 YALE L.J. 365 (1957).

The Commission's new Policy Statement on Comparative Broadcast Hearings, 5 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1901 (1965) suggests a somewhat greater stress on the factor of diversification than has been stressed in the past cases. To what extent this stress in a general policy statement will carry over to actual decision, however, is anyone's guess.

[33] E.g., WOKO, Inc. v. FCC, 109 F.2d 665, 666–68 (D.C. Cir. 1939); Tri-State Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 107 F.2d 956, 957–58 (D.C. Cir. 1939).

[34] 309 U.S. 470 (1940).

[35] Id. at 476.

[36] See Voice of Cullman, 14 F.C.C. 770 (1950); Southeastern Enterprises, 13 P & F RADIO REG. 139 (1957). For a vigorous criticism of the latter case and the Commission's policy of refusing to consider competitive injury, see Note, Economic Injury in FCC Licensing: The Public Interest Ignored, 67 YALE L.J. 135 (1957).

[37] 258 F.2d 440 (D.C. Cir. 1958).

3. Regulation of Community Antenna Television—

Without question the most extensive economic regulation yet undertaken by the Commission is its controversial regulation of community antenna television

---

[38] VHF and UHF channels were intermixed in the same markets in Sixth Report on Television Allocation, 1 P & F Radio Reg. pt. 3, at 91:601 (1952). It was not long after the lifting of the television "freeze" that it became apparent that UHF stations suffered a very substantial competitive disadvantage in comparison to VHF, due mainly to (a) inferior propagation characteristics of UHF and a very restricted service area in the case of UHF stations as compared with VHF stations and (b) the manufacture of VHF-only receivers by television set manufacturers.

To correct the situation, the Commission instituted five rulemaking cases looking towards the deintermixture of five specific communities. On further study of the problem, the Commission determined that the problem was too widespread to be materially affected by deintermixture in only five markets and terminated the earlier proposals, First Report on Deintermixture, 13 P & F Radio Reg. 1511 (1955). Subsequently, the Commission instituted rulemaking looking toward solution of the problem on a broad, nationwide basis, as a result of which it concluded that the most promising solution to the problem would be to transfer all television stations to UHF frequencies, Second Report on Deintermixture, 13 P & F Radio Reg. 1571, 1577 (1956). As an "interim" measure, it instituted proceedings looking toward deintermixture in certain specified communities. Id. at 1581, 1583–84. Following the release of its Second Report, the Commission deintermixed a number of communities, e.g., Elmira Deintermixture Case, 15 P & F Radio Reg. 1515 (1957); Fresno Deintermixture Case, 15 P & F Radio Reg. 15861 (1957), modified, 18 P & F Radio Reg. 1733 (1959), modified further, 19 P & F Radio Reg. 1598a (1960).

The Commission's proposal to transfer all television stations to UHF announced in 1956 failed to jell. In April, 1959, the Commission reported to Congress, in substance, that it was still "studying" the problem. It reported its conclusion that deintermixture either on a selective community or area basis was ineffective but that, as an "interim policy," it had decided to add VHF channels to some large population centers. The VHF additions were short-spaced drop-ins which were supposed to alleviate the shortage of service in those areas by adding a third VHF station—obviously on the assumption that UHF in those areas could not be made to work. See Hearings on Television Allocations Before the Senate Comm. on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 86th Cong., 2d Sess. 4585–611 (1960) (Statement of FCC Chairman Doerfer).

The 1959 report to Congress notwithstanding, the Commission subsequently proposed deintermixture on a selective basis in eight specified communities, Expanded Use of UHF Channels, 21 P & F Radio Reg. 1711, 1714 (1961). However, the deintermixture proposals were met by fierce opposition from the strongest elements in the industry. At the same time that it released its interim policy in 1961, the Commission proposed to Congress that it enact all-channel receiver legislation which would require all receivers shipped in interstate commerce to be capable of receiving both VHF and UHF channels. At that time it seems evident that the Commission viewed all-channel receiver legislation as a means for paving the way to an eventual shift of all VHF stations to the UHF spectrum. See id. at 1714–15. The all-channel receiver legislation proved to be a promising way out of the deintermixture controversy for both the Commission and the industry. The industry opponents of deintermixture agreed to support the all-channel receiver legislation but insisted that Congress exact from the Commission a commitment that its interim policy on deintermixture and its intention to pursue an all-UHF system would be abandoned for at least a sufficient period of time to permit the all-channel receiver legislation to cure the competitive imbalance between UHF and VHF, which it was thought that the all-channel receiver legislation could do. On the representation by the Commission that it would terminate its deintermixture efforts, the all-channel receiver legislation was enacted in 1962 as § 303(s) of the Communications Act. See H.R. Rep. No. 1559, 87th Cong., 2d Sess. 18–26 (1962); S. Rep. No. 1526, 86th Cong., 2d Sess. 13–19 (1962). As a result, the Commission declared a moratorium on its deintermixture proposals. Deintermixture Cases, 23 P & F Radio Reg. 1645 (1962).

[39] See note 38 supra.

(CATV).[40] Because of its relative newness and far-reaching importance, and because it serves as an ideal vehicle for considering what limitations, if any, the first amendment places on economic regulation by the Commission the Commission's regulatory efforts to control CATV warrant somewhat greater attention than other areas of FCC economic regulation.

Begun as relatively crude facilities designed to bring television broadcast signals into topographic pockets and other geographical areas where an adequate number of satisfactory signals could not be received, CATV has now become a major rival of the broadcast industry.[41] In the six year period between 1959, when the Commission first considered CATV regulation,[42] and 1965, when it first adopted comprehensive regulations governing CATV operations,[43] the number of CATV systems more than trebled.[44] Instead of the old "Mom and Pop" type of community facility, bringing in perhaps three to five nearby signals, CATV systems now boast of twenty or more channels and, with the aid of microwave, can take the signals virtually any distance and into any size or type of community.[45] With this extraordinary development and growth it was inevitable that there would be a confrontation between CATV owners and broadcasters, for although CATV does not generally compete with broadcast stations for advertising revenues,[46] it does compete for the audience on which their advertising revenue depends.[47]

The history of CATV regulation began with the Commission's termination of an inquiry into the economic impact of CATV systems and other auxiliary facilities such as translators on broadcast stations.[48] The Commission in 1959 found insufficient economic impact by CATV systems at that stage of their development to justify taking jurisdiction over these all-wire facilities.[49] However, it was not long before it became apparent that CATV was a rapidly growing phenomen which, unless regulated before it grew too large, might escape regulation until after it had had a severe economic impact on broadcast stations. In 1962 the Commission, in Carter Mountain Transmission Corporation,[50] denied a microwave carrier's application for a license to improve service to CATV customers because of probable economic injury to a local station in competition with CATV. However, the carrier was given leave to reapply on a showing that the CATV system would carry the local station on its cable and that it would not carry programs of stations which duplicated the local station's programs. This type of protection is generally referred to as "non-duplication" or, more euphemistically, "exclusivity." Later in 1962 the Commission instituted rulemaking proceedings to consider adopting the Carter Mountain type of conditions of carriage and nonduplication as permanent rules for all common carrier licensees. The proposal was extended a year later to noncommon carrier licensees as well.[51] These proposals culminated in the Commission's First Report on CATV Regulation[52] in 1965, adopting rules requiring mandatory carriage and nonduplication for all microwave-served CATV systems.[53]

---

[40] Reduced to its basic elements, a CATV system consists of two basic components: (a) a "head-end" system consisting of receiving antennae and related equipment (e.g., amplifiers), usually of high gain capability and generally situated in a location best suited for receiving usable signals from broadcast stations; and (b) a distribution system consisting of coaxial cable, which transmits the signal from the head-end system to the subscriber, and amplifiers to compensate for signal attenuation through the cable. Although the CATV system itself transmits entirely by wire, most larger systems today make use of micro-wave relay facilities which permit a signal to be picked up by a receiving antenna near its point of origin, converted to microwave frequencies and transmitted virtually any distance to another receiving antenna from which it is converted back to video-audio frequencies and transmitted by cable to the subscriber. For a brief description, see Hearings on Regulation of Community Antenna Television Before the Subcomm. on Communications and Power of the House Comm. on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 89th Cong., 1st Sess., ser. 89–16, 4–5 (1965) [hereinafter cited as 1965 Hearings on CATV Regulation].

For general surveys of the CATV regulation problem, see Note, The Wire Mire: The FCC and CATV, 79 HARV. L. REV. 366 (1965); Note, Community Antenna Television: Survey of a Regulatory Problem, 52 GEO. L.J. 136 (1963). An economic analysis of the CATV industry, commissioned by the FCC, is M. SEIDEN, AN ECONOMIC ANALYSIS OF COMMUNITY ANTENNA TELEVISION SYSTEMS AND THE TELEVISION BROADCAST INDUSTRY (1965) [hereinafter cited as SEIDEN REPORT]. Although the SEIDEN REPORT contains a number of dubious conclusions, resulting partly from now out-of-date statistics, it provides a useful general description of the industry and its structure as of that time.

[41] On the growth of CATV, see authorities cited note 40 supra.

[42] CATV Systems and Auxiliary Television Services, 18 P & F RADIO REG. 1573 (1959).

[43] First Report on CATV Regulation, 4 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1725 (1965) [hereinafter cited as First Report].

[44] Second Report on CATV Regulation, 6 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1717, 1772–79 (1966) [hereinafter cited as Second Report].

[45] Id.

[46] Some CATV systems have carried local advertising but not to the degree that it has become a serious competitor for advertising revenues. The Commission's new rules prohibit deletion of advertising of the station whose signal is carried. Id. at 1757. However, they apparently do not prohibit carriage of advertising by CATV in addition to the station's advertising.

[47] The existence or probable existence vel non of economic injury is really at the heart of the entire controversy between CATV, broadcasters, and the Commission. CATV interests have persistently denied that there has been (or that there is sufficient evidence that there will be) any serious impairment to broadcast revenues resulting from CATV competition. See, e.g., 1965 Hearings on CATV Regulation 132–33, 213–15 (statements of President of NCTA and President of Jerrold Corp.). The broadcast opponents of CATV on the other hand have contended essentially that the past impact has been understated but, in any event, the past experience with CATV, based on its operations as a small service, is an inadequate guide to the future and that current trends show demonstrable tendencies towards economic impact. See, e.g., id. at 357–59, 389–94; Appendix to Reply Comments of NAB, in FCC Dkt. Nos. 14895 and 15233, Oct. 26, 1964 (the "Fisher Report"). The Commission, wavering somewhat at first, has now sided with the latter view that CATV would, absent regulation, have strong economic impact on all broadcast stations. Second Report 1772–80.

[48] CATV Systems and Auxiliary Television Services, 18 P & F RADIO REG. 1573 (1959). Translators are low power, auxiliary broadcast stations designed, as CATV systems were originally designed, to fill in topographic "pockets" and sparsely settled areas where adequate off-the-air service cannot be received from regular broadcast stations. For a brief description of their history and use, see SEIDEN REPORT 18–22 Historically,

The carriage and nonduplication rules implemented by the Commission's First Report followed the regulatory mode of Carter Mountain. No jurisdiction was asserted directly over the CATV systems themselves, but only over those served by microwave facilities. While this disposed of virtually all of the larger systems and those capable of having the greatest economic impact on broadcast stations, the mode of regulation could hardly be considered completely effective from the point of view of the Commission, or very evenhanded from the point of view of those regulated. Moreover, the carriage and nonduplication rules, originally the ultimate goal of CATV regulation, had become merely a stopgap measure in the view of the broadcast opponents of CATV and the Commission. At best they helped correct an unfair competitive translator operations have been severely restricted by Commission regulation, primarily to avoid a very troublesome problem of interference which it has been thought would result from too free licensing of such facilities. However, the Commission has in recent years taken some steps to liberalize translator licensing and has under consideration other proposals. See Second Report 1757–61. Without question, considerable impetus for this liberalization policy stems from the desire to provide an auxiliary broadcast facility as a competitive substitute for CATV.

---

[49] CATV Systems and Auxiliary Television Services, 18 P & F Radio Reg. 1573, 1595–97, 1602 (1959). Although the Commission did not pass directly on its statutory power to control CATV in the event it were shown that CATV had a marked economic impact on broadcasting, it did reject other bases of jurisdiction It held that it had no power to assert jurisdiction over CATV systems as common carriers under part II of the Act, following its prior decision in Frontier Broadcasting v. Collier, 16 P & F Radio Reg. 1005 (1958). 18 P & F Radio Reg. at 1599. It further held that it had no statutory power to license CATV systems under § 301 of the Act because CATV did not comewithin the definition of "radio station" or "broadcasting" to which § 301 applies. Id. at 1600–01. The Commission stated that it had no plenary authority to regulate CATV simply because it was related to or affected broadcasting, which was within its jurisdiction. Id. at 1600. Finally, it held that it had no power to regulate CATV indirectly through its admitted jurisdiction over microwave facilities which serve CATV. Id. at 1603–05. On this latter position, the Commission subsequently changed its mind and was upheld on appeal in Carter Mountain Transmission Corp. v. FCC, 321 F.2d 359 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 951 (1963).

Although the Commission reserved judgment on its authority to regulate CATV where it could be shown to impair its regulatory scheme for broadcasting, it seems evident that the Commission did not believe there was any basis for asserting jurisdiction even if economic injury were substantiated.

[50] 22 P & F Radio Reg. 193 (1962), aff'd, 321 F.2d 359 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied. 375 U.S. 951 (1963)

[51] See 1965 FCC Ann Rep. 82–83.

[52] Note 43 supra.

[53] The most controversial aspect of the nonduplication rules was, and has continued to be, the question of the duration of the nonduplication protection. Over the bitter opposition of CATV interests, who wanted no more than simultaneous or at least no more than "same-day" nonduplication protection, the Commission adopted a period of [illegible] days protection, 15 days before broadcast and 15 days after. See e.g., 1965 Hearings on CATV Regulation 133–53 (testimony of President of NCTA). The extra period was thought essential to protect delayed network broadcasts and, to a degree, syndicated film broadcasts by local stations. First Report 1768–71. However, the Commission subsequently reduced the protection period down to "same-day" protection. Second Report 1747–51.

advantage which CATV was considered to have[54] and alleviated some of its economic impact. These rules did not, however, correct the basic economic problem which was posed by CATV, i.e., simple dilution of audience as a result of an increased number of available signals.

Believing that this problem could not be met without more comprehensive control exercised directly over CATV systems, and not merely over microwave carriers, the Commission simultaneously issued in its First Report, a notice of further inquiry[55] which proposed, in addition to carriage and nonduplication requirements, broad scale restrictions on CATV operations. In 1966 the Commission released its Second Report on CATV Regulation[56] in which it asserted jurisdiction and regulatory authority over CATV systems directly, irrespective of whether they used microwave facilities, extended carriage and nonduplication rules to all CATV systems, and issued comprehensive regulations controlling CATV entry which were aimed principally at distant carriage of signals by CATV into markets far removed from those served by the stations whose signals were carried.[57] The Commission asserted its jurisdiction over all CATV systems on the grounds that its authority under the Act is not confined to regulation of common carriers and licensing of radio stations, but extends beyond these areas to activities in interstate commerce[58] which are an integral part of the radio and television system and which have an immediate and substantial disruptive effect on the scheme of regulation adopted by the Commission and approved by Congress and the courts.[59]

The ultimate effect of the Commission's regulation of CATV is still uncertain despite the adoption of its Second Report. As may be expected of any undertaking of this magnitude, it will be many years before the scope of the rules is fully developed, and not until this occurs can their true effects be known. Although plainly more far-reaching insofar as a greater number of persons are involved, the CATV rules are not unique in their ultimate purpose or effect. The basic theory behind them is essentially that underlying the Carroll case:[60] Unrestrained competition can severely curtain the economic support of radio and television stations causing injured stations to cut back more expensive programming (which by a somewhat dubious hypotheses is deemed "better" programming) to leave the air permanently, resulting in a loss of broadcast service to the public.

4 Proposed Authorization and Regulation of Subscription TV—

Whether to authorize subscription television (STV) on a permanent basis has been one of the enduring problems of the Commission since the earliest days of television. In 1955 the Commission instituted proposed rulemaking to inquire into its power under the Communications Act to authorize subscription television and to determine whether such authorization would be in the public interest.[61] After prolonged delay, experimental operations were licensed in

---

[54] One of the chief grounds relied on by the Commission in its First Report was that the CATV system has an unfair competitive edge because: (a) in those homes in which it is hooked up, it can effectively preclude reception of competitive off-the-air signals, a problem which was overcome by requiring carriage on the cable; and (b) unlike the broadcast station, CATV does not pay for the programs which it takes from broadcast stations and sells in competition with such stations. This latter problem was alleviated in part by the nonduplication rules and the carriage rules. See First Report 1747–52.

[55] Notice of Inquiry and Notice of Proposed Rule-Making, 4 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1680 (1965).

[56] Note 44 supra.

[57] The principal purpose served by this type of "distant carriage" restriction, as opposed to other forms of restriction, is that it enables the Commission to conform CATV operations to its basic geographical scheme of allocations for television broadcast stations; and it effectively limits the attractiveness and, hence, growth potential of CATV systems since, except as permitted within the strict geographical limits, the CATV system cannot bring in much more than subscribers already have.

[58] Although the question whether CATV systems which operate in the confines of one state operate in interstate commerce was the subject of considerable dispute by CATV interests, this seems the least troublsome aspect of the problem. See Idaho Microwave, Inc. v. FCC, 352 F.2d 729 (D.C. Cir. 1965); Ward v. Northern Ohio Tel. Co., 300 F.2d 816 (6th Cir.) cert. denied, 371 U.S. 820 (1962).

[59] See Second Report 1725–32; Notice of Inquiry and Notice of Proposed Rule-Making, Regulation of CATV, 4 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1680, 1707–12 (1965). On congressional and judicial approval, see H.R. REP. No. 1559, 87th Cong., 2d Sess. 3 (1962) (approving the system of service through diverse local stations); Logansport Broadcasting Corp. v. United States, 210 F.2d 24 (D.C. Cir. 1954) (upholding the Commission's Sixth Report and Order).

[60] 258 F.2d 440 (D.C. Cir. 1958).

[61] 20 Fed. Reg. 988 (1955).

Hartford, Connecticut.[62] At the termination of the trial period in Hartford, further proceedings were commenced to study the question anew in light of the results of this test.[63]

To make an initial investigation and prepare a report on the question, three commissioners were appointed as a Subscription Television Committee. After some two years of further rulemaking proceedings, the STV Committee has recently submitted its report in which it proposes for adoption by the full Commission permanent authorization of STV, but with numerous restrictions and limitations.[64] The full Commission, apparently still undecided, has declined to act without still further comment and argument from the industry and other interested parties.[65] Accordingly, the matter is still pending and, after twelve years in limbo, the fate of STV is still undecided.

The central issue on which regulatory policy has been and is being debated is analogous to the issue raised by the sudden rapid growth of CATV: the problem of economic impact on free television broadcasting. The matter of economic impact is, however, distinct. Although there would be direct diversion of audience from free television to pay television, the principal impact of STV, according to its opponents, is the possible diversion or siphoning of programs and talent from free television. This siphoning argument is based on the conclusion that STV could outbid conventional television's advertising sponsors for program talent. Of principal concern is the supposed ability of STV to outbid free television for movies and major sports events. With this type of programming lost to STV, free television would be unable to generate sufficient advertising revenues to compete for an audience and would eventually lose out to STV. At that point, according to the STV opponents, all television would become pay television.[66]

The primary concerns of the STV Committee with regard to the economic impact of STV are two: the possible preemption of broadcast time by STV operations, particularly in prime-time viewing hours,[67] and the siphoning of programs and program talent from free television to STV.[68] As protection against these dangers to free television, the Committee has proposed that a number of restrictions be placed on STV market entry and STV operations. In order to ensure that at least three network services and one independent service could be received in such markets and to minimize the number of hours of free television which would be preempted, the Committee would first restrict STV operations to markets receiving Grade A commercial service from five stations, of which the STV station may be one.[69] Further, it would permit only one STV operation in any market.[70] To protect against program and talent siphoning, the STV Committee has proposed regulations which have greater constitutional implications insofar as they are aimed directly at the kind of programming STV may present. The Committee has proposed prohibiting STV from presenting feature films older than two years from the time of first release to theatres on the rationale that movies newer than two years are not generally available to free television. In addition, it has proposed prohibiting STV from carrying current sports events which were regularly carried live on free television in the community in which the STV operates, and prohibiting STV from presenting continuing series programs which are a mainstay of free television. Finally, it proposes limiting the total percentage of time which STV may devote to feature films and sports to no more than ninety per cent of a station's STV programming annually and no more than ninety-five per cent monthly.[71]

As in the case of the restrictions on CATV market entry and operations, the central policy of the above regulations is to restrict competition to the extent deemed necessary to preserve the continuation of free television broadcast service. Essentially, it is a reflection of the principles of the Carroll case. It is in these terms that the constitutional implications of the Commission's regulation of CATV and pay television and its economic regulation in general must be considered.

---

[62] Hartford Phonevision Co., 20 P & F RADIO REG. 754 (1961), aff'd, Connecticut Comm. Against Pay TV v. FCC, 301 F.2d 835 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 371 U.S. 816 (1962).

[63] Further Notice of Proposed Rule Making and Notice of Inquiry, 7 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1501 (1966).

[64] Report of the Subscription Television Committee to the FCC, 10 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1617 (1967) [hereinafter cited as STV Report].

[65] 10 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1617 (1967). FCC 67–819 (July 14, 1967).

[66] See STV Report 1654–57.

[67] Id. at 1660–61, 1668–79.

[68] Id. at 1661.

[69] Id. at 1668–73; proposed rules, § 73.642, id. at 1738.

[70] Id. at 1678–79; proposed rules, § 73.642, id. at 1738.

[71] Id. at 1702–14; proposed rules, § 73.643, id. at 1740, app. D.

C. First amendment implications of economic regulation

The foregoing discussion of the general regulatory framework within which the Commission operates is not intended to suggest that the entire regulatory scheme under the Communications Act has serious first amendment implications. All aspects of Commission regulation, whether they be technical, social, or economic, have some measure of impact on free speech. However, no one would seriously contend today that the Commission is without constitutional power to license the use of radio frequencies, and, as part of such a licensing scheme, to impose such technical restraints and limitations as are necessary to ensure a fair, equitable, and efficient distribution and use of such frequencies. Minimum restraints through licensing are necessary in order that there be any effective radio communication, a fact made clear by the experience of the 1920's. To this extent the cliche that Commission regulation makes possible the exercise of free speech in radio communications is fair and accurate.

Moreover, beyond the very narrow engineering aspects of allocation of frequencies, it must be accepted that the Commission may set a very broad limit on the type of use to which frequencies may be put. Thus, it seems clearly appropriate to require licensees in the Aviation Radio Service to restrict their communications to those having some relationship to aviation. Nor does it do violence to the first amendment to restrict their use still further and to prohibit private chit-chat.[72]

However, to concede all this sheds little light on the problem, for what is at issue here is not whether the Commission should have and does have the constitutional power to act as a traffic cop of the airways. The question here is to what extent the Commission may constitutionally restrain free speech on radio and television by regulating economic conditions in the industry.

The NBC case[73] is generally regarded as the touchstone for measuring the constitutionality of Commission regulation. Indeed, in the field of economic and program regulation of radio and television, the NBC opinion affirming the Commission's power to regulate chain broadcasting has become the vade mecum of the Commission in exercising regulatory powers in nontechnical areas. One can scarcely pick up a single case in which the Commission's regulatory authority is in question where some portion of Justice Frankfurter's opinion is not quoted as a talisman to dispel all doubts about the Commission's statutory and constitutional power.[74]

The importance of the NBC case lies not in the nature of the specific regulation upheld but in Justice Frankfurter's sweeping pronouncements on the comprehensive powers[75] with which Congress endowed the Commission and his almost equally broad pronouncements on the constitutionality of Commission exercise of such powers. Of primary importance, of course, is the scope of the latter. Rejecting a challenge to the regulations based on the first amendment, Justice Frankfurter concluded for the majority: "The regulations, even if valid in all other respects, must fall because they abridge, say the appellants, their right of free speech. If that be so, it would follow that every person whose application for a license to operate a station is denied by the Commission is thereby denied his constitutional right of free speech. Freedom of utterance is abridged to many who wish to use the limited facilities of radio. Unlike other modes of expression, radio inherently is not available to all.

---

[72] See Lafayette Radio Electronics Corp. v. United States, 345 F.2d 278, 281 (2d Cir. 1965) (Friendly, J.), upholding against first amendment challenge Commission regulations prohibiting the use of radio facilities in the Citizens Radio Service as a "hobby" or a "diversion."

[73] National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190 (1943).

[74] The Commission is not alone in so regarding NBC. See, e.g., Barron, The Federal Communications Commission's Fairness Doctrine: An Evaluation, 30 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 1, 2 n.6 (1961): "The [NBC] opinion . . . is generally regarded as having sounded the death knell for the argument that government regulation of broadcasting violated the licensee's right of free expression guaranteed by the First Amendment." Although this statement of the effect of NBC in silencing first amendment objections to broadcast regulation is plain hyperbole, it is nevertheless indicative of a widespread, if wholly uncritical, acceptance of NBC an dispositive of constitutional issues in broadcast regulation.

[75] 319 U.S. at 217.

That is its unique characteristic, and that is why, unlike other modes of expression, it is subject to governmental regulation. Because it cannot be used by all, some who wish to use it must be denied. But Congress did not authorize the Commission to choose among applicants upon the basis of their political, economic or social views, or upon any other capricious basis. If it did, or if the Commission by these Regulations proposed a choice among applicants upon some such basis, the issue before us would be wholly different . . . The right of free speech does not include, however, the right to use the facilities of radio without a license. The licensing system established by Congress in the Communications Act of 1934 was a proper exercise of its power over commerce. The standard it provided for the licensing of stations was the 'public interest, convenience, or necessity.' Denial of a station license on the ground, if valid under the Act, is not a denial of free speech."[76]

Accepting this opinion at face value, it is difficult to find any significant first amendment limitations on the authority of the Commission to regulate radio and television broadcasting, at least in the area of economic regulation,[77] so long as it can be found that the standard of public interest, convenience, or necessity is satisfied. At the same time, however, Justice Frankfurter's opinion seems fundamentally wrong insofar as it suggests an unacceptably broad license for Commission regulation, particularly in the field of programming. At the heart of Frankfurter's reasoning is the classic cliche: "Unlike other modes of expression, radio inherently is not available to all. That is its unique characteristic, and that is why, unlike other modes of expression, it is subject to governmental regulation."[78]

This argument, which has been assiduously trotted out on every appropriate occasion, has several major defects.[78a] First, contrary to common assumption, the radio broadcast spectrum is not now, and may never be, saturated. While the technical limitations on entry into broadcasting are real enough, the economic limitations are probably more restrictive. The economic barriers to entry into radio broadcasting are, however, far less restrictive than in the case of media such as newspapers, which lie essentially beyond public control. Second, there are more competitive outlets for expression in radio and television than there are in the newspaper media—or probably in all major publications media combined. This disparity between the number of different radio and television outlets and the number of newsprint media is increasing. Third, the mere fact that there are barriers to entry into the communications media, be it newspapers or radio and television, does not in itself resolve the problem of the kinds of control that are permissible and how narrow the focus on restraint of free speech may be.

The defect of Justice Frankfurter's approach to the constitutional issue is illustrated by the Commission's regulation of community antenna television. The CATV regulations prohibiting duplication of the programs of local broadcast stations by programs carried on CATV systems have been twice upheld against constitutional challenge. In the Carter Mountain case[79] the court rejected the argument that the Commission's nonduplication protection for local television stations contravened the first amendment. Essentially the court reasoned that since some restraint on complete freedom is inherent in all licensing regulation of radio communications, "it may be assumed that any denial of a license to transmit radio or television programs keeps off the air, and hence deprives the public of, the material which the applicant desires to communicate. But that does not mean that the Commission must grant every license which is requested. Nor does it mean that the whole statutory system of regulation is invalid. Quite the contrary is true: a denial of a station license, validly made because the standard of 'public interest, convenience, or necessity' has not been met, is not a denial of free speech.[80]"

On the same reasoning, the court again upheld the nonduplication rules against first amendment challenge in Idaho Microwave, Inc. v. FCC.[81]

---

[76] Id. at 226–27.

[77] However, NBC is read as broadly permissive in the case of program regulation as well as economic regulation. This is discussed in Parts II & III infra.

[78] 319 U.S. at 226.

[78a] See generally Part III infra.

[79] Carter Mountain Transmission Corp. v. FCC, 321 F.2d 359 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 951 (1963).

[80] Id. at 364.

[81] 352 F.2d 729 (D.C. Cir. 1965).

Neither decision deals with the constitutional issue in a satisfactory way. To be sure, licensing of radio communications involves a degree of restraint. The mere fact that some restraint may be inherent in legitimate licensing does not in itself, however, justify this particular form of regulation nor, indeed, does it bestow a constitutional carte blanche on all forms and all degrees of regulation.[82] Not even the FCC would contend, for example, that the licensing power includes the power to direct every aspect of the licensee's operations, including the particular programs presented. Moreover the reasoning is inapposite in the case of direct regulation of CATV where there is no prevailing scheme of licensing to which regulation can be said to be an incidental restraint.

While the constitutional issue was inadequately analyzed in Carter Mountain and Idaho Microwave, it was almost ignored in Buckeye Cablevision, Inc. v. FCC.[83] In Buckeye the court upheld the CATV regulations restricting carriage by the system of distant signals. Unlike Carter Mountain and Idaho Microwave the rules here were directed against CATV systems themselves and were not confined to regulating microwave carriers within the licensing jurisdiction of the Commission. The two principal challenges to the rules were that the Commission was without statutory jurisdiction to regulate CATV and, more fundamentally, that the rules violated the first amendment insofar as they precluded the system from carrying signals originating beyond a specified distance from the CATV station. Affirming the Commission's jurisdiction to regulate CATV systems directly, the court gave little more than the back of its hand to the first amendment challenge, stating that "the restraint imposed by the rules is no more than is reasonably required to effectuate the public interest requirements of the Act."[84] The court then cited NBC and Carter Mountain for support.

Taken at face value, this rather offhand statement suggests the preposterous conclusion that the Constitution is circumscribed by an act of Congress and that, so long as the Commission's actions are within the scope of its legislative mandate, there are no first amendment restrictions. Undoubtedly the court did not intend such a sweeping abdication to Congress of the judicial power to determine the scope of the first amendment. However, its refusal to go beyond the question of the legislatively created public interest standard to resolve the constitutional issue suggests just such an abdication.

The court's failure to deal with the first amendment issue is not corrected by its reliance on the Carter Mountain and NBC cases. As previously noted, the reasoning of Carter Mountain is entirely inadequate since the validity of some types and degrees of restraint does not justify all types and all degrees of restraint. Nor is the issue resolved by citing NBC. Even if the technical barriers to entry and the fact that radio is inherently not available to all justify Commission regulation of radio and television broadcasting, this clearly does not support regulation of CATV. Unlike broadcasting, CATV transmits its signals entirely by wire, and except to a negligible degree[85] transmission by wire does not interfere with other stations. From a technical viewpoint, CATV is available to all. If, therefore, Justice Frankfurter's scarcity argument is relied on as the constitutional basis for regulating radio and television, it follows that CATV is no more constitutionally subject to regulation of entry than newspapers, magazines, or other communications media. The NBC case, far from providing support for Commission regulation, as concluded by the Commission,[86] really supports the opposite result.

---

[82] Cf. Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963).

[83] 10 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 2029 (D.C. Cir. 1967).

[84] Id. at 2034. Buckeye conflicts with an earlier decision in the Ninth Circuit, Southwestern Cable Co. v. United States, 378 F.2d 118 (9th Cir. 1967), petition for cert. filed, 36 U.S.L.W. 3068 (U.S. July 13, 1967), holding that the commission had no statutory jurisdiction over non-microwave CATV.

[85] Even radio transmissions by wire emit some degree of spurious radiation which may interfere with radio broadcast signals. These spurious emissions are not of major significance, however, and can be practically eliminated by use of heavy cable. The Commission's regulations have long provided for control of such spurious emissions long before CATV itself was regulated. See 47 C.F.R. § 15.1 (1967).

[86] See Notice of Inquiry and Notice of Proposed Rule-Making, Regulation of CATV, 1 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 1679, 1709–10 (1965); see also CATV Regulation (Petition for Reconsideration of Second Report), 8 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 1677, 1681–82 (1967) (rejecting argument that regulation unconstitutionally restrains free speech, relying in part on NBC).

Following Justice Frankfurter's scarcity argument to its logical conclusion, it must be seen that abandonment of CATV regulation and the supplanting of broadcasting with CATV and other forms of wire communication would do away with the entire problem of spectrum scarcity and with it the entire ostensible basis for the regulatory scheme established by the Communications Act of 1934.

Notwithstanding what seem to be obvious fallacies in the reasoning underlying the NBC, Carter Mountain, and Buckeye cases, it does not necessarily follow that the economic regulation sustained in those decisions is unconstitutional. The problem is not that these decisions have reached the wrong result but that they have traveled the wrong path. On grounds other than those advanced in the decisions, the Commission's economic regulation and its proposed subscription television regulations seem defensible even under the strictest application of the first amendment.

Radio, television, newspaper publication, and theatre are, within limits, subject to general economic restraints and regulations. For example, no one doubts any longer that communications media, whether or not their facilities are inherently available to all, are subject to the antitrust laws. In Associated Press v. United States[87] the Court, per Justice Black, held that the antitrust laws prohibited the Associated Press from restricting member newspapers from furnishing news to nonmember newspapers. The Court rejected the contention that this application of the antitrust laws to a news media was in violation of the first amendment. "It would be strange indeed, however, if the grave concern for freedom of the press which prompted adoption of the First Amendment should be read as a command that the government was without power to protect that freedom. The First Amendment, far from providing an argument against application of the Sherman Act, here provides powerful reasons to the contrary. That Amendment rests on the assumption that the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources is essential to the welfare of the public, that a free press is a condition of a free society. Surely a command that the government itself shall not impede the free flow of ideas does not afford non-governmental combinations a refuge if they impose restraints upon that constitutionally guaranteed freedom. Freedom to publish means freedom for all and not for some. Freedom to publish is guaranteed by the Constitution, but freedom to combine to keep others from publishing is not. Freedom of the press from governmental interference under the First Amendment does not sanction repression of that freedom by private interests. The First Amendment affords not the slightest support for the contention that a combination to restrain trade in news and views has any constitutional immunity.[88]"

It may be argued that the AP antitrust case disposes of the constitutional challenge to regulations against monopoly but not of the converse, i.e., regulaions which have the effect of furthering economic concentration, and economic regulation of the kind reflected in Carroll, CATV regulation, and the proposed regulation of STV operations is directly contrary to regulation of the type upheld in the AP case since the effect really is a measure of protection of economic concentration.

One critic of the policy of imposing barriers to entry on economic grounds has contended that this latter type of economic regulation, in contrast to antimonopoly regulation, is unconstitutional.[89] He concludes that the chain broadcasting rules upheld in NBC flow logically from the Court's recognition of the scarcity of available frequencies,[90] but economic regulation of entry does not. But this distinction between regulatory limits on entry and regulatory limits on monopoly simply reflects a bias in favor of strong competition at all costs. However sound this view may be as a matter of economic or social policy, it seems rather far-fetched to give it constitutional stature.

---

[87] 326 U.S. 1 (1945).

[88] Id. at 20 (footnote omitted). The Court also relied in part on its decision in Associated Press v. NLRB, 301 U.S. 103 (1937), in which it upheld against first amendment challenge the application of the National Labor Relations Act to AP. See note 272 infra and accompanying text. It also relied on its prior decision in Indiana Farmer's Guide Co. v. Prairie Farmer Co., 293 U.S. 268 (1934), involving the application of the antitrust laws to a newspaper. However, in Prairie Farmer the first amendment issue was not raised or discussed.

[89] Givens, Refusal of Radio and Television Licenses on Economic Grounds, 46 VA. L. REV. 1391, 1400–03 (1960). Cf. Weaver v. Jordan, 64 Cal. 2d 235, 49 Cal. Rptr. 537, 411 P.2d 289 (1966), which invalidated a state statute banning subscription television (by wire) and distinguished NBC on grounds that the rules there were designed to eliminate monopoly whereas the statute here fostered monopoly.

[90] Givens, supra note 89, at 1401–02.

While it is true that economic regulation of the type considered in the Carroll case, the Commission's CATV regulation or its proposed regulation of STV may in a very real sense be economic protectionism,[91] it is nevertheless a protectionism undertaken to effect the purpose the antitrust laws were supposed by the Court in the AP case to serve—diversity of opinion. The rationale expressed by the Commission for its regulation of CATV is that CATV, left to itself, may seriously curtail if not destroy many of the local broadcast outlets whose continued existence is necessary to maintain diversified sources of free speech and opinion.

More fundamentally, the constitutionality of general economic regulation does not necessarily turn on whether the regulation has the purpose or effect of benefiting free speech itself. This is clearly the necessary conclusion to be drawn from Associated Press v. NLRB[92] which upheld the constitutionality of the National Labor Relations Act as applied to the press. Here the NLRB had entered a cease and desist order against AP under section 7 of the Act ordering it, among other things, to reinstate a member of its editorial staff whom it had discharged. AP argued that the Act, as applied to it in this manner, violated the first amendment. AP contended that in hiring and firing "it must have absolute and unrestricted freedom to employ and to discharge those who, like Watson, [the discharged employee] edit the news . . . and that the Associated Press cannot be free to furnish unbiased and impartial news reports unless it is equally free to determine for itself the partiality or bias of editorial employees . . . [A]ny regulation protective of union activities, or the right collectively to bargain on the part of such employees, is necessarily an invalid invasion of the freedom of the press.[93]"

The Court rejected the contention as irrelevant since no bias on the part of the employee had been shown. The contention was also rejected as an unsound generalization, the Court noting "[t]he business of the Associated Press is not immune from regulation because it is an agency of the press. The publisher of a newspaper has no special immunity from the application of general laws.[94]"

Unlike the AP antitrust case discussed above, the AP labor case does not in any respect turn on a presumed, ultimate benefit to the goal of free speech. It cannot be said, for example, that application of the labor laws, unlike the antitrust laws, has the effect of fostering diversity. The rationale of the AP labor case is, very simply, that communications media as commercial enterprises are no less subject to general social regulation merely because they are in the business of dissemination of news and opinion.

The same rationale, which seems quite obviously sound as a principle of constitutional law, applies to radio and television as well as to newspapers. It applies regardless of whether radio and television is distributed through a spectrum which is inherently not available to all or by means of wire which is.[95]

---

[91] See Cole, Community Antenna Television, The Broadcaster Establishment, and the Federal Regulator, 14 AM. U.L. REV. 124–25, 142–45 (1965).

[92] 301 U.S. 103 (1937).

[93] Id. at 131.

[94] Id. at 132. For an extended treatment of "general legislation" to which the "press," including radio, is subject, see 2 Z. CHAFEE, GOVERNMENT AND MASS COMMUNICATIONS 500–678 (Comm'n on Freedom of the Press ed. 1953). Chafee identifies five types of "general burdens" in this regard: (1) taxation, (2) laws against unfair competition, (3) rationing of paper (not, of course, applicable to radio), (4) labor laws, and (5) antitrust laws. Id. at 501. Of all of these general burdens, Chafee regards the application of the antitrust laws to communications industries as the most troublesome in its potential for interference with freedom of the press. Id. at 666–74. Chafee's concern in this respect seems unjustified. As he himself recognizes, the antitrust laws have not been applied to communications industries in such a manner as to raise any imminent threat to freedom of speech and the press. Nor is there anything which suggests such an application is likely in the future.

[95] But see Weaver v. Jordan, 64 Cal. 2d 235, 49 Cal. Rptr. 537, 411 P.2d 289 (1966), holding unconstitutional under the state constitution and the first amendment a statute banning subscription television. The result seems dubious. Even though the statute seemed ill-advised, it does not seem unconstitutional to proscribe certain methods of communications on general economic or other grounds not going to the content of the speech. See cases discussed in text above; cf. Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77 (1949). The court conceded the validity of general regulatory restraints of the type upheld in Kovacs or in the AP cases, but struck down the statute here because it went beyond regulation and banned subscription television entirely. But the distinction seems thin.

It is important to stress that acceptance of this rationale in support of the constitutionality of the Commission's regulations is not necessarily an acceptance of the Commission's statutory power. It is particularly necessary to distinguish statutory from constitutional authority in the CATV area.[96] Moreover, in order to accept this rationale, one need not accept the necessity or the wisdom of the Commission's regulatory policy in all respects. In the case of CATV regulation one might take the view that the Commission's regulation goes too far. One can even take the extreme view that the Commission's regulatory policies in this area are the handiwork of the economically and politically influential members of the industry.[97] Similarly one might conclude that the proposed restrictions on STV operations, such as limiting STV to markets having five or more commercial services, are unnecessary and overly protectionistic. But an unwise or unnecessary policy does not become transformed into an unconstitutional policy merely because free expression is in some way involved. If this were the case, there are many antitrust, labor, social, and economic measures in effect today which might well be unconstitutional as applied to any form of communications media.

While it might be granted that the Commission could limit or proscribe altogether a CATV system's competition with broadcast stations in certain markets where this is deemed necessary to the public interest, it is arguable that the Commission cannot achieve this same result by proscribing certain types of CATV programming and that it therefore cannot impose restrictions simply because the CATV programs duplicate local programming or because they originate in a "distant market." In the abstract, the argument has a certain persuasiveness. Certainly the power to achieve a given economic result such as protection from "disruptive" competition does not include the power to achieve it by any and all means. Assuming the power of the Commission to preclude CATV entry into certain markets entirely,[98] it clearly cannot impose unconstitutional restrictions or conditions on entry.[99] Plainly the Commission could not tell a CATV system that it could operate in a given locale, but only on the condition that it carry such particular programs as the Commission approved as suitable for the residents of that locale.

However, the mere fact that a particular program classification is used to implement the regulatory objective does not necessarily indicate that the Commission is engaged in censorship. The Commission's CATV program nonduplication rules which, in general, preclude a CATV system from carrying television programs which duplicate the programs carried on the same day by local broadcast stations, illustrate the problem. Although the effect might be to proscribe a particular classification of programming, the classification is a neutral one, based not on program content or quality but simply on the timing and manner of presentation. The effect is not to keep such programming from being presented but to restrict the number of entirely duplicative presentations at substantially the same time. Thus, what is really involved here is not a true classification of programs but a classification of signals. If it is accepted that economic regulation in general is constitutional, then given a justifiable economic objective such as the elimination of duplicate programming, such restraints as the CATV nonduplication rule seem constitutional.[100]

An analogous albeit somewhat more troublesome problem is presented by the new subscription television regulations proposed by the Commission's STV

The Act did not ban all television communications but only the business of charging directly for television. Query whether the extent of the restraint on such an incident of communications and not directed to the content of the communications goes any further than the restraint upheld in Kovacs or restraints imposed in applying general economic regulation of the type sustained in the AP cases.

[96] That is, statutory authority in the jurisdictional sense. Of course, since § 326 of the Act, 47 U.S.C. § 326 (1964), is in substance an incorporation of the first amendment's prohibition of "censorship," anything which unconstitutionally interferes with free speech also violates § 326.

[97] See Cole, supra note 91.

[98] But see Weaver v. Jordan, 64 Cal. 2d 235, 49 Cal. Rptr. 537, 411 P.2d 289 (1966).

[99] E.g., Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963); Hannegan v. Esquire, Inc., 327 U.S. 146, 156 (1946); Terral v. Burke Constr. Co., 257 U.S. 529 (1922).

[100] The same reasoning would hold true of the CATV rules restricting carriage of "distant" signals, i.e., signals originating beyond a certain distance from the community served by the CATV system. Here regulation is again drawn on a classification of program signals, a differentiation between local and distant signals. Like nonduplication, the classification is not based on a judgment of program quality or desirability but on the purely neutral factor of distance (which again is used as a means of achieving a measure of economic protection).

Committee. The proposal to prohibit broadcast of feature films which are more than two years old, current sports events regularly carried live on local conventional stations, series-type programs, and combined feature film and sports totaling more than ninety per cent of a station's annual STV programming would appear to go beyond the kind of CATV nonduplication protection previously discussed. Here certain types of programs, not merely the manner of their presentation, are singled out and forbidden to be carried on STV. Such predetermination of allowable program types would seem clearly unconstitutional if imposed as a flat restraint against presentation on television altogether.

However, such a conclusion is not dispositive here. By prohibiting STV from carrying movies which are more than two years old, the Commission would not be attempting to make a program judgment about the relative quality or acceptability vel non of older movies. It would instead be acting on the economic prediction that presentation of older films by STV would siphon such programming away from free television thereby impairing the vitality of the latter.[101] The same economic judgment underlies the proposed regulation which would prohibit STV from carrying current sports events, regularly carried live on free television,[102] and from carrying series-type programs,[103] which, along with movies, have been a mainstay of free television. As in the case of CATV nonduplication regulation, the aim of these rules is not to render judgment on particular types of programs but rather to achieve certain economic goals based on classifications which relate to programming types. As the STV Committee Report points out, such a structuring of the channels of distribution seems entirely consistent with the first amendment, even though it necessarily places some limitation on the dissemination of speech.[104]

The foregoing does not mean, of course, that the Commission has a constitutionally free rein to do as it pleases in the field of economic regulation. More particularly, it does not mean that, under the guise of economic or social regulation fostering diversity of speech, it can control the speech itself to ensure that the dissemination of ideas is sufficiently diverse according to its judgment. In this respect, the STV Committee's proposal to restrict a station's annual STV programming to not more than ninety per cent feature film and sports programs clearly seems to go beyond any general economic regulation. The sole basis for such a rule is to force STV to present cultural programming.[105] Such a rule is based squarely on a judgment as to the type of programming deemed to be desirable, a judgment which goes beyond general economic regulation and enters, subtly but surely, into the area of program regulation, where the Commission's regulatory policies and actions seem to be of far more doubtful constitutional validity.

II. REGULATION AND CONTROL OF PROGRAMMING

While the first amendment implications of the Commission's activity in the field of economic regulation have received relatively little attention, the Commission's regulatory efforts in the field of programming have provoked considerable comment. This is understandable in view of the far more doubtful constitutionality of many of its activities and policies in program regulation. The analysis of the constitutional implications of the Commission's regulation of programming has, however, tended to be undiscriminating. Little attention has been given to the different regulatory measures which control or influence programming and to the distinct effects of and the different constitutional problems raised by such measures.

A. Direct restraints against illegal, harmful, or offensive programming

1. Commission Actions From Dr. Brinkley to Pacifica—

To date the Commission has instituted direct action against a station for broadcast of particular programs in only a few cases. These include defamatory programs,[106] programs involving improper and harmful medical advice[107] or medical advertising,[108] broadcasts relating to illegal lotteries,[109] broadcasts of certain horseracing information,[110] broadcasts of fradulent contests,[111] and "offensive" programming.[112] In several such cases, however, although the Commission instituted action by issuing a show cause order or by instituting a hearing on license revocation or renewal, it has taken no final action either because it was persuaded that the programming was in fact satisfactory[113] or because it was satisfied that the licensee's "bad" performance would not be repeated.[114]

---

[101] See STV Report 1705–07.

[102] See id. at 1707–13.

[103] See id. at 1714.

[104] Id. at 1705. Accepting this argument, however, I do not, for reasons previously set forth at length, subscribe to the Committee's reliance on the sweeping pronouncements laid down in the NBC case as support for its proposed regulation. See id. at 1704–05.

[105] See id. at 1712–13.

The earliest case involving direct restraint in the regulation of programming is the Dr. Brinkley case.[115] While much as been made of this famous case, more attention has been given to the atrocious opinion by the court of appeals in affirming the Radio Commission's action than to the facts which led the Commission to refuse to renew Dr. Brinkley's license for a radio station. Dr. Brinkley controlled a radio station, a pharmaceutical association, and a hospital which he operated in a common interest. The hospital was advertised over the station and paid a substantial amount to the station each month for this advertising. The pharmaceutical association was composed of druggists who dispensed medical preparations prepared according to Brinkley's formulas. Each member of the association paid a nominal fee to the station for use of the formulas. For three and one-half hours daily, Brinkley personally broadcast a program over the station devoted to diagnosing and prescribing treatment for cases from symptoms given in letters addressed to Brinkley or the station. Predictably, the good doctor's treatment was in almost all cases to prescribe one of his prepared tonics.

It was against this background that the Radio Commission denied Brinkley's aplication for renewal. On appeal the decision was affirmed by the court of apeals on the grounds that: (a) the operations of KFKB were being used for the purely private purpose of furthering Dr. Brinkley's other business and professional interests with no regard for the public interest; and (b) that use of the station for diagnosing the problems of and prescribing treatment for patients whom Brinkley had never even seen was inimical to the public health and safety and, therefore, was not in the public interest.

In 1936 the Commission set down for hearing a renewal application by a licensee which had carried advertisements of two medical preparations. One of these was prepared and sponsored by a person convicted of practicing medicine without a license, while the other was prepared and sponsored by a person convicted of violating the Food and Drug Act and of fraudulent use of the mails in promoting the advertised preparations. However, because the licensee had previously cancelled the advertisements, apparently after learning of these facts regarding the sponsors, and had an otherwise good record, the license was renewed.[116]

Shortly after the Radio Commission had refused to permit Dr. Brinkley to continue to use radio frequencies to further his "organized charlatanism," is was confronted with the Reverend Doctor Shuler, another "doctor," of similarly doubtful character.[117] The Radio Commission refused to renew Shuler's broadcast license based on findings that he was using his licensed frequency for defamatory broadcasts and for obstructing the orderly administration of public justice. As in the Brinkley case, the Commission's action seems clearly justified on the facts. Shuler's defamatory broadcasts evidently consisted of more than an occasional lapse of caution and judgment in criticizing individuals. In reviewing the evidence on which the Commission made its finding, the court of appeals noted that Shuler "not satisfied with attacking the judges of the courts in cases then pending before them, attacked the bar association for its activities in recommending judges, charging it with ulterior and sinsister purposes. With no more justification, he charged particular judges with sundry immoral acts. He made defamatory statements against the board of health. He charged that the labor temple in Los Angeles was a bootlegging and gambling joint. . . . On one occasion he announced over the radio that he had certain damaging information against a prominent unnamed man which, unless a contribution (presumably to the church) of a hundred dollars was forthcoming, he would disclose . . . . He alluded slightingly to the Jews as a race, and made frequent and bitter attacks on the Roman Catholic religion and its relations to government." [118]

---

[106] Trinity Methodist Church, South v. Federal Radio Comm'n, 62 F.2d 850 (D.C. Cir. 1932), cert. denied, 288 U.S. 599 (1932).

[107] KFKB Broadcasting Ass'n v. Federal Radio Comm'n, 47 F.2d 670 (D.C. Cir. 1931).

[108] See WSBC, Inc., 2 F.C.C. 293 (1936).

[109] WRBL Radio Station, Inc., 2 F.C.C. 687 (1936).

[110] Community Broadcasting Serv., Inc., 13 P & F RADIO REG. 179 (1955).

[111] KWK Radio, Inc., 25 P & F. RADIO REG. 577 (1963); cf. Melody Music, Inc., 6 P & F. RADIO REG. 2d 973 (1966) (involvement in fixed quiz show not involving station considered as bearing on "character" of renewal applicant); Eleven Ten Broadcasting, 22 P & F RADIO REG. 699 (1962) (also involving other matters, however, such as program log falsification).

[112] Mile High Stations, Inc., 20 P & F RADIO REG. 345 (1960); Pacifica Foundation, 1 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 747 (1964) (licensee exonerated); cf. Palmetto Broadcasting Co., 23 P & F RADIO REG. 483 (1961), aff'd sub nom. Robinson v. FCC, 334 F.2d 534 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 843 (1964) (also involved, however, misrepresentations to Commission).

[113] See Pacifica Foundation, 1 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 747 (1964).

[114] See Mile High Stations, 20 P & F RADIO REG. 345 (1960).

[115] KFKB Broadcasting Ass'n v. Federal Radio Comm'n, 47 F.2d 670 (D.C. Cir. 1931).

[116] WSBC, Inc., 2 F.C.C. 293 (1936).

[117] Trinity Methodist Church, South v. Federal Radio Comm'n, 62 F.2d 850 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 288 U.S. 599 (1932).

On these findings the court of appeals, not surprisingly, held that the Commission's refusal to renew Shuler's license was not a violation of the first amendment.

Pursuant to section 1304 of the United States Criminal Code,[119] the Commission has long scrutinized broadcasts of information about prize-giving schemes and taken action against those found to be lotteries. The Commission's power, indeed, its duty to enforce the mandate of section 1304 and to implement it by means of general rule or individual decisions was expressly affirmed in FCC v. American Broadcasting Company.[120]

The Commission has also proscribed the broadcast of horseracing information in a manner and under such circumstances that it is evident that the information is being used by bookmakers and others for illegal gambling purposes.[121]

An extension of its action in the Brinkley case and its action in lottery and horseracing cases is the action taken by the Commission against programs involving some form of fraudulent contest. In Eleven Ten Broadcasting Corp.[122] the Commission denied the renewal of a station's license on finding that the licensee had, among other things, conducted "fraudulent" contests over its station. Although the Commission evidently considered the fraudulent contest alone sufficient to support denial of the license, it relied on other grounds, including deliberate falsification of the station's program logs and other misrepresentations to support its action. Subsequently, in KWK Radio, Inc.,[123] the Commission was confronted with a similar fraudulent contest, except that the "fraudulent" program itself was the only matter before it. The Commission revoked the station's license on the basis of findings that it had conducted fraudulent contests which, the Commission found, resulted in deception to the public, inconvenience, "public disorder," and in some instances actual property damage.[124]

Related to the KWK case is the Commission's more recent action in making a short-term renewal grant in Melody Music, Inc.,[125] which grew out of the famous quiz show scandal of 1959 in which some contestants on a popular quiz program were given the answers to the questions beforehand. There, however, the matter was considered in a context somewhat different from that in KWK. In Melody Music the station itself had not been held responsible for the deceptive quiz program. One of the two principals of the station had, however, been involved in the rigged contest. As a result the Commission set the renewal application down for a hearing on the character qualifications of the two principals. In its first opinion[126] the Commission denied the renewal application of the station on these grounds. On appeal, the court of appeals for the District of Columbia reversed,[127] stating that the Commission had treated the licensee differently here than it had in NBC,[128] where the Commission had renewed NBC's license notwithstanding the fact that its parent corporation (RCA) had violated the antitrust laws. The evident discrimination was made even more patent by the fact that in Melody, unlike NBC where a violation of law was involved, the rigging of quiz shows shows was not at that time a violation of law.[129] On remand the Commission was able to avoid the impossible task of distinguishing the case from other cases in which it renewed the licenses of applicants convicted of violating the antitrust laws. The principals had applied to assign the license to other, presumably untainted. persons. Seizing this opportunity to rescue itself from a bad position. the Commission granted a short-term renewal on condition that the present licensee divest itself of its broadcast interest.

---

[118] 62 F.2d at 852.

[119] 18 U.S.C. § 1304 (1964), formerly § 316 of the Communications Act of 1934: "Whoever broadcasts by means of any radio station for which a license is required by any law of the United States, or whoever, operating any such station, knowingly permits the broadcasting of, any advertisement of or information concerning any lottery, gift enterprise, or similar scheme, offering prizes dependent in whole or in part upon lot or chance, or any list of the prizes drawn or awarded by means of any such lottery, gift enterprise, or scheme, whether said list contains any part or all of such prizes, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both. Each day's broadcasting shall constitute a separate offense."

[120] 347 U.S. 284, 289 (1954). The Court held, however, that the rules there adopted by the Commission were too broad.

[121] See Community Broadcasting Serv., Inc., 13 P & F Radio Reg. 179 (1955) (also discussing other cases). A brief statement of Commission policy guidelines as to the types of horseracing broadcasts which are considered questionable by the Commission was subsequently issued in Broadcast of Horse Racing Information, 22 P & F Radio Reg. 417 (1961), reaff'd, Broadcast of Horse Racing Information, 2 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 1609 (1964).

[122] 22 P & F Radio Reg. 699 (1962).

[123] 25 P & F Radio Reg. 577 (1963).

[124] Id. at 581–82.

[125] 6 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 973 (1966).

The foregoing cases all dealt with programs which were fraudulent, illegal, or at least patently harmful. Several recent cases focus on a more difficult problem: control of programming deemed to be improper, indecent, or offensive. At the present time, there remains some uncertainty whether the Commission will attempt any direct restraint on programming which it deems merely offensive and, if it does, what circumstances might prompt it to take direct action against such programming.

In Mile High Stations, Inc.,[130] the Commission issued an order to show cause why an AM license should not be revoked where the station's announcer had made a number of offcolor remarks over a period of several months. Although the Commission regarded the remarks as sufficiently offensive to warrant license revocation, it declined to take such action and instead simply issued a cease and desist order against further broadcast announcements of this kind.

The problem of what action could be taken against such programming was posed again in Palmetto Broadcasting Company.[131] The Commission, in response to complaints received concerning programs which were allegedly vulgar and suggestive, requested from the licensee a statement concerning the complaints. In response to the request, the licensee stated that he was unaware at the time that such offensive statements were made. Subsequently, the Commission designated the licensee's application for renewal of its license and for construction of an antenna system for a hearing on the issues, among others, of whether the licensee had misrepresented facts to the Commission or was otherwise lacking in candor, whether the programming was "coarse, vulgar, suggestive and susceptible of indecent, double meaning," whether the licensee had permitted such program material, and whether, in light of those facts determined on these issues, the applications should be permitted. The hearing examiner found against the licensee on all of these issues and concluded that it had not, therefore, served the interests of the community. He proposed that the applications be denied. The Commission affirmed the examiner's findings but modified his conclusions of law, holding that the licensee's misrepresentations and false statements, in and of themselves, constituted grounds for denial of the applications. On appeal, the court of appeals affirmed on the narrow grounds that because of the licensee's concealment of material facts, the Commission was justified in its conclusion that the licensee did not possess the requisite character qualifications and was, therefore, justified in refusing to renew the license.

---

[126] 2 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 571 (1964).

[127] 345 F.2d 730 (D.C. Cir. 1965).

[128] 345 F.2d at 732; see also General Electric Co., 2 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 1038 (1964); Westinghouse Broadcasting Co., 22 P & F Radio Reg. 1023 (1962).

[129] Rigged quiz shows are now proscribed by 47 U.S.C. § 509 (1964).

[130] 20 P & F Radio Reg. 345 (1960).

[131] 23 P & F Radio Reg. 483 (1962), aff'd sub nom. Robinson v. FCC, 334 F.2d 534 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 843 (1964).

Subsequently, in Pacifica Foundation,[132] the Commission was again confronted at renewal time with complaints directed at several programs which were said to be of questionable taste. This time the Commision refused to take any action, holding that even if the programs were of questionable taste, they were isolated instances spread out over a four year period anad did not demonstrate any persistent lapse of taste, and that the programs were not so egregiously offensive as to warrant Commission action.

2. First Amendment Implications—

In the relatively few cases in which the Commission has singled out for review or taken direct action against particular programs, the constitutional implications of the Commission's actions are largely self-evident. Because the restraint exercised in these cases is directed at particular program content, some form of censorship is necessarily involved. The issue then becomes simply whether or not, on the particular facts, such censorship is constitutional.

While it is not difficult to envision circumstances in which action of the type reflected in the previously discussed cases might well be unconstitutional, it is difficult to find any unconstitutionality in the few cases decided to date, although several recent Commission cases give rise to some concern. Consider first, for example, the Commission's refusal to renew Dr. Brinkley's broadcast license. On the facts of that case, this action can scarcely be considered extraordinary or patently unreasonable. The Commission imposed no greater restraint than could constitutionally have been imposed by other, even more direct means wholly without regard to Brinkley's use of a radio station. Surely a law which outlawed unethical medical practice and which was enforced by means of revocation of a license to practice could not be considered an unconstitutional abridgment of free speech.[133] The refusal to renew Brinkley's broadcast license seems no more unconstitutional than the action taken by the state of Kansas in suspending his medical license for unethical conduct.[134] Surely the Commission's refusal of a license to Brinkley because of his fraudulent practices is no more unconstitutional than the actions of the Food and Drug Administration or the Federal Trade Commission in enforcing provisions of the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act, the Federal Trade Commission Act, and other acts which regulate labeling and other representations of drugs and medical preparations which are of doubtful safety or efficacy. So far as is known, no one has ever seriously suggested that these acts constitute an unconstitutional abridgement of free speech.

Unfortunately, in discussions about the Brinkley case today, attention is focused less on the extraordinary facts which underlie the Commission's actions than on some sweeping and foolish language in the opinion of the court of apeals in affirming. Despite defensible grounds for affirming the Radio Commission's actions, the court of appeals reasoned that there was no censorship and no first amendment violation because there had been no attempt at a prior restraint. "In considering the question whether the public interest, convenience or necessity will be served by renewal of . . . [this] license, the commission has merely exercised its undoubted right to take note of . . . past conduct, which is not censorship." [135]

It scarcely needs pointing out that this reasoning would give the Commission a constitutional carte blanche to take virtually any action it chose against station practices, particular types of programming, or particular programs which it deemed not in the public interest. Fortunately, it is unnecessary to pursue the parade of evils which might ensue from the court of appeals' opinion in the Brinkley case since its reasoning was clearly rejected by the Supreme Court's opinion in Near v. Minnesota,[136] handed down only a few months after the Brinkley case, which made it clear that the reach of the first amendment was not confined to restraints imposed prior to the exercise of speech. Thus, the court of appeals' opinion is of doubtful significance today. Nevertheless, on its special facts, the Brinkley case should be and is good law today. The mere fact that the court affirmed on unacceptable grounds should not obscure the fact that this was an extraordinary case which warranted the drastic action taken.

---

[132] 1 P & F Radio Reg 2d 747 (1964).

[133] This is not to say, of course, that there may not be constitutional requirements for adherence to certain procedures, e.g., an adjudicatory hearing to be followed in revoking a license.

[134] At the time of the proceedings before the Radio Commission, Brinkley was also before the Kansas State Medical Examination Board in a proceeding to revoke his medical license for "having acted according to the ethical standards of an imposter" and for "organized charlatanism." Brinkley v. Hassig, 130 Kan. 874, 289 P. 64 (affirming denial of an injunction against medical board proceedings), appeal dismissed, 282 U.S. 800 (1930).

[135] 47 F.2d at 672 (D.C. Cir. 1931).

[136] 288 U.S. 697 (1931).

Essentially the same considerations which justified the Commission's actions against Brinkley hold true of the Shuler case, although perhaps to a less compelling degree. The restraint imposed by the Commission in this later case seems not materially different in kind or effect from restraints imposed by courts in actions for defamation or for contempt of court. With few exceptions, these latter restraints have been generally accepted as constitutionally permissible. For example, a civil action for an injunction or damages against Shuler for his defamatory utterances would probably have been constitutional at the time when the Commission refused renewal of his license, although some of his remarks against public officials would probably now be protected under the Sullivan case doctrine.[137]

One critic of the decision has concluded that the essential facts of the Shuler case are indistinguishable from those of Near v. Minnesota and that the decision is irreconcilable with Near.[138] However, it seems extreme to say that the cases are irreconcilable. Near does not proscribe all attempts to curb defamatory utterances. It did not say that it could never be constitutional to refuse to permit a person to operate a communications medium which had repeatedly engaged in defaming persons and obstructing justice. The primary evil of the statute struck down in Near was its broad and vague scope. It applied not merely to defamatory utterances but to publication of scandalous matter. Moreover, the statute in effect placed the burden of proof on the newspaper, since it was not necessary to prove the falsity of the defamatory utterances before a court could enjoin them. While the facts as reported in the Shuler case do not permit a detailed comparison of all of the facts and circumstances, these evils do not appear to have been present in that case. This is not to say, of course, that Commission actions in this area are not subject to the same constitutional scrutiny as applied in Near.

The constitutional implications of the Commission's actions in restraining the use of broadcast facilities for broadcasting lottery and other illegal gambling information are in substance no different from those raised by the Commission's actions in the Brinkley case. Once again the action of the Commission is not essentially different from that of other agencies such as the Post Office or Justice departments. So far as is known, no one has seriously challenged those provisions of the United States Criminal Code which proscribe the dissemination of lottery information or other information which aids and abets gambling[139] as being unconstitutional. The Supreme Court in the American Broadcasting case gave no indication that antilottery laws, reasonably construed, pose any serious first amendment problems. The same basic considerations apply to restraints against the broadcast of fraudulent contests such as that involved in the KWK case.[140] the Commission is doing very little more than is done, for example, by the FTC[141] or the Post Office Department[142] or, in a more restricted area, the SEC[143] or the FDA,[144] and the constitutionality of these "antifraud" measures can scarcely be seriously questioned.[145] This is not, however, to suggest that there are no first amendment problems here. There are surely some outer constitutional limits on what the Commission can restrain in the name of "fraud." These limits are suggested by the rigged quiz show scandal where relatively harmless deception, done for the chief purpose of enhancing entertainment value, was equated with fraud by both the Commission[146] and Congress.[147] This particular problem in defining fraud is unique to Commission regulation since, outside the field of Commission regulation, civil, criminal, and regulatory actions against fraud and misrepresentation are confined to cases which have long been accepted as actionable at common law or at least those in which it is likely to cause ascertainable public harm. The Commission, however, does not need to look to the traditional definitions of or limitations on actions for fraud. It can, in its view, always proceed under the all-encompassing cloak of "public interest." [148] It is here that the real problem lies.

---

[137] New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964).

[138] Sullivan, Editorials and Controversy: The Broadcaster's Dilemma, 32 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 719, 758 (1964).

[139] In 1961 Congress made it a crime to use wire communications facilities for the transmission of wagering information by persons engoged in the business of betting or wagering. See 18 U.S.C. § 1084 (1964).

[140] 25 P & F RADIO REG. 577 (1963); see also Eleven Ten Broadcasting Corp., 22 P & F RADIO REG. 699 (1962).

[141] 15 U.S.C. §§ 52, 53a, 54a (1964); see, e.g., Koch v. FTC, 206 F.2d 311 (6th Cir. 1953).

[142] 39 U.S.C. § 4005 (1964); see, e.g., Donaldson v. Read Magazine, Inc., 333 U.S. 178 (1948).

[143] See § 17 of the Securities Act of 1933, 48 Stat. 84 (1933), as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 77q (1964); § 15 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, 48 Stat. 895 (1934), as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 780 (1964); SEC Rule 10b–5, 7 C.F.R. § 240.10b–5; 3 L. LOSS, SECURITIES REGULATION 1423–30 (2d ed. 1961).

[144] 21 U.S.C. §§ 321(k), (m) (1964); see, e.g., Kordel v. United States, 335 U.S. 345 (1948).

More troublesome than the potentially broad exercise of power to proscribe "fraud" which is not really fraud is the exercise of power by the Commission to proscribe "offensive" programming. The Commission's action in Mile High Stations,[149] although the result was favorable to the licensee, indicates the need for concern over the exercise of sweeping powers to proscribe programming which the Commission finds offensive or improper. Mile High Stations did not attract particularly wide attention, probably because the licensee did not contest the constitutional issue but simply pleaded ignorance of the station announcer's offensive remarks. Since the Commission forgave the licensee this one trespass and terminated the show cause proceeding with a warning, apparently few were concerned with the action of the Commission which raises a serious question of whether restraint of the speech in that case was constitutional.

The Commission's subsequent action in the Palmetto[150] case has attracted wider attention. In one sense, however, the action in Palmetto is less troublesome than the action in Mile High Stations. The Commission's actions in Palmetto have been criticized as being, in substance, direct censorship of program content notwithstanding the Commission's unwillingness to rest its decision on the grounds that the program content was vulgar, indecent, and offensive.[151] While this may be, it is important to note that on its facts Palmetto is somewhat of an exceptional case in that there were misrepresentations of material fact which could be said to bear on the character of the licensee. Clearly the Commission has some latitude in passing on the character of licensees even though the Commission's findings as to character qualifications may in some instances be connected with or related to program issues.

This is not to say that the Commission would be constitutionally justified in using character qualifications as a dodge to evade the constitutional issues which are confronted when particular programming is called into question.[152] For example, it would clearly be improper and unconstitutional for the Commission to examine a particular program or type of program, decide for itself that the program is bad, and then take action against the licensee, not on the basis of the particular program, but on the basis of the licensee's lack of character qualifications as indicated by the bad programming. Palmetto itself, however, does not necessarily indicate that the Commission is disposed to proceed in such a manner, since in Palmetto there were misrepresentations to the Commission as to circumstances surrounding the programming.

---

[145] See Donaldson v. Read Magazine, Inc., 333 U.S. 178, 189–92 (1948), where the Court affirmed the power of Congress to control fraudulent practices (here under the postal fraud statutes): "[T]he constitutional guarantees of freedom of speech and freedom of the press [do not] include complete freedom, uncontrollable by Congress, to use the mails for perpetration of swindling schemes." Id. at 191.

[146] See Melody Music, Inc., 6 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 973 (1966).

[147] See 47 U.S.C. § 509 (1964).

[148] It may be that in the narrow area of quiz programs the Commission would be limited by the statutory requirements of § 509 of the Act. However, § 509 would presumably not be interpreted as a limitation on the Commission's power under the Act to take action in the "public interest" against other types of "fraud."

[149] 20 P & F RADIO REG. 345 (1960).

[150] 23 P & F RADIO REG. 483 (1961), aff'd sub nom. Robinson v. FCC, 334 F.2d 534 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 843 (1964).

[151] Note, Regulation of Program Content by the FCC, 77 HARV. L. REV. 701, 712–14 (1964).

[152] See BROWN, Character and Candor Requirements for FCC Licensees, 22 LAW & CONTEMP. PROB. 644, 654–55 (1957).

The fears raised by the Commission's action in Palmetto have been at least partly allayed by its subsequent decision in the Pacifica case.[153] Perhaps most significant is the reason given by the Commission for refusing to take action against the licensee for broadcasts which had occasioned many public com-against the licensee for broadcasts which had occasioned many public complaints.

> "We recognize that, as shown by the complaints here, such provocative programming as here involved may offend some listeners. But this does not mean that those offended have the right, through the Commision's licensing power, to rule such programming off the airway. Were this the case, only the wholly inoffensive, the bland, could gain access to the radio microphone or TV camera. No such drastic curtailment can be countenanced under the Constitution, the Communications Act, or the Commission's policy. . . ."[154]

Even if Pacifica does not entirely set to rest all fears raised by Palmetto and Mile High Stations it does suggest that the Commission intends to proceed cautiously in this area.

While the Commissioon's authority to impose direct restraints on obscene, defamatory, or other socially harmful programming poses significant first amendment problems, the actions of the Commission to date probably do not warrant grave concern since they have been fairly circumscribed within the ambit of restraints constitutionally justifiable and permitted for nonregulated communications media.

3. Control of Advertising: A Note in Passing—

Until its recent "fairness doctrine" ruling that stations advertising cigarettes must devote time to expression of the view that smoking is a health hazard,[154a] the Commission's attempts to "regulate" the advertising practices, as such, of broadcast stations had been minimal, limited, and largely ineffectual. Leaving direct supervision and control of deceptive advertising practices to the Federal Trade Commission,[155] the FCC has traditionally confined its concern almost exclusively to excessive advertising, with an occasional foray into advertising of certain products[156] or overly loud commercials.[157] With respect to excessive advertising, although the Commission did at one time propose to adopt fixed rules imposing time limitations similar to those of the NAB Codes, the proposal was abandoned principally as a result of a strong congressional opposition.[158] As a result, the Commission's efforts in this area have been made largely through "scrutiny" at renewal time[159] and the usual panoply of techniques incident to renewal, including admonitory letters to offending licensees[160] and short-term renewals.[161]

---

[153] 1 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 747 (1964).

[154] Id. at 750.

[154a] Letter to WCBS-TV, 9 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1423, petition for reconsideration denied, 11 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1901 (1967). See text accompanying notes 259–63 infra.

[155] The Commission has established a "liaison" with the FTC whereby the latter advises the FCC of "questionable advertising" broadcast over radio and television stations. Any determination of deceptive advertising—or perhaps even "questionable" advertising—is taken into account by the FCC in weighing whether the licensee is operating "in the public interest." Liaison Between FCC and FTC Relating to False and Misleading Radio and TV Advertising, P & F RADIO REG., Current Service vol. 1, at 11:201 (1957); see generally Developments in the Law—Deceptive Advertising, 80 HARV. L. REV. 1005, 1019–27, 1063–1101 (1967).

[156] Knickerbocker Broadcasting Co., 2 F.C.C. 76 (1935) (advertising of birth control product). In the case of liquor, the Commission has confined its activities to approval of the self-regulation standards of the NAB codes which prohibit advertising hard liquor, NAB, THE TELEVISION CODE 14 (§ IX, ¶ 5) (11th ed. 1966), and impose other restrictions on advertising methods, see Developments in the Law, supra note 155, at 1155.

[157] See Objectionable Loudness of Commercials, 5 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1621–22 (1965), making certain revisions in regulations to control loudness and adopting a "Statement of Policy" concerning loud commercials proscribing certain practices in commercial announcements

[158] Commercial Advertising Standards, 1 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1606 (1964); see also Commercial Practices of Broadcast Licensees, 2 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 885 (1964) (dissent of Chairman Henry). Congressional opposition was manifested, among other ways, in a bill introduced at the time to strip the Commission of its power to prescribe rules governing the length and frequency of advertsements. See id. at 890. Although the Commission in 1964 declined to adopt fixed standards along the lines of those set by the NAB, it recently did announce a policy of requiring licensees to justify a failure to observe NAB Code limits on commercial time (18 minutes per hour for radio, 16 minutes per hour for television). See BROADCASTING MAGAZINE, March 6, 1967, at 36–37.

[159] Overcommercialization has on relatively rare occasions occurred in the context of initial applications. See, e.g., Michigan Broadcasting Co., 20 P & F RADIO REG. 667 (1960) (designation for hearing on issues relating to number and length of commer-

It is difficult to know how to assess, from a first amendment viewpoint, the Commission's efforts in the field of advertising controls, since it is doubtful that commercial advertising is "speech" protected by the first amendment.[162] While this reflects a rather circumscribed view of the first amendment, which deserves to receive more critical analysis than it has thus far received, it is beyond the scope of the present article. Even if commercial advertising were within first amendment protection, it is doubtful whether those of the Commission's regulatory actions which impose direct restraints on advertising practices involve any serious encroachment on such first amendment protection as is accorded to advertising. Curbs on overcommercialization and on certain techniques of advertising such as overloudness seem generally justifiable in the context of rradio and television to the same extent they are in comparable situations outside the field of radio and television.[163] And, of course, curbs on false or fraudulent advertising are clearly constitutional under established authority.[164] The constitutional implications of the indirect restraints on cigarette advertising imposed by the Commission's recent fairness doctrine decision will be discussed below.

B. General program regulation through the licensing process

1. General Program Standards—

The Commission's regulation of programming is, of course, by no means confined to direct proscription of undesirable programs. More often the nature of the FCC's action is indirect, tending to influence the broadcast of certain programming by imposition of general standards or through informal oversight of the licensee's programming policies. While the Commission's actions in the area of direct restraint have been relatively circumspect to date, its indirect influence on program policies evidences a greater control of program choice and this poses far greater constitutional problems.

Typically, the Commission attempts to achieve what it euphemistically referred to as "program balance" and "programming in the public interest." The first comprehensive statement of Commission policy on programming balance and on the responsibility of broadcasters to program in the public interest was the Commission's famous Blue Book:

"In issuing and in renewing the licenses of broadcast stations the Commission proposes to give particular consideration to four program service factors relevant to the public interest. . . . (1) the carrying of sustaining programs, including network sustaining programs, with particular reference to the retention by licensees of a proper discretion and responsibility for maintaining a well-balanced program structure; (2) the carrying of local live programs; (3) the carrying of programs devoted to the discussion of public issues; and (4) the elimination of advertising excesses." [165]

Although its policies were invoked in several cases to question renewal applications not meeting the announced standards,[166] the Blue Book, as such, cials): Sheffield Broadcasting Co., 21 P & F RADIO REG. 507 (1961) (comparative demerit for overcommercialization); Travelers Broadcasting Serv. Corp., 6 F.C.C. 456 (1938) (application for assignment of license denied).

---

[160] See BROADCASTING MAGAZINE, March 6, 1967, at 36–37.

[161] Gordon County Broadcasting Co., 24 P & F RADIO REG. 315 (1962); Mississippi Arkansas Broadcasting Co., 22 P & F RADIO REG. 305 (1961).

[162] See Valentine v. Chrestensen, 316 U.S. 52 (1942). For an excellent treatment of the constitutional question, see Developments in the Law, supra note 155, at 1027–38.

[163] Cf. Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77 (1949).

[164] Donaldson v. Read Magazine, Inc., 333 U.S. 178 (1948); Regina Corp. v. FTC, 322 F.2d 765, 770 (3d Cir. 1963).

[165] FCC, PUBLIC SERVICE RESPONSIBILITY OF BROADCAST LICENSEES 55 (1946). For an excellent discussion of the background of the Blue Book, see L. WHITE, THE AMERICAN RADIO 182–99 (Comm'n on Freedom of the Press ed. 1947); see also 2 Z. CHAFEE, GOVERNMENT AND MASS COMMUNICATIONS 689–94 (Comm'n on Freedom of the Press ed. 1947). The Blue Book evoked strong condemnation from the broadcast industry. Illustrative is the statement of the Chairman of CBS who denounced it as "government program-censorship" and "the most direct threat yet made by government to interfere with programming." Paley, "Radio and Its Critics." Address to NAB, October 22, 1946, quoted in 2 Z. CHAFEE, supra at 636.

Strong criticism was also voiced from outside the industry, both on grounds of regulatory wisdom as well as doubtful constitutionality. See L. WHITE, supra at 193–99, 229–30. Without getting into the question of wisdom, Chaffee did not view the Blue Book as posing a serious first amendment problem. 2 Z. CHAFEE, supra at 637–38.

[166] The Community Broadcasting Co., 12 F.C.C. 85 (1947); Howard W. Davis, 12 F.C.C. 91 (1947); Eugene Roth, 12 F.C.C. 102 (1947).

never assumed the permanent substantial importance that it was undoubtedly intended to have. Today it is all but forgotten as anything more than an historical source of Commission policy, and is never directly relied on.

However, the basic policies outlined in the Blue Book have not been abandoned. The same "program service factors" continue to occupy the Commission's attention although the Commission, learning form its experience with the Blue Book, has attempted to avoid stating its standards in terms of absolute demands. Basically the same emphasis on "balanced programming," but with somewhat less emphasis on "sustaining" versus "commercial" programs and the same emphasis on public service programming are inherent in the Commission's "modern" policy statement.[167] and in its current practices. Neither its concern for "local live" programming[168] nor its concern over excessive advertising[169] has in any way abated.

Program balance and programming in the public interest are determined by the Commission principally on the basis of an analysis of past or proposed programming in terms of categories established by the Commission as representative of all of the major different types, and on the basis of an assessment of whether the programs meet the needs, tastes, and interests of the station's service area. Of critical significance in the latter regard is the applicant's efforts to ascertain those needs, tastes, or interests.

Part IV, "Statement of Program Service," of the broadcast applications required for new stations, major changes in facilities, transfer of control, and assignment or renewal of license, is the heart of the Commission's direct regulatory oversight of programming. A detailed statement as to the amount and percentage of proposed programming is required and, in cases of renewal or assignment and transfer, a detailed statement supported by station program logs showing the past programming in each of the specified program categories is mandatory.[170]

The particular classifications used by the Commission have long been widely criticized in the industry as being arbitrary, vague, meaningless, needlessly detailed, and burdensome to the station. Each station is required (a) to maintain detailed logs in which each of the programs is carefully recorded in one of the categories, and (b) to analyze the logs at renewal time to obtain the information required in the renewal application. Even the Commission has recognized the validity of the criticism directed at the arbitrariness and vagueness of the categories. In 1965 it revised the AM-FM program classifications, and in 1966 it adopted similar changes for television.[171] The validity of the other criticisms has not been recognized. Indeed, the new forms are, if anything, more detailed and more burdensome. The Commission's expanding concern with the nature of the program service presented and its apparent use of program classification as a means of influencing stations to provide programming of a certain type have, however, raised even more troublesome questions.

While the effort of a broadcast station applicant to seek out community interests has long been one of the criteria taken into account in comparative hearings,[172] it did not play a major role in the Commission's consideration of individual applicants until the 1961 Suburban Broadcasters decision.[173] Since that time, however, the Commission has given increased attention to the efforts made by an applicant or licensee to become familiar with and to demonstrate how its programming will serve the service area's tastes, needs, and interests.[174] This policy, while theoretically applicable to all programming, has in recent years been reflected principally as a concern for increased local live programming, especially during "prime time" hours.[175]

---

[167] Statement of Policy on Programming, 20 P & F RADIO REG. 1901 (1960). On program balance and service, the following oft-quoted statement is generally the point of departure for the Commission: "The major elements usually necessary to meet the public interest, needs and desires of the community in which the station is located as developed by the industry, and recognized by the Commission, have included: (1) Opportunity for Local Self-Expression, (2) The Development and Use of Local Talent (3) Programs for Children, (4) Religious Programs, (5) Educational Programs, (6) Public Affairs Programs, (7) Editorializing by Licensees, (8) Political Broadcasts, (9) Agricultural Programs, (10) News Programs, (11) Weather and Market Reports, (12) Sports Programs, (13) Service to Minority Groups, (14) Entertainment Programming." Id. at 1913.

[168] See note 175 infra and accompanying text.

[169] See notes 155 161 supra and accompanying text.

[170] The Commission's recently revised programming forms for AM, FM, and television prescribe the following primary categories of programming: agricultural, entertainment, news, public affairs, religious, instructional, sports, and others. Three secondary categories are established: editorials, political programs, and educational institution programs. Under this revised procedure, a station maintains logs classifying each program into the above categories but is required to show overall amounts of programming only in the following: news, public affairs, and all other programs exclusive of entertainment and sports.

[171] AM-FM Program Forms, 5 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1773 (1965); Television Program Forms, 8 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1512 (1966).

2. Licensing New Facilities: Single Applicant—

Despite constant protests by the Commission that it is not concerned with the content of particular programs or that it does not require a station to broadcast a certain amount of any type of programming, its actions belie these disclaimers. This is most clearly indicated in the Commission's practice of pressing all applicants onto the procrustean bed of "acceptable" program categories.

A seeming exception to this attitude might be seen in the fact that the Commission has been willing to allow AM and FM stations to engage in specialized programming in one or a few of the standard program categories, on a showing that overall program balance is provided by complementary program schedules.[176] However, the exception only proves the rule. Absent very special circumstances, the broadcaster who fails to provide a respectable percentage of programming in the categories which the Commission has selected as representative of balanced programming in the public interest does so, or, what is substantially the same, reasonably believes that he does so, at his peril.

The Commission's decision in Lee Roy McCourry[177] illustrates this. In McCourry the applicant applied for a license for a new UHF television station, proposing a specialized programming format comprised of seventy per cent entertainment and thirty per cent education programs. Based principally[178] on the applicant's failure to offer any special justification for not providing for religious, agricultural, news, discussion, or similar programming,[179] the Commission set the application down for hearing on the issues, inter alia, of whether the applicant had investigated community needs and whether the applicant's specialized format would meet these needs. The immediate effect of the Commission's action was simply to require McCourry to justify his programming. However, as noted by the dissent, this was virtually tantamount to denial of the application in this case or was, in any event, a heavy sanction for failing to conform to the Commission's idea of a proper pattern of programming.[180]

The McCourry case is certainly no cause celebre. Despite a strong dissent, the case probably cannot be regarded as a significant departure from the [172] Under the so-called "planning and preparation" criteria. E.g., WHDH, Inc., 13 P & F RADIO REG. 507, 555-59, 576–77 (1957), remanded on other grounds sub nom. Massachusetts Bay Telecasters, Inc. v. FCC, 261 F.2d 55 (D.C. Cir. 1958).

---

[173] 20 P & F RADIO REG. 951 (1961), aff'd sub nom. Henry v. FCC, 302 F.2d 191 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 371 U.S. 821 (1962). The decision was purportedly based on the comprehensive program policy announced a year earlier in its Statement of Policy on Programming, 20 P & F RADIO REG. 1901 (1960), which emphasized the preeminent importance of a "diligent, positive and continuing effort [by the licensee] to discover and fulfill the tastes, needs and desires of the service area."

[174] E.g., Washington Broadcasting Co., 5 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 653 (1965) (assignment of license); Chapman Radio & Television Co., 4 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 532 (1965) (application for new facilities); WCSC, Inc., 1 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 619 (1964) (dissent to renewal without hearing).

[175] See, e.g., Address by Commissioner Ford, Virginia Association of Broadcasters, June 20, 1963, reprinted in FCC Release No. 37,118; Omaha Local Television Programming Inquiry, 1 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1901 (1963); WCSC, Inc., 1 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 619 (1964) (dissent).

[176] See, e.g., Herbert Muschel, 23 P & F RADIO REG. 1059 (1962). At least a theoretical distinction should be drawn between specialized programming in this sense and programming oriented towards the special needs of a minority group in the station's service area which may still be accomplished by adherence to a "balanced" program schedule with programs in each of the various categories. The Commission has also approved this type of "special audience" programming. See Voice of Charlotte Broadcasting, 6 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 355 (1965).

[177] 2 P & F RADIO REG. 895 (1964).

[178] In addition to the programming issue, issues as to adequacy of staffing, financial qualifications, and main studio location were involved. Id. at 897.

[179] Id. at 896.

[180] Id. at 901–02.

Commission's longstanding insistence on the ascertainment of community needs and on basic conformity to a balanced program format in the context of comparative hearings and renewal proceedings.

3. Licensing New Facilities: The Comparative Hearing—

The Commission's procedure for determining which of two or more applicants for the facility[181] is by comparison more deserving of a broadcast permit has long been held up by critics as a classic example of the administrative process at its worst.[182] Inadequately guided by Commission procedures and standards, the prodigious efforts by the parties to compile a complete and comparatively superior record produce little more than staggering records.[183]

It is not the purpose of this Article, however, to criticize the comparative hearing process or the comparative criteria. The concern here is only with those aspects of the comparative hearing process which relate to program regulation and its constitutional implications.

The Commission's focus on an applicant's proposed programming in a comparative hearing is not essentially different from its examination of the program proposals of a noncomparative single applicant. The Commission typically evaluates comparative applicants on the basis of their efforts to survey and ascertain community needs and interests and on the basis of a quantitative evaluation of each applicant's program balance based on the respective percentages of time to be devoted the various program types defined by the Commission.[184] Where the applicants each show respectable balance in the various categories,[185] the Commission is quick to deny any judgment of qualitative difference between particular programs.[186]

It is true, however, that the comparative hearing has a somewhat different impact on program discretion than does the hearing in a noncomparative situation. Unlike the McCourry type of situation, for example, there is no occasion here for setting an application for hearing on the basis of insufficient balance or other assumed defects in proposed programming, since mutually inconsistent applications must go to hearing anyway. Every application set for a comparative hearing is set for a hearing on the standard comparative issue.[187]

---

[181] The term "comparative hearing" is often used, inaccurately, to designate all hearings on mutually inconsistent applications. There are significant differences, however, between the scope of a true comparative hearing involving two or more applicants for the same frequency in the same location and a hearing on mutually inconsistent applications for stations in different communities which propose the mutually incompatible use of co-channel or adjacent channel frequencies—generally referred to as a "307(b) hearing." The comparative hearing is focused on the so-called "standard comparative issue," a broad issue encompassing comparisons between applicants on numerous criteria. See note 187 infra. However, the more limited 307(b) hearing is focused on a comparison of the service needs of the respective communities and considerations of relative efficiency in the utilization of frequencies. See, e.g., Bible Institute of Los Angeles, Inc., 24 P & F Radio Reg. 205 (1962). Thus, the 307(b) hearing does not contemplate a comparison of the respective proposed programming or program-related operations (such as staffing, etc), although under certain circumstances programming issues may be added. See, e.g., Saul M. Miller, 24 P & F Radio Reg. 550 (1962); Granite City Broadcasting Co., 18 P & F Radio Reg. 852 (1959).

[182] E.g., W. Jones, Licensing of Major Broadcast Facilities by the Federal Communications Commission, Report to the Administrative Conference of the United States, Committee on Licenses and Authorizations 198–204 (1962); Friendly, The Federal Administrative Agencies: The Need For Better Definition of Standards, 75 Harv. L. Rev. 1055, 1065–72 (1962); Schwartz, Comparative Television and the Chancellor's Foot, 47 Geo. L.J. 655 (1959).

[183] WHDH, Inc., FCC 66 D-47, at 264 (1966). Some idea of the magnitude of the hearing in WHDH (resulting from the reopening of a decision based on earlier hearings held in 1954–1955!) may be gleaned from the size of the examiner's opinion, 252 pages of which are devoted to findings of fact alone.

[184] See, e.g., Central Coast Television, 1 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 237, 247 (1963); Jefferson Standard Broadcasting Co., 24 P & F Radio Reg. 319, 331–32 (1962); Florida Gulfcoast Broadcasters, Inc., 23 P & F Radio Reg. 1, 8 (1962).

[185] E.g., Policy Statement on Comparative Broadcast Hearings, 5 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 1901 (1965); Sunbeam Television Corp., 5 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 85, 87 (1965); Florida Gulfcoast Broadcasters, 23 P & F Radio Reg. 1, 8 (1962).

[186] E.g., Jefferson Standard Broadcasting Co., 24 P & F Radio Reg. 319, 332 (1962). The Commission's eschewing of "qualitative" comparisons is criticized in Irion, FCC Criteria for Evaluating Competing Applicants, 43 Minn. L. Rev. 479, 492–94 (1959). It is perhaps significant that Irion, one of the most highly regarded FCC hearing examiners, evidently sees no major first amendment problem involved in the evaluation of the quality of particular programming and program proposals.

[187] The "standard comparative issue" is an exceedingly broad statement of the key issue in comparative hearings (not in "307(b) hearings"). The formulation of the standard comparative issue is as follows:

To determine on a comparative basis which of the operations proposed in the above-entitled applications would best serve the public interest, convenience, and necessity in

On the other hand, the Commission may add other issues directed to specific questionable aspects of a party's application.[188] An applicant proposing what the Commission regards as questionable program policies may have the application set for a hearing on the so-called "Suburban issue," theoretically designed to investigate what efforts the applicant has made to determine and satisfy the needs and interests of its proposed service area. Although the standard comparative issue substantially includes this investigation, the significance of the additional "Suburban issue" is that it is a potentially disqualifying issue unrelated to the comparative merits of the applicants. If one applicant buys out or merges with competing applicants, the standard comparative issue becomes moot, but the disqualifying issue does not.[189] In such a case, the Commission will insist on investigating whether the remaining applicant has met its burden on the disqualifying issues.

4. Renewal of License: In Terrorem Control—

The discussion above focused on the method by which the Commission controls programming by setting standards to which a broadcast applicant must conform if he is to succeed in obtaining a license. The process of license renewal every three years adds a new dimension to this control. The renewal process is the primary tool used by the Commission to enforce continuing compliance with the demands initially made on an applicant. Without this instrument it would be difficult if not impossible to effect any real control of programming operations. If a licensee fails to adhere to the standards of its promised performance, the Commission may, of course, revoke the license. Such a procedure is, however, too cumbersome to be practical. A license revocation proceeding entails initiation by the Commission of a formal hearing in which the Commission must bear the burden of proof of noncompliance with the law or unsatisfactory performance by the licensee.[190] The procedural burdens of a revocation proceeding would impede and deter Commission enforcement, and would eliminate any real in terrorem effect from the threat of revocation.

The effectiveness of the renewal process in influencing a licensee's operations, including his program operations, arises from two facts. First, the licensee has the burden of coming forth, in a formal application, to show compliance with Commission standards and fulfillment of prior promises;[191] second, this process is routine and relatively frequent, thereby eliminating any doubt that the Commission will scrutinize the actual performance of the station in relation to the performance promised.

The manner in which the renewal process is carried out by the Commission makes it far more than merely a periodic inspection. Rather the renewal process has become the primary method through which the Commission exer-light of the record made with respect to the significant differences between the applicants as to:

---

(a) The background and experience of each of the above-named applicants having a bearing on its ability to own and operate the proposed television station.

(b) The proposals of each of the above-named applicants with respect to the management and operation of the proposed station.

(c) The programming service proposed in each of the above-entitled applications.

WHDH, Inc., 13 P & F Radio Reg. 507, 515 (1957).

Within this broad formulation, criteria have crystallized which are supposed to be relevant in deciding among applicants (although many of these criteria are petty and not conceivably important and several are mutually contradictory). Prior to the Commission's 1965 Policy Statement on Comparative Broadcast Hearings, the accepted criteria were: (1) local residence; (2) civic participation; (3) diversification of occupations of principals; (4) experience; (5) integration of ownership with management; (6) past broadcast record; (7) planning and preparation; (8) program policies; (9) program proposals; (10) studio and equipment; (11) staff; (12) diversification of ownership of mass communications media. WHDH, Inc., supra at 566–85. See generally, Leon, FCC Criteria for Evaluating Competing Applicants, 43 Minn. L. Rev. 479 (1959). The 1965 Policy Statement retains most of these criteria but purports to establish some degree of priority among them and explain their proper implementation. Whether the 1965 Policy Statement has really clarified or resolved the contradictions and erased any of the nonsense that has characterized the interpretation and implementation of these criteria remains to be seen [188] These may be added on the Commission's own motion or by motion of the parties to enlarge issues. See, e.g., Springfield Telecasting Co., 3 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 727 (1964).

[189] See, e.g., Tri-Cities Broadcasting Co., 6 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 1, 2 (1965).

[190] See 48 Stat. 1086 (1934), as amended, 47 U.S.C. § 312(c) (1964).

[191] In the event the application is set down for hearing, the licensee has the burden of proof. E.g., Office of Communication of the United Church of Christ v. FCC, 359 F.2d 994 (D.C. Cir. 1966).

cises day-by-day control over virtually all broadcast operations, and particularly over program practices and program operations. Thus, the fact that the licensee must go through the trial and prove himself every three years is in a very real sense a "Sword of Damocles" over the broadcaster's head. If the sword does not often fall, neither is it ever lifted and the in terrorem effect of the sword's presence enables the Commission to exercise far-reaching powers of control over the licensee's operations.

It is this in terrorem aspect of periodic renewal which one former FCC Commissioner labeled "regulation by the lifted eyebrow,"[192] a label which has since gained considerable currency in the field of administrative regulation. A letter to the station from the Commission or even a telephone call to the station's Washington attorney from the Commission's staff indicating the Commission's "concern" over a particular practice of the licensee and asking for the licensee's justification will generally be all that is necessary to bring the licensee around to the Commission's way of thinking. If not cultivated, the technique is at least used to great advantage by the Commission, which almost invariably makes a point of informing the licensee that its inquiry and the licensee's response will be associated with the licensee's file and given "due consideration" upon his next application for renewal.

If a Commission inquiry or expression of concern over a licensee's practices can be expected to have an influential effect on the licensee, the effect is even greater when the Commission makes such inquiry at renewal time or notifies the licensee that it is deferring action on pending renewal applications until it has received answers to its questions. An example is the Commission's action in Local Live Programming of Television Stations[193] where the Commission sent letters to five stations deferring renewal applications because of an inadequate showing of local live programming in prime time and requesting information as to local live programming presentations and plans and efforts to ascertain community needs. In spite of the Commission's request for further information, it is extremely doubtful whether the Commission really expected to receive any information which would add meaningfully to what the licensee had already reported. What the Commission seeks in such cases is not information but assurance that future operations will conform to Commission standards, and it would be incredible if the experienced broadcaster or his Washington counsel would mistake the Commission's handwriting on the wall.[194]

For the more recalcitrant, there are stronger methods short of revocation. One is the frequently employed short-term renewal (generally for one year) during which time the licensee is made aware that he is "on probation."[195]

The practice of informal control over or influence on individual licensee practices is also followed on an industry-wide basis through statements of Commission concern over particular practices or announcements of proposed action.[196] This is enhanced by speeches of individual commissioners. Former

---

[192] Commissioner Doerfer dissenting in Miami Broadcasting Co. (WQAM), 14 P & F RADIO REG. 125, 128 (1956).

[193] 25 P & F RADIO REG. 482 (1963).

[194] Cf. Pierson, The Need for Modification of Section 326, 18 FED. COM. B.J. 15, 19–20 (1963): "The lawyer [advising his client as to type of program] has a number of guides. First, in his day-to-day dealings with the Commission and its staff, he learns of their attitudes toward various kinds of proposals. He knows that certain program proposals are accepted and favorably processed with alacrity. Other program proposals create problems not only of getting expeditious action but of getting favorable action. On occasion his client is almost directly threatened with costly litigation unless program proposals are changed. In addition, Commission decisions, statements of policy and the public statements of its members afford insight into Commission attitudes toward various types of programming. With these as guides, the lawyer can quite unerringly outline to his client the programs that the Commission favors and disfavors . . . . To deny that this constraint exists is to indulge pure myth. To say that . . . an applicant proposes or 'promises' programs on the basis of his independent judgment of the needs and wants of his area compounds the myth."

[195] See, e.g., Lamar Life Broadcasting Co., 5 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 205 (1965) (one year renewal because of questionable "fairness" in presenting views on controversial public issues); Loyola Univ., 24 P & F RADIO REG. 766 (1962) (one year renewal because of significant deviations from previous program promises).

[196] See, e.g., 6 TELEVISION DIGEST 2–3 (1966) (press report that staff "reportedly" urges Commission to send letters to ten AM stations inquiring as to their failure to carry political broadcasts); 6 TELEVISION DIGEST 2 (1966) (report of staff proposing to send letters to nineteen AM stations which proposed to devote less than 5% of their time to "public affairs" and "other," i.e., agricultural, religious, and similar nonentertainment categories programming).

Chairman Minow's famous "Wasteland Speech" is a classic example.[197] However, less sweeping and dramatic speeches in which some comment is made on program policies have become almost a matter of routine. While some of these speeches are inconsequential, there can be no doubt that many are valuable as a source of at least one commissioner's thinking on a given subject.

5. First Amendment Implications—

The Commission's insistence on the licensee's presenting "balanced" programming, although done in the name of promoting diversity, has had largely the opposite effect. Notwithstanding repeated criticism by various commissioners of the undeniable sameness of programming among broadcasters, the Commission's own policies do little to encourage diversity or originality either in the style or content of individual programs or in the overall format of a station's program operations. Indeed, its policies have, if anything, added to the inherent tendency of broadcasters to conform to safe, established patterns of operation and programming.

Insistence by the Commission that the licensee maintain respectable percentages of its total programming in the various program categories is one example of such a policy. Adherence to these categories by the licensee does not necessarily fix the content of specific programs within each category. The unmistakable result of prescribing categories in which all licensees are expected to present some programming is, however, sameness of program formats among licensees. Following the Commission's guidelines, for example, each station will generally present a religious discussion program or coverage of a church service at least one Sunday a month; a regularly scheduled farm news or discussion program, no matter how urban the area; and, to satisfy the ambiguous category of "talks," a "homemaker" show at least once a week. There emerges a pattern of sameness in conformity with safe and acceptable standards bearing the FCC seal of approval. While the licensee may decide the particular content of programs within each accepted category, he must maintain a balance among the accepted categories. He deviates at his peril as is illustrated by the McCourry[198] case where the applicant was required to justify, in a formal hearing, his deviation from the Commission's standard of "balance" because of his failure to conform to the pattern of programming in each of the accepted categories.

Commissioner Cox, one of the most vigorous and articulate defenders of the Commission's programming policy, has attempted to justify the Commission's action in McCourry on the ground that the Commission has the responsibility to ensure that licensees ascertain and serve the needs and interests of their service areas, and the failure of the applicant in McCourry to justify its failure to show "balanced" programming fully warranted and indeed required the Commission to hold a hearing to determine whether the applicant would serve the public interest.[199] This simply begs the question.

Even under the most expansive interpretation of the first amendment, the Commission is not forbidden to insist that an applicant show that it has made an effort to ascertain the general needs and interests of the community to be served and that its operations will serve those needs and interests. Moreover, it does not seem either unconstitutional or unreasonable for the Commission to require that, in attempting to ascertain and serve the needs of the community, the licensee must apply his own judgment, not that of the network or some other program supplier. Simmons v. FCC[200] illustrates this problem. There the Commission denied an application on the ground that a proposal to broadcast the complete, unaltered CBS network schedule would be an abdication of licensee responsibility and would not serve the public interest. In affirming, the court held that there was no censorship involved.[201]

But it is one thing to require an applicant or licensee to demonstrate that it has made, by itself, a good faith, reasonable effort to ascertain and serve the needs of the public; it is quite another for the Commission to set forth a catalogue of the types of programs which it considers the public interest to require, and then to require that an applicant or licensee conform its programming to these standards unless it can offer compelling reasons for a varying format. Notwithstanding the fact that this action was purported to be merely an inquiry into whether McCourry had really investigated the needs of his prospective service area and whether his programming would serve those needs, no one familiar with FCC practice could doubt that the action was intended to influence McCourry—and other future applicants who could be counted on to take due note of the Commission's actions—to modify the program format to conform with the Commission's concept of balanced programming.

---

[197] Address to the 39th Annual Convention of the National Association of Broadcasters, May 9, 1961.

[198] 2 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 895 (1964).

[199] Cox, The FCC, the Constitution and Religious Broadcast Programming, 34 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 196, 207 (1965).

[200] 169 F.2d 670 (D.C. Cir. 1948); cf. Churchill Tabernacle v. FCC, 160 F.2d 244 (D.C. Cir. 1947).

[201] 169 F.2d at 672.

That the threat of an agency hearing is in itself, regardless of potential outcome, an effective method of imposing program standards is even more persuasively demonstrated in cases involving applications for renewal of existing licenses. The threat of a hearing on renewal is virtually certain to induce the licensee to conform to the established standards of balanced programming, except in those cases where, for good cause shown, the Commission has approved specialized programming.

The conformity principle can also be seen at work in the comparative hearing process. Here, however, the effect of an evaluation of the applicants' respective program proposals is not immediately apparent. Although the program proposals, formats, and policies of the applicants are among the criteria for choosing between them, the Commission never gives express decisional importance to the superiority of one applicant's program proposals, even in "quantitative" terms. Indeed, it is unusual to find a decision in which the Commission even awards a preference to one applicant in the area of programming. Generally, any preferences granted in the area of programming are expressed as preferences for a superior showing as to an applicant's efforts to survey and ascertain community needs. On the basis of the Commission's decisions, then, it might appear that there is no problem of restraint, since the Commission purports to give so little attention to a comparative evaluation of programming proposals. But appearances are deceptive, as are the Commission's published decisions.

In many, if not most cases, no preference could be granted on the basis of program proposals since there is no discernible difference of substance between them. This sameness is largely attributable to similar network program fare, particularly where both propose an affiliation with the same network. To some extent, sameness of programming is also attributable to the fact that radio and television stations, like other commercial enterprises, generally strive to meet the widest possible market. To a significant degree, however, the sameness is also attributable to the Commission's own efforts to supervise programming operations. The trend to conformity and sameness is inherent in the Commission's insistence on adherence to "balance," defined as devoting respectable percentages of program time to each of the categories prescribed by the Commission. The trend to conformity and sameness is particularly encouraged by the comparative hearing process itself.[202]

It takes relatively little imagination on the part of an applicant competing for a license to realize that he must develop a format of balanced programming which will pass muster under the Commission's examination. It takes even less imagination, talent, or creativity to put such a format into effect. It is small wonder then that most applicants, with the help of Washington counsel, develop program proposals which will pass the balance test and which will compare, neither more nor less favorably, with any other applicant's balanced proposals.[203] The Commission encourages this practice. If some applicant gets carried away with the idea of something special in the way of programming, the Commission is likely to discount his proposals as impractical and unlikely to be effectuated.[204]

In defense of the Commission's use of program types, Commissioner Cox has suggested that the program categories are not the Commission's creation but that they reflect the basic program interests of the public, as reported by broadcasters before the time when such categories were established. According to this argument, the categories were developed simply for convenience to broadcasters in reporting the programming which they presented and for ease of processing applications by the Commission.[205] The thrust of this argument is that the use of specified program categories is simply a convenient method of getting information.

---

[202] See Pierson, The Need for Modification of Section 326, 18 FED. COM. B.J. 15, 19–21 (1963).

[203] Id.

[204] See, e.g., Veterans Broadcasting Co., 4 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 375 (1965).

It may be that the mere requirement that a licensee report his programming in the various categories, as an incident to recordkeeping activities by the Commission does not raise any significant first amendment problem. But Commissioner Cox's suggestion that the licensee's report of programming is purely a recordkeeping exercise seems to be less than a candid explanation of the purpose of the report and the use to which it is put, and as the Supreme Court has on more than one occasion emphasized, the fact that an inquiry can be justified as merely routine cannot be accepted as a cloak which shields such activity from constitutional objection if the character of the inquiry, or the manner and circumstances in which it is done, accomplish a restraint on free speech.[206]

Perhaps more basically troublesome than the encouragement of conformity is the fact that it is impossible to tell whether the Commission is in fact making value judgments about programming while its published opinions deny that it is doing so. One can scarcely accept the gratuitous and self-serving statements made by the Commission in its opinions that it has not recognized or given any decisive significance to any difference between program proposals. Since the Commission is not wholly oblivious to the constitutional implications of the close supervision of programming, it is not surprising that the opinions, written to be as "appeal-proof" as possible, attempt to show an abundance of caution and restraint in this area.

It is sometimes suggested that, whatever the constitutional limits on direct program regulation or even on indirect program influence, the Commission has full constitutional authority to consider and pass judgment on the programming of two or more applicants in a comparative hearing, as a basis for choosing between them. Such a distinction between comparative program evaluation and other forms of program regulation is suggested by two of the leading cases on FCC regulatory authority in the field of programming, Bay State Beacon, Inc. v. FCC [207] and Johnston Broadcasting Company v. FCC.[208] In Bay State the court held it was not a violation of the first amendment or section 326 [209] for the Commission to consider, as a factor in selecting one comparative applicant over another, a quantitative analysis of the amount of time to be devoted by the respective applicants to commercial vis-a-vis noncommercial programs. The court reasoned that the program analysis merely indicated how the applicant would perform in the public interest and that, if the Commission could not make such an inquiry as to programming, it would be unable to perform its duty to ensure that the public interest, convenience, and necessity were being served. The court went on to state that if denial of a license to the unsuccessful applicant on the basis of inferior program proposals violated the first amendment, "then every unsuccessful applicant would have the right of free speech throttled and abridged." [210] In Johnston the court again approved the Commission's preference for one comparative applicant over another on the basis of program proposals. The court reasoned "It is true that the Commission cannot choose on the basis of political, economic or social views of an applicant. But in a comparative consideration, it is well recognized that comparative service to the listening public, is the vital element and programs are the essence of that service. So, while the Commission cannot prescribe any type of program (except for prohibition against obscenity, profanity, etc.), it can make a comparison on the basis of public interest and, therefore, of public service.[211] "

Insofar as the courts in Bay State and Johnston intended to distinguish between evaluation of programming in the context of comparative hearings and other forms of direct or indirect program supervision by the Commission, the reasoning is something less than clear. Implicit in the suggested distinction is the assumption that because there must be some basis for selection between applicants it is proper, indeed necessary, to weigh the comparative merits of the applicant's respective program proposals.

---

[205] Cox, supra note 199, at 199–201.

[206] See, e.g., Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60 (1960); Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516 (1960); NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (1958); cf. Brown, Character and Candor Requirements for FCC Licensees, 22 LAW & CONTEMP. PROB. 644, 654–55 (1957).

[207] 171 F.2d 826 (D.C. Cir. 1948).

[208] 175 F.2d 351 (D.C. Cir. 1949).

[209] 47 U.S.C. § 326 (1948).

[210] 171 F.2d 826, 827 (D.C. Cir. 1948).

[211] 175 F.2d 351, 359 (D.C. Cir. 1949).

As to any supposed necessity for choosing between applicants on the basis of program proposals, it is sufficient first to note the numerous other bases for comparative evaluation which in no way involve judgments as to programming. There is scarcely any inherent necessity in basing a selection on an evaluation of program proposals. Second, the convenience or even necessity of evaluating program proposals to fulfill the statutory mandate of effecting the public interest, convenience, and necessity can scarcely warrant an intrusion into constitutionally prohibited areas. In the final analysis there is no basis whatsoever for singling out the comparative hearing process as some special justification for control of program choice. The Commission's program regulation policies are just as questionable in this area as in a noncomparative hearing context.

The ultimate ostensible aim of the Commission's emphasis on program balance and its general insistence on programming in all of the key program categories is the advancement of diversity of viewpoints, ideas, and entertainment. This same general aim is the underlying rationale for regulation of more direct impact and more far-reaching implications: regulation of the broadcasting of political and controversial public issues. It is here that the constitutional problems of the Commission's program regulation are brought most sharply into focus.

C. Regulation of political broadcasts and controversial public issues programming

Few areas of broadcast regulation have been as controversial as the regulation of political broadcasts and controversial public issues programming. Acting under the equal time requirements of section 315 of the Communications Act fo 1934 and pursuant to its so-called "fairness doctrine," the Commission has come under increasingly heavy criticism from the industry, Congress, and even some of its own members because of its interference with broadcasters' discretion and responsibility in this area of programming.[212] Although political broadcasts and controversial public issues programming may appear in many respects to pose but a single regulatory problem, they in fact pose two distinct, though related, problems with distinct, and somewhat different, constitutional implications.

1. Equal Time—

Section 315 of the Communications Act of 1934 provides:

"(a) If any licensee shall permit any person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office to use a broadcasting station, he shall afford equal opportunities to all other such candidates for that office in the use of such broadcasting station. . . .

"(b) The charges made for the use of any broadcasting station for any of the purposes set forth in this section shall not exceed the charges made for comparable use of such station for other purposes.

"(c) The Commision shall prescribe appropriate rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of this section."[213]

An exception from the equal time requirement is provided for appearances by candidates on bona fide news, interview, or documentary programs, so long as the licensee continues "to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance."[214]

The concept of equal time in itself is essentially a simple one, and in most cases its requirements are relatively clear and direct.[215] The Commission's key rulings on the principal problems of scope and interpretation are summarized in its Equal Time Primer[216] and have been quite fully explored by others.[217] It is, therefore, sufficient here merely to sketch the outline of the equal time requirements. The equal time requirements are much more limited than is popularly supposed. First of all, the duty to provide equal opportunity arises only when a legally qualified,[218] bona fide candidate himself[219] makes an appearance on the station either live or on tape for any purpose[220] except an appearance in connection with a news program or interview.[221] There is no specific obligation on the station to carry political broadcasts in the first instance, although a refusal to carry any political broadcasting may be considered against the licensee at renewal time when the Commission decides whether the station has been operated in the public interest.[222] In addition, the station is not required to seek out the opposing candidites. The initiative is on the opposing candidate to request equal time[223] within one week of the broadcast.[224]

---

[212] See, e.g., Hearings on Equal Time Before the Subcomm. on Communications of the Senate Comm. on Commerce, 88th Cong., 1st Sess., ser. 29 (1963); Hearings on Political Broadcasting before the Communications Subcomm. of the Senate Comm. on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. (1959); see also Dean, Political Broadcasting: The Communications Act of 1934 Reviewed, 20 Fed. Com. B.J. 16, 38–43 (196

[213] 48 Stat. 1088 (1934), as amended, 47 U.S.C. § 315 (1964).

[214] 48 Stat. 1088 (1934), as amended, 47 U.S.C. § 315(a)(4) (1964).

[215] Those problems of construction which have been raised in the application of equal time can be generally summarized under the following questions: (1) who are legally qualified candidates?; (2) what constitutes "equal" opportunity?; (3) what constitutes a "use" by a political candidate?; and (4) what is a bona fide "newscast," "news interview," "news documentary," or "news events"?

Enforcement of section 315 generally arises on complaint[225] to the Commission by a candidate who has been denied equal time. The licensee is notified of the complaint and given time to reply. Once an order is issued, the order can be enforced through the usual means of fines, cease and desist orders, and even denial of license renewal or license revocation for willful and repeated violations.[226] However, the issuance of a ruling that a candidate is entitled to equal time has apparently sufficed in all or virtually all cases. No case has been found in which any formal sanctions were invoked. The reason for this is obvious since compliance, or attempted compliance in good faith with a prior ruling is all that is required. Since judicial review can be had from the informal ruling,[227] a refusal to comply in order to test the correctness or the constitutionality of the ruling is unnecessary. In any event, the sanctions risked by noncompliance are quite evidently regarded as more important to the broadcaster than his right not to accord equal time.

Notwithstanding the fact that section 315 is quite limited, not only as to the period in which it is operative but also as to the scope of the obligation imposed, the equal time requirements have been the subject of unrelenting critisism over the years, and a number of attempts have been made to modify or repeal section 315.[228] Probably the most severe attacks have been aimed at the Commission's interpretation of section 315, which has generally tended to expand the scope of the section. The classic example is the Commission's Lar Daly[229] decision, holding that the appearance of an incumbent political candidate on a newscast and a separate announcement on behalf of the March of Dimes constituted a "use" entitling all other candidates to equal time. This remarkably obtuse decision called forth a flood of criticism which was quickly followed by congressional reversal of the decision, and the present exemptions for bona fide news events.

---

[216] Political Broadcasts, 24 P & F RADIO REG. 1901 (1962) (incorporating earlier summaries).

[217] E.g., Friedenthal & Medalie, The Impact of Federal Regulation on Political Broadcasting: Section 315 of the Communications Act, 72 HARV. L. REV. 445 (1959); Comment, 30 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 63 (1961).

[218] See Political Broadcasts, 24 P & F RADIO REG. 1901, 1913–15 (1962).

[219] Equal time is not required where another person appears on behalf of the candidate. Felix v. Westinghouse Radio, 186 F.2d 1 (3d Cir. 1950), cert. denied, 341 U.S. 909 (1951).

[220] The Commission has ruled in numerous instances that a candidate who appears for any purpose or in any capacity, even in that of a station announcer, is a use by the candidate requiring equal time. See Political Broadcasts, 24 P & F RADIO REG. 1901, 1908–12 (1962). But see Brigham v. FCC, 276 F.2d 828 (5th Cir. 1960), where the Fifth Circuit held that a station weatherman's appearance on a program to present the weather report was not a use although the weatherman was also a candidate. This may be rationalized, however, on the exemption for bona fide news broadcasts rather than any exemption for candidates who make appearances for nonpolitical purposes.

[221] 47 U.S.C. § 315 (1964); see Political Broadcasts, 24 P & F RADIO REG. 1901, 1908–13 1962).

[222] Licensee's Obligation to Carry Political Broadcasts, 25 P & F RADIO REG. 1731 (1963).

[223] "Equivalent" time means equivalent in terms of rates charged (or absence of rates), length of time, desirability of the time spot offered, and any other conditions of use. See Political Broadcasts, 24 P & F RADIO REG. 1901, 1919–21 (1962).

[224] 47 C.F.R. § 13.657(e) (Supp. 1966).

[225] The Commission does, when asked, also render declaratory decisions without any complaint. E.g., Columbia Broadcasting Sys., 3 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 623 (1964).

[226] See 47 U.S.C. §§ 307(d), 312(a) & (b), 504(b) (1964).

[227] See Felix v. Westinghouse Radio, 186 F.2d 1 (3d Cir. 1950), cert. denied, 341 U.S. 909 (1951).

[228] See, e.g., S. 1010, 89th Cong., 1st Sess. (1965); S. 1696, 88th Cong., 1st Sess. (1963). For criticism before Congress of § 315, see Hearings on Equal Time before the Subcomm. on Communications of the Senate Comm. on Commerce, 88th Cong., 1st Sess., ser. 29 (1963). The critics of § 315 include at least one former Commissioner. See Hearings on Political Broadcasting before the Communications Subcomm. of the Senate Comm. on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. 81 (1959) (testimony of Commissioner Ford).

Despite this swift reversal the Commission has continued to adhere to an extremely broad interpretation of the word "use." Thus it insists that any appearance by a candidate for any purpose whatsoever, other than in connection with a bona fide news program, constitutes a use irrespective of whether the appearance has any bearing on his political candidacy.[230] This interpretation is based on the rather tenous theory that any exposure of a candidate over radio or television ultimately accrues to the candidate's benefit or that, in any event, the licensee should not be permitted to judge whether the candidate has benefited from the appearance.[231] Consistent with their expansive reading of section 315, the Commission has also placed some rather narrow interpretations on the news exemption established by Congress in 1959 with respect to such appearances as press conferences and reports from Congressmen.[232] These limited interpretations have justifiably invoked criticism from members of the Commission as well as the industry.[233]

While the Commission has been severely criticized on many occasions for its interpretation of section 315, probably as much criticism has been levied at the statutory requirements themselves. This criticism has centered chiefly on the problem of giving equal time to minority candidates. Although Congress suspended section 315 for presidential and vice-presidential candidates in 1960,[234] every attempt thus far to modify or repeal section 315 permanently[235] has failed. An attempt to suspend section 315 again for presidential and vice-presidential candidates in the 1964 election campaign failed despite some strong support for following the 1960 pattern.

2. The Fairness Doctrine—

Closely akin to, but distinct from the equal time requirements is the Commission's so-called "fairness doctrine." Stated most generally, the fairness doctrine is on obligation imposed on the broadcaster to present contrasting responsible points of view on controversial issues of public importance.[236]

The history of the fairness doctrine is rather uncertain since it depends on how one defines what now passes for a doctrine. The Commission maintains that the fairness doctrine has, in essence, been in effect from the first days of regulation by the Federal Radio Commission.[237] A statement in the 1929 Annual Report of the Federal Radio Commission does suggest an early origin of the doctrine: "It would not be fair, indeed, it would not be good service to the public, to allow a one-sided presentation of political issues of a campaign. Insofar as the program consists of discussion of public questions, public interest requires ample play for the fair and free competition of opposing views, and the Commission believes that the principle applies not only to addresses of political candidates but to discussion of issues of importance to the public."[238]

---

[229] CBS, Inc., 18 P & F Radio Reg. 701 (1959). For industry criticisms of the Lar Daly case, see Hearings on Political Broadcasting Before the Communications Subcomm. of the Senate Comm. on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 86th Cong., 1st Sess (1959).

[230] See note 219 supra.

[231] See WMCA, Inc., 7 P & F Radio Reg. 1132 (1952).

[232] See, e.g., Columbia Broadcasting Sys., 3 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 623 (1964); Letter to Congressman Thompson, 23 P & F Radio Reg. 178 (1962).

[233] See, e.g., dissenting opinions of Commissioners Ford and Loevinger in Columbia Broadcasting Sys., 3 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 623, 630–31 (1964).

[234] Act of Aug. 24, 1960, Pub. L. No. 86–677, 74 Stat. 554.

[235] See, e.g., S. 252; S. 1696; Hearings on Equal Time Before the Communications Subcomm. of the Senate Comm. on Commerce, 88th Cong., 1st Sess., ser. 29 (1963).

[236] Fairness Doctrine, 2 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 1901, 1904 (1964). For extensive comments on the fairness doctrine reflecting different attitudes toward it, see Barron, The Federal Communications Commission's Fairness Doctrine: An Evaluation, 30 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 1 (1961); Sullivan, Editorials and Controversy: The Broadcaster's Dilemma, 32 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 719 (1964).

[237] See Fairness Doctrine, 2 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 1901, 1903 (1964). The Commission also interprets § 315, as amended in 1959, to give statutory sanction for the doctrine. See id. But this seems a somewhat dubious interpretation of congressional intent. See text accompanying notes 250–51 infra.

While a general obligation to be fair in presenting opposing viewpoints on controversial issues may be inherent in the broadcaster's duty to serve the public interest, there is an important difference between a general moral responsibility—enforceable, if at all, only by self-regulation—and a specific legal requirement enforceable by Commission sanction.[239] Despite the Commission's early insistence that the broadcaster is obligated to present all sides of a controversial issue, it was really not until the Commission's opinion in Mayflower Broadcasting Company[240] in 1940, which imposed a ban on broadcast editorializing as inherently unfair, that the Commission articulated something like the fairness doctrine, enforceable by direct sanction or specific admonishment, as it is now understood.[241] The Mayflower decision represents a crude first attempt on the part of the Commission to enforce fairness in the treatment of controversial issues by broadcasters. The case did not, however, lay down any specific requirements other than the negative commandment: thou shall not be an advocate. Apart from condemning editorializing, it spoke only in very sweeping and general terms:

> "Freedom of speech on the radio must be broad enough to provide full and equal opportunity for the presentation to the public of all sides of public issues. Indeed, as one licensed to operate in a public domain, the licensee has assumed the obligation of presenting all sides of important public questions, faily, objectively and without bias."[242]

The scope of the licensee's obligation to ensure the fair presentation of all sides of controversial issues and the manner in which the Commission intended to enforce that obligation remain as vague as the broadcaster's duty to serve the public interest. Few stations were hurt by the ban on editorializing, since the practice was not widespread in the industry and was generally frowned upon.[243] Thus, the Mayflower opinion did not evoke as overwhelming a protest from the industry as might have been expected.

Apart from the flat ban on editorializing, little effort was made by the Commission to clarify the scope of the licensee's obligation to be fair or to set forth any guidelines as to what would be deemed controversial or what was required in order to be fair. In fact, the Commission quite evidently did not really know what fairness meant. Thus, in 1946 it decided not to require a station to give an atheist opportunity to "give the other side" of views reflected in the station's religious programs, while at the same time instructing the station to be fair in presenting religious issues even though this would require the station to permit expression of highly unpopular minority views including those of atheists.[244] The confusingly vague scope of the fairness obligation was compounded by the fact that the Commission had, in 1945, issued a statement of policy to the effect that stations could not avoid the problem by refusing to carry programs dealing with controversial public issues.[245]

In 1947 the Commission, prompted by the evident need to clarify the fairness obligation with respect to controversial public issues generally, instituted hearings on the relationships between editorializing and a broadcaster's obligations under the Act. These culminated in the Commission's Report on Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees,[246] released in 1949, in which the Commission reversed Mayflower and reestablished the right of the broadcaster to editorialize. In addition, this report dealt generally with the licensee's overall duty of fairness in treating controversial issues. It set forth the licensee's twofold obligation: first, to speak out on controversial public issues, although not necessarily in the format of station editorials; and, second, an affirmative obligation to ascertain and seek out all responsible viewpoints on controversial issues and to afford the opportunity for such contrasting viewpoints to be heard.[247] It is this two-fold obligation which constitutes the modern fairness doctrine.

---

[238] 1929 FRC ANN. REP. 33.

[239] Sullivan, supra note 236, at 728.

[240] 8 F.C.C. 333 (1940).

[241] In Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 10 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 2001, 2011 (D.C. Cir. 1967), the court attempts to give an earlier genesis for the fairness doctrine by finding it in such cases as Shuler and Brinkley. Trinity Methodist Church, South v. Federal Radio Comm'n, 62 F.2d 850 (D.C. Cir. 1932), cert. denied, 288 U.S. 599 (1933); KFKB Broadcasting Ass'n v. Federal Radio Comm'n, 47 F.2d 670 (D.C. Cir. 1931). However, the denial of licenses in these cases was based on a far more flagrant conduct than simple failure to present both sides of a public controversy and neither was grounded on any articulated fairness doctrine as that term is understood today. So also the Commission's refusal to license the applicant in Young People's Ass'n for the Propogation of the Gospel, 6 F.C.C. 178 (1938), which announced its intention to pursue a flat, general policy of not permitting use of its facilities for presenting any view differing from that of the applicant, bears but slight resemblance to the fairness doctrine today but is more akin to the Brinkley and Shuler cases and the principle that a licensee cannot operate the station in its purely private interests to the exclusion of any public interest.

[242] 8 F.C.C. 333, 340 (1940).

[243] Sullivan, supra note 236, at 730–32.

[244] Robert Harold Scott, 3 P & F RADIO REG. 259 (1946).

[245] United Broadcasting Co., 10 F.C.C. 515 (1945).

The 1949 Editorializing Report remains the basic expression of policy for the fairness doctrine. Congress recognized the fairness doctrine in its 1959 amendments to section 315. Amended section 315, after establishing the exemption for bona fide news broadcasts, provides: "Nothing in the foregoing sentence shall be construed as relieving broadcasters, in connection with the presentation of newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, and on-the-spot coverage of news events, from the obligation imposed upon them under this chapter to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance." [248]

Although the Commission has read the above provision as a ratification of the fairness doctrine, it seems doubtful that Congress, in amending section 315, actually intended to give specific statutory sanction to the Commission's fairness doctrine. More probably, Congress intended neither approval nor disapproval of it, but merely intended to ensure that section 315 would not interfere with it. There was no other consideration of the fairness doctrine as such and no consideration was given to the statutory authority for the doctrine as then applied.[249]

In recent years the Commission has attempted to furnish some more specific guidance in its Fairness Primer, a collection of ad hoc rulings implementing the fairness doctrine.[250] The Commission's ad hoc rulings are at best an uncertain guideline. In order to set forth the basic theory of the fairness doctrine and to distinguish it from section 315, a few generalizations may be made.

Unlike section 315, the fairness doctrine does not necessarily require a station to grant equal time to all opposing viewpoints. A ten-minute commentary by the station on one side of a controversial school bond issue, for example, does not necessarily require that the station grant ten minutes to all other sides. This flows from the fact that the obligation is to ensure fair treatment, not necessarily precisely equal time, to the various sides. Moreover, unlike section 315, the fairness doctrine does not necessarily require the station to offer time to any outside person, group, or agency. If the station's programming is such that fairness is accorded to all sides over a reasonable period of time, then the station's obligations are at least theoretically met.

An exception to the above is the so-called "personal attack" rule which requires that, where a station makes a personal attack on a specific individual or group, it must provide the individual attacked with a script or tape of the broadcast prior to or at the time of the broadcast and with a specific offer of time to reply.[251] This rule has now been codified into specific regulations which have extended it not only to require opportunity to reply to personal attacks but also to require the station to offer rebuttal time in the case of editorial endorsements of or opposition to qualified political candidates.[252] These rules reflect an evolving crystallization, if not rigidification, of the fairness doctrine from a general obligation of responsibility into fixed regulations prescribing specific licensee duties. The wisdom of such regulatory policy is certainly open to question.

---

[246] 1 P & F RADIO REG. 91:201 (1949).

[247] Id. at 91:206.

[248] 48 Stat. 1088 (1934), as amended, 47 U.S.C. § 315(a)4 (1964).

[249] For a brief discussion of the question see Dean, Political Broadcasting: The Communications Act of 1934 Reviewed. 20 FED. COMM. B.J. 16, 29–31 (1966).

[250] Fairness Doctrine, 2 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1901 (1964).

[251] Billings Broadcasting Co., 23 P & F RADIO REG. 951 (1962); Clayton W. Mapoles, 23 P & F RADIO REG. 586 (1962); Times-Mirror Broadcasting Co., 24 P & F RADIO REG. 404, 407 (1962).

[252] Fairness Doctrine Rules, 10 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1901, 1903 (1967). Appeals challenging the rules have been taken in the Second and Seventh Circuit Courts of Appeals. BROADCASTING MAGAZINE, July 31, 1967, at 23–24.

The Commission's enforcement of the fairness doctrine is substantially similar to its enforcement of section 315, except that it is possibly even more informal. Upon complaint that a licensee has not accorded fair coverage to a controversial public issue, the Commission forwards the complaint to the licensee and demands a reply. If the reply does not satisfy the Commission, it informs the station of the error of its ways, indicating perhaps that the matter may be considered at renewal time.[253] In addition, it may demand from the licensee a statement of how it will comply with the fairness doctrine in the future.[254]

A notification to the applicant that the matter will be considered at renewal time is precisely the kind of "lifted eyebrow" technique which the Commission has successfully employed in other aspects of broadcast regulation. Generally, it is not so much the possible loss of its license as the possibility of being forced through the ordeal of a hearing which makes the informal letter-telegram procedure effective. To reinforce this informal procedure, the Commission has in one recent case issued a one-year renewal where a station's presentation of controversial public issues had been of questionable fairness.[255] Finally, if the fairness doctrine has been incorporated into section 315, then enforcement methods such as cease and desist orders and fines should be at least theoretically available. The Commission has not as yet resorted to these methods although it may well do so in the future, particularly in enforcing its new personal attack regulations.[256]

2. First Amendment Implications—

The operation of the equal time rule imposes a significant restraint on broadcasters' discretion and responsibility in choice of programming. Its effects are to compel the licensee to offer time for political programs which, if left to his own discretion, he might not otherwise broadcast, and to compel the licensee to refuse to present programs which he would otherwise broadcast in order to avoid the burden of complying or the risk of not complying with this requirement. The latter restraint is probably the more significant because it is here that the requirement for equal time to all candidates, including minority and fringe candidates, has its most immediate impact upon political broadcasting. CBS President Frank Stanton, one of the most persistent and vocal critics of section 315, has contended that "The inescapable conclusion is that Section 315 does far more harm than good, and that its result is neither to increase diversity of opinion nor expand free speech but rather as a practical matter of practical necessity is compelled suppression and blackout. This compulsion is as simple as it is obvious: Time and time again radio and television have been unable to present candidates to the American people because broadcasters have known that under Section 315 a half hour to a Democratic or Republican candidate can mean a total of 4, 8 or 16 half hours to obscure and unknown opponents. So when a half hour has had to be multiplied to 8 hours, we have had to forego the half hour, the result has been less, not more, broadcasting in the public interest.[257]"

Congress recognized the significant restraint imposed on broadcasters by the equal time requirements in 1960 when it suspended section 315 for presidential and vice-presidential candidates.[258]

As in the case of the equal time requirements of section 315, it seems undeniable that the fairness doctrine acts as a significant restraint on the broadcaster's choice of programming and represents a substantial intrusion by the Commission into the area of program selection. While the nature of the restraints imposed is basically similar for both the equal time requirements and the fairness doctrine, there are important substantive differences.

---

[253] See 1965 FCC Ann. Rep. 89–92.

[254] E.g., Letters to Taft Broadcasting Co. and WBRE-TV, Public Notice-G No. 73,787 Sept. 24, 1965); New Broadcasting Co. (WLIB), 6 P & F Radio Reg. 258 (1950).

[255] Lamar Life Broadcasting Co., 5 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 205 (1965).

[256] A major purpose for the Commission's recent codification of the "personal attack" rule is to crystallize its policy sufficiently that it can be enforced by specific sanction such as fine. See Fairness Doctrine Rules, 10 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 1901, 1904 (1967).

[257] Hearings on Political Broadcasting Before the Communications Subcomm. of the Senate Comm. on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. 97 (1959) statement of Frank Stanton, President of CBS).

[258] Pub. L. No. 86–677, 74 Stat. 554 (1960).

First, the equal time requirement focuses on personalities rather than directly on program content, though it may indirectly affect program content to some extent. There is no requirement, for example, that the Commission examine the content of a particular broadcast to determine whether its standards are met in the case of equal time. On the other hand, the fairness doctrine is predicated on just such an examination, evaluation, and judgment by the Commission of specific program content. The fairness doctrine cannot be applied without the Commission making a determination that the content of the program is of such nature as in its judgment requires opportunity for presentation of opposing views. This aspect of the fairness doctrine is crucial from a first amendment viewpoint since the restraint on free speech grows directly out of an examination and judgment by the Commission of program content.

Second, unlike the equal time requirement, which has a narrow scope and correspondingly imposes only a limited degree of restraint, the scope of the general fairness doctrine is sweepingly broad. While equal time is limited to a relatively short period prior to elections, the fairness doctrine is always applicable. While equal time affects only programs involving a legally qualified candidate for public office, the fairness doctrine affects all programming which involves controversial public issues. Thus the effect upon program choice is infinitely greater in the case of the fairness doctrine. A broadcaster, faced with the possibility that he may have to give time to candidates B, C, and D if he makes time available to candidate A may well forego giving time to A. The program choice foreclosed is limited. Compare, however, the alternatives faced by a broadcaster who is considering a public discussion program, a commentary series, or editorials. He is met at the outset with the possibility that if he touches on any significant public issue, even if he does not judge it to be controversial, it may give rise to an obligation to provide time to opposing viewpoints. The problem will not arise just once or twice, but may arise on hundreds of occasions. Virtually every topic which might be worth discussing or commenting upon is likely to be considered by the Commission to be a controversial issue of public importance which obligates him to seek out and provide an opportunity for the expression of opposing viewpoints. The most conscientious broadcaster may well have very substantial qualms about presenting controversial public issues when he is required to be fair by someone else's standards, particularly if the someone else happens to be the government.

The almost infinite reach of the fairness doctrine is most graphically illustrated by the Commission's recent ruling that a station which presents cigarette advertising "has the duty of informing its audience of the other side of this controversial issue of public importance—that however enjoyable, such smoking may be a hazard to the smoker's health."[259] This is the first time the fairness doctrine has been held applicable to routine advertising. To say the least, such an application of the doctrine raises a question whether there is any kind of broadcast message which, in any context, touches even tangentially on a controversial issue to which the fairness doctrine does not apply. For example, does the advertising of automobiles give rise to an obligation to permit Ralph Nader to present his views on automotive safety?[260] The Commission rejected such implications of its ruling as simply a "parade of horribles" and emphasized that here the decisive criteria were the "governmental and private reports and congressional action" stressing the danger of smoking and urging persons to cease.[261] But the distinction seems paper-thin, particularly since nothing in the way the fairness doctrine has been applied in other contexts suggests that the presence or absence of governmental action or concern is of decisive importance. And even if it is, the ruling still has potentially limitless ramifications considering the range of issues with which the government is concerned. For example, does the advertising of vitamin supplements require a station to give air time to Dr. Goddard to present the FDA's views[262] on the questionable need for such supplements?

---

[259] Letter to WCBS-TV, 9 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1423, 1424, petition for reconsideration denied, 11 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1921 (1967). The ruling was issued on complaint. An appeal has been filed by the NAB on behalf of the broadcasting industry (and, by reasonable assumption, on behalf of the cigarette industry) in the Fourth Circuit challenging the ruling on essentially the following grounds: (1) it conflicts with the Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act of 1965, (2) it exceeds the Commission's statutory authority, (3) it violates the first and fifth amendments, and (4) it is procedurally defective. These are the same grounds urged before the Commission in seeking reconsideration. See BROADCASTING MAGAZINE, Sept. 18, 1967, at 34–38. Complainant, a lawyer in the vein of Ralph Nader, has also filed an appeal in the District of Columbia Circuit claiming that the ruling does not go far enough. Id. The latter appeal is an obvious race-to-the-courthouse attempt to get review in a sympathetic court.

[260] See R. NADER, UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED (1965).

[261] 11 P & F RADIO REG. 2d at 1929–30 (1967).

Perhaps the most startling thing about the cigarette ruling is that it requires continuing presentations by the station of the viewpoint that smoking is a health hazard because cigarette commercials are presented on a continuing basis. The Commission made clear that the station must allocate sufficient time to the opposing viewpoint each week. Moreover, the obligation to present the opposing view extends to giving time on the air without charge if that is necessary to achieve the requisite fairness: Indeed, it is evident from the Commission's letter-opinion that it contemplated that the obligation would be met at least partially by public service announcements of the American Cancer Society or HEW in this field.[263] Thus the impact which can logically be expected from this ruling is a continuing one.

However, notwithstanding the above objections, it is possible that on the present state of the law the ruling is immune from first amendment attack insofar as it involves advertising, although arguably this should make no difference here where the Commission is applying a rule applicable generally to the dissemination of ideas regardless of whether the particular ideas happen to be embodied in an advertising message.[263a] The restraining effect of the fairness doctrine is compounded for the broadcaster by its vague and indefinite standards. The vagueness and uncertainty are inherent first in the definition of what constitutes a controversial public issue giving rise to the obligation to be fair. The cigarette advertising ruling is an illustration of the potential sweeping inclusiveness of this element. There is also uncertainty as to what fairness requires the licensee to do in any particular circumstances. Uncertainty as to the elements of the doctrine and what it requires must inevitably cause a greater restraint on broadcaster discretion than would otherwise be the case. Thus the broadcaster may forego a wider range of programming in order to guard against the possibility that the fairness doctrine might apply, or he may broadcast programs expressing viewpoints opposing those of an original broadcast where it may not actually be necessary under a reasonable interpretation of the doctrine. The fairness doctrine is likely to have a particularly dampening effect on the quality of station advocacy such as editorializing. Advocacy by its nature seldom involves a complete and unbiased exposure of all contrasting views by the advocate. Were every advocate required to give such a full and unbiased treatment of all views, few would find advocacy and controversy worth the effort.

Under these circumstances, it is not surprising that many broadcasters forego controversial public issue programming, being content to play it safe with planned, noncontroversial subjects of the "mother-and-home" variety. But even this alternative may not avoid trouble since the Commission takes the position that the presentation of controversial public issues programming is an affirmative duty of every licensee.[264]

A distinction somewhat similar to that between equal time and the fairness doctrine can arguably be made between the fairness doctrine as it is applied to controversial public issues and the so-called personal attack principle,[265] which has developed out of the fairness doctrine. The personal attack principle represents a considerable extension of the fairness doctrine as traditionally applied insofar as it fixes an absolute duty to offer to the person attacked an opportunity to reply. It is in this respect basically similar to the equal time requirements of section 315, except that it is not confined to political candidates. While the personal attack principle is an extended application of the fairness doctrine, it does not represent quite the same constitutional problems. The vagaries and sweeping scope of the fairness doctrine are not inherent in the personal attack principle. Correspondingly, the compulsion to present ideas and speech which the broadcaster would otherwise not present is far less sweeping, and the inhibition on ideas and speech is far less broad where the broadcaster is required to afford the right to reply only to one who is personally attacked than where the broadcaster is required to give a fair presentation of controversial public issues. Moreover, a case can be made for the right to reply to a personal attack, at least where the attack is libelous, near-libelous, or arguably libelous. Professor Chafee persuasively argued that in such cases a legislative requirement imposing a duty to permit a reply to such statements is preferable to punishing or inhibiting defamation through libel and slander suits, and probably no more unconstitutional.[266] It should be emphasized, however, that this argument does not single out radio and television stations: it applies equally to newspapers and other mass communication media.[267] Indeed, one state has a statute imposing such a duty on newspapers.[268] However, even this limited right to reply to defamatory statements, whether applied to broadcasters or newspapers, seems to be of questionable wisdom and even more doubtful constitutionality. Moreover, even if its constitutionality were recognized, it would not justify either the fairness doctrine as it is generally applied or the rule which requires stations to afford an opportunity to reply to editorial endorsement of or opposition to political candidates. In the case of the personal attack principle, justification and constitutional sanction might be found in a long tradition of remedying defamation, antedating the first amendment. No such tradition affords a remedy in the case of one who merely takes a stand on controversial public issues. No such tradition compels one always to give all sides of the story.

---

[262] See, e.g., "Health and the Consumer," Address by Goddard, Annual Meeting of the Food Industries of the Nutrition Foundation, June 8, 1967.

[263] 9 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1423 (June 2, 1967).

[263a] See note 162 and accompanying text supra. The Commission only noted in passing the question of whether advertising is protected speech, but did not rule that it is not protected. 11 P & F RADIO REG. 2d at 1908 n.4 (1967).

[264] Editorializing by Licensees, 1 P & F RADIO REG. 91:201, 91:206 (1949).

[265] See text accompanying notes 251–52 supra.

The basic rationalization for the Commission's fairness doctrine, as for its general standards for presenting "balanced" programming, is that the licensee, bound by statutory policy to serve the public interest, must fairly present balanced and diversified programming so as to meet the needs and interests of all of the public. This rationalization rests on the assumption that, because the licensee has something of a monopoly in regard to access to and use of broadcast facilities, it is necessary and justifiable to compensate for this monopoly by requiring that he present all types of programming and all points of view which, by hypothesis, would be presented if there were no technological barriers to entry into broadcasting.

On this assumption, the Commission generally refuses to acknowledge any of the significant first amendment implications posed by its regulation of programming. Perhaps the most succinct single statement of its view is set forth in its 1949 Editorializing Report:[269]

> "We believe . . . that a requirement that broadcast licensees utilize their franchises in a manner in which the listening public may be assured of hearing varying opinions on the paramount issues facing the American people is within both the spirit and letter of the First Amendment [T]he Supreme Court of the United States . . . pointed [this] out in the Associated Press monopoly case. (Associated Press vs. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 20).
>
> * * * * * * *
>
> "We fully recognize that freedom of the radio is included among the freedoms protected against governmental abridgement by the First Amendment. . . . But this does not mean that the freedom of the people as a whole to enjoy the maximum possible utilization of this medium of mass communication may be subordinated to the freedom of any single person to exploit the medium for his own private interest."

Despite this army of high-sounding words and phrases, the basic premise on which the Commission justifies its intrusion into the program field is simply too tenuous to sustain such potentially far-reaching powers. Notwithstanding the Commission's rationalization in terms of the right of the public to receive diversified and balanced presentation of public issues, it has refused to consider whether or not, on a given issue, the public has received such a balanced presentation from all the various public media taken as a whole. It has ruled that each licensee must present all sides of a public issue irrespective of what other media and other radio and television stations present.[270] If the right of the public to receive diverse and balanced viewpoints is the decisive desideratum, it is curious, to say the least, that the Commission purposely insists on ignoring the question of whether the public is in fact receiving diverse and balanced presentations from existing communications media as a whole.

---

[266] 1 Z. CHAFEE, GOVERNMENT AND MASS COMMUNICATIONS MEDIA 172, 184–90 (Comm'n on Freedom of the Press ed. 1947). Professor Chafee points out, however, that there are some very serious difficulties with and objections to a legislative command to afford a right of reply. Id. at 180–84.

[267] Id. at 184–90.

[268] NEV. REV. STAT. ch. 200.570 (1965).

[269] Editorializing by Licensees, 1 P & F RADIO REG. 91:201, 91:210–11 (1949).

Moreover, the Commission's concern over licensees' use of public facilities for private purposes at the expense of the public is something of a red herring. The real issue is not whether the licensee has a right to exploit his license or to abuse its privileges, for example, by using the station to broadcast his own private views or to promote his own biases or interests, ignoring all public interests and needs. Those who oppose the Commission's fairness doctrine are not arguing for the rights of the licensee to be unfair or to use licensed facilities for a purely personal cause or aim. The question is who should have the responsibility; whose concept of fairness should be applied? If it is "unfair" for an advocate to put forward his own views without giving full and unbiased exposure to other opposing views, one may wonder whether any true advocacy is or can ever be "fair."

Finally, the Commission's reliance on the AP antitrust case is misplaced. As previously discussed,[271] the first amendment does not proscribe general economic and social regulation of the type involved in the AP antitrust case and the AP labor law case.[272] There is, however, a marked difference between regulation of the economic structure of a communications industry which is designed to protect the basic minimum conditions in which free, diversified speech may develop and regulation which attmpts directly to ensure such diversified speech by examining the speech itself to see if it meets the tests of balance, fairness, and diversity. It seems more than doubtful that Justice Black, who wrote the majority opinion in the AP antitrust case, or indeed any of the justices who joined him, supposed that by affirming the application of the Sherman Act to newspapers, he was affirming the power of the government to pass upon the balance, diversity, or fairness of newspapers, even those enjoying a natural monopoly position. The NBC case is no more dispositive than the AP case. Despite the Court's rather sweeping opinion which suggests sanction for all manner of Commission regulation in the public interest, the issue before the Court was the Commission's power to adopt essentially economic regulations similar in substance and purpose to the antitrust law sustained in the AP antitrust case. In both cases the difference between such broad socio-economic regulation and direct regulation of programming is obvious. To pass from the former to the latter without distinction is to pass beyond the elusive but nevertheless important line which separates speech in a free, open society from speech controlled by the government in the public interest—the earmark of a closed society.[273]

3. The Red Lion Case—

Although a number of court decisions previously discussed[274] have upheld the constitutionality of various aspects of Commission program regulation, some in rather sweeping terms, the constitutionality of the Commission's fairness doctrine went unchallenged in the courts until the recent decision in Red Lion Broadcasting Company v. FCC[275] involving personal attacks by a licensee.

---

[270] See Jorgensen, Schwartz & Woods, Programming Diversity in Proposals for New Broadcast Licenses, 32 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 769 (1964).

[271] See Part I supra.

[272] Associated Press v. NLRB, 301 U.S. 103 (1937).

[273] The phrases "open society" and "closed society" are borrowed from K. Popper, The Open Society And Its Enemies (4th ed. 1963).

To some the association of the Commission's regulation of radio and television programming with the attitude of the closed society will undoubtedly seem hyperbole. Some—those believing in the good intentions and motivations of the Commission in this concededly difficult and delicate area—will perhaps even treat this association with derision. There should not be any doubt that the Commission has acted on the highest of motivations and good intentions and it has not been altogether insensitive, at least as to some of the more obvious constitutional problems in this area. The fact remains, however, that the first amendment was designed to protect against well-intentioned, well-motivated interference with free speech as well as that which stems from a less well-intentioned social philosophy.

[274] See, e.g., Johnston Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 175 F.2d 351 (D.C. Cir. 1949); Trinity Methodist Church, South v. Federal Radio Comm'n, 62 F.2d 850 (D.C. Cir. 1932), cert. denied, 288 U.S. 599 (1933); KFKB Broadcasting Ass'n v. Federal Radio Comm'n, 47 F.2d 670 (D.C. Cir. 1931); text accompanying notes 115–18, 133–35, 208–11 supra.

Following the 1964 presidential elections petitioner-licensee broadcast a program which included a discussion of the election and a book by a Mr. Cook about the Republican campaign. The personal attack consisted of a charge that Cook, a newspaperman, had been fired for having made a false charge against an unnamed New York City official. Contrary to the Commission's personal attack policy, the licensee failed to notify Cook of the attack or to furnish him with a transcript of the program and refused Cook's request for free time to respond to the attack. Following receipt of the complaint from Cook, the Commission issued a letter to the licensee ruling that it had violated the fairness doctrine and requested it to advise the Commission of its "plans to comply with the 'fairness doctrine'."[276] In response to the licensee's request for a ruling, the Commission affirmed the constitutionality of the fairness doctrine as it applied to this situation.

On appeal the licensee challenged the constitutionality of the fairness doctrine on four grounds: (1) section 315 of the Act, the chief statutory authority for the fairness doctrine, constitutes an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power; (2) the fairness doctrine is unconstitutionally vague; (3) the fairness doctrine infringes upon the ninth and tenth amendments insofar as it violates the licensee's right to engage in political activity and insofar as it infringes upon powers reserved to the people; and (4) the fairness doctrine violates the first amendment.[277] Each ground was rejected by the court.

As to the first ground, the question of delegation in itself adds virtually nothing to the arguments that the fairness doctrine is unconstitutionally vague and unconstitutionally restrictive of free speech. If the latter arguments can be satisfactorily resolved there seems no tenable basis for attacking the delegation itself and, of course, if either of the latter arguments is upheld, the delegation question loses any significance.[278] As to the argument based on the ninth and tenth amendments, it is difficult to know what to make of the licensee's contentions. Reliance on the ninth and tenth amendments was evidently predicated on Justice Goldberg's concurring opinion in Griswold v. Connecticut,[279] and the theory that the ninth and tenth amendments constitute some kind of residuum of protected rights not elsewhere enumerated in the Constitution. The court's rejection of this argument in Red Lion seems undeniably correct. There is neither historical authority nor solid constitutional precedent for the proposition that the ninth and tenth amendments embody any specific constitutional rights. While, as Justice Goldberg pointed out, the ninth and tenth amendments indicate that the first eight amendments are not preclusive of other fundamental rights not enumerated, it is impossible to find in them any hint of what such other fundamental rights might be. Moreover, Justice Goldberg's use of the ninth and tenth amendments was dubious enough when applied in Griswold as a basis for "filling in" the interstices between specific constitutional guarantees. It would be even more dubious to apply the two amendments to the Red Lion situation where other specific constitutional provisions are directly in issue. Such an interpretation of the ninth and tenth amendments would cause the entire Bill of Rights to be all but swallowed up in these virtually forgotten amendments.

The licensee's vagueness appears on its face to be somewhat more persuasive. Viewing the fairness doctrine in general, it can hardly be denied that it is vague and uncertain in its scope and application. However, the vagueness argument seems misdirected here.

---

[275] 10 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 2001 (D.C. Cir.), petition for cert. filed, 36 U.S.L.W 3100 (U.S. Sept. 11, 1967).

[276] Id. at 2006-08.

[277] Id. at 2004.

[278] Setting aside the issue of free speech, or the issue of vagueness such as would offend due process, the question of the constitutionality of the delegation seems fully disposed of by a line of authority too long to recite in its entirety. The standards of § 315 which were challenged,—"reasonable opportunity," "sufficient time for full discussion," "controversial issues of public importance," and others, id. at 2014—may indeed be broad and uncertain, but considered under the issue of delegability they are quite obviously no broader or more uncertain than standards which have been repeatedly upheld. See e.g., Lichter v. United States, 334 U.S. 742 (1948) (authorizing recovery of "excess profits" under the Renegotiation Act); Federal Radio Comm'n v. Nelson Bros. Bond & Mortgage Co., 289 U.S. 266, 285 (1933) (regulation of licenses under the standard of "public interest, convenience, and necessity" under the Radio Act of 1927); Yakus v. United States, 321 U.S. 414, 423-5 (1944) (administrator under Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 given power to fix prices which "in his judgment will be generally fair and equitable and will effectuate the purposes of this Act)).

[279] 381 U.S. 479, 486 (1965).

In the sense in which it is most widely understood and applied, the void-for-vagueness doctrine is based on the need to give fair notice to the individual as to what is unlawful. The evils sought to be eliminated are twofold: the subjection of a person to threat of punishment when he cannot know that his conduct is unlawful,[280] and the restraint of a person from engaging in protected conduct because of the threat that the broad and vague reach of the statute may proscribe such conduct.[281] In addition to the notice aspect, the vagueness doctrine has been applied as a limitation on the discretionary powers which may be given to a lower court, an administrative agency, or official.[282] In this latter aspect the doctrine assumes a somewhat broader scope and limits grants of overly broad discretion to trial judges and agencies to impose restraints without clear standards by which the lawfulness of their decisions or possible intrusions into areas of protected conduct may be tested.[283]

The court's opinion in Red Lion does not analyze the differing applications of the vagueness doctrine. It appears to have regarded the issue as solely a question of fair notice to the individual.[284] But, despite this blurrinb of important distinctions, the court's rejection of the vagueness doctrine may be justified since none of the evils which the doctrine intended to correct were present in this case. While absence of fair notice and the evil of overbroadness may well be present in the fairness doctrine generally, there is no problem of fair notice as to what constitutes a controversial public issue in the personal attack type of case. It would strain credulity for the licensee to assert that it could not determine with fair certainty whether it was engaged in a personal attack. Neither is the standard overbroad in that it gives too much discretion to the agency; the standard of "personal attack" is no more elusive or vague for the agency to apply than it is for the licensee to understand. The same is true of the particular obligations imposed on the licensee here. Unlike the case of the general fairness doctrine, as applied to controversial issues, the personal attack principle is quite definite in the obligations which it imposes on licensees and the standard to be enforced by the agency. Like the equal time requirement of section 315, the personal attack principle requires in all cases a specific offer of rebuttal time. The licensee's duty and the court's mandate under this requirement seem sufficiently clear.

There remains, however, the first amendment issue, and here the court's opinion is clearly less satisfying. Predictably, the Commission in its argument pointed out the public nature of the frequencies, the broadcaster's fiduciary responsibility to present all viewpoints, its duty to serve the public interest and recited the usual cases. In substance the court approved these arguments in rejecting the first amendment challenge.[285]

However, the court did not rest its decision simply on the licensee's duties and public responsibilities, but went on to conclude that the application of the personal attack principle, or the fairness doctrine in general, did not in fact restrain the licensee's freedom of speech. At one place the court noted that "petitioners are not prohibited from broadcasting any program which petitioners think suitable. . . . [they] are not furnished with a mandatory program format, nor does the Doctrine define which if any, controversial issues are to be the subject of broadcasting.[286] "

---

[280] See, e.g., Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451 (1939); Connally v. General Constr. Co., 269 U.S. 385 (1926).

[281] See, e.g., Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U.S. 242 (1937). On the distinction between the two evils inherent in "fair notice" cases, see Note, The Void-for-Vagueness Doctrine in the Supreme Court, 109 U. PA. L. REV. 67, 76 (1960).

[282] See Giaccio v. Pennsylvania, 382 U.S. 399, 402–03 (1966). See also Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495 (1952); Hague v. C.I.O., 307 U.S. 496 (1939). For a persuasive and well-documented exposition of this and related aspects of the vagueness doctrine see Note, The Void-for-Vaguness Doctrine in the Supreme Court, 109 U. PA. L. REV. 67 (1960).

[283] Obviously at some point as the vagueness doctrine is applied to strike down broad authorizations by the legislatures to the courts or agencies, it becomes almost impossible to distinguish the vagueness doctrine from the substantive rights, such as free speech, which are ultimately being protected. However, to the extent the vagueness doctrine has any independent significance, such a distinction must be recognized. The court in Red Lion appears not to have done so since its opinion tends to fuse the vagueness problem with the free speech question itself.

[284] The licensee relied on Connally v. General Constr. Co., 269 U.S. 385 (1926), a "notice case," and the court dealt with the argument essentially on that basis. 10 P & F RADIO REG. 2d at 2017–20 (1967).

[285] Id. at 2022–25; see also 2018–20.

Elsewhere is stated: "The petitioners are in no manner exposed to or subject to any prior censorship of their broadcasts. Their latitude in the selection of program material, program substance, program format, and identity of program format, and identity of program personnel is bounded only by their own determination of the public interest appeal of their end product.[287] "

In response to the assertion that a fear of punishment may act as a restraint upon free speech the court stated: "The remedial provisions of Title 47 U.S.C., the Administrative Procedure Act, and the accessibility of the courts guarantee petitioners full redress from illegal, arbitrary, or capricious conduct on the part of the Commission.[288] "

This reasoning is a mixture of naivete, incorrect facts, and faulty legal analysis. The court's assumption that the broadcaster has complete discretion in selection of programming is simply incorrect. Apart from the restrictions discussed in some detail previously,[289] there is the Commission's fairness doctrine itself, one command of which is that the licensee must present controversial public issues programming as part of its duty to serve the public interest.[290] The court's evident conclusion that because there is no direct control and no prior restraint of programming, there is no restraint resulting from the Commission's fairness doctrine is unrealistic and legally erroneous. To the extent the free exercise of speech is conditioned upon the speaker's doing something which he would not otherwise do because of the threat of incurring some penalty, there is a clear restraint. The court's conclusion to the contrary and its apparent insistence on some form of prior restraint is directly contrary to the constitutional principles settled more than thirty-five years ago in Near v. Minnesota.[291] Finally, the court's conclusion that the alleged restraint resulting from Commission sanctions and from the fear of punishment is somehow dissolved by the availability of judicial review and adequate safeguards against arbitrary Commission action is naive. Although the availability of review and the applicability of standards may be relevant in deciding whether a restraint is a permissible one, the restraint is no less real by reason of its being reviewable, and no less substantial because it is not arbitrarily imposed. A court cannot avoid its responsibility of deciding whether the action of the agency, including agency sanctions or the threat of such sanctions, constitutes an impermissible restraint on speech merely because it can review the agency's actions. Obviously once the review is made, a decision must be made at least with respect to the agency's action in the case before it. Undoubtedly the court did not mean to suggest that there could never be an impermissible restraint merely because of the availability of judicial review. Yet it seems to have used the availability of review as an excuse for refusing to consider the permissible extent of the restraint imposed by the application of the Commission's fairness doctrine.

The Red Lion opinion is simply inadequate. One might argue that whether the general fairness doctrine is valid or not, the personal attack principle is sufficiently different in purpose, scope, and effect to be upheld.[292] Had the court confined itself to the personal attack rules and attempted to so limit the scope of its holding, its decision might be at least defensible, even if questionable. Unfortunately, the court recognized no distinction between the broad scope of the fairness doctrine and the more limited personal attack rule. On the contrary, the court couched its opinion in the broadest terms, reaching conclusions which are not merely unconvincing but plainly erroneous in their generality. The larger questions were passed over too easily with irrelevancies and facile reasoning.

Most notably the court's opinion makes no effort to penetrate the basic assumption on which the Commission's arguments and conclusions rest and which is central to the entire first amendment issue: the assumption that radio communication is unique and, being unique, is subject to interference with freedom of speech that the court would never tolerate if applied to other communications media.

---

[286] Id. at 2018.

[287] Id. at 2024.

[288] Id. at 2025.

[289] See discussion, supra, Part II: A, B, and C.

[290] Editorializing by Licensees, 1 P & F RADIO REG. 91:201, 206 (1949).

[291] 283 U.S. 697 (1931).

[292] See text accompanying notes 265–68 supra.

III. TOWARDS A GENERAL RATIONALE FOR REGULATION: SENSE AND NONSENCE ABOUT THE NATURE OF RADIO AND TELEVISION

The Commission, as has been seen, has little if any well defined policy or philosophy of program regulation as such. Indeed, it has persistently refused to acknowledge that it "regulates" programming or that its actions are in any significant way a restraint of or an interference with free speech. About all one can say is that the Commission requires that: (a) a broadcaster must not permit his station to be used for broadcasting indecent, defamatory, or otherwise unlawful program material; (b) a broadcaster must at least take some steps to ascertain local programming interests and to meet such interests in a responsible manner; (c) a broadcaster must present "balanced" programming in accordance with certain general standards (set by the Commission); and (d) a broadcaster must be "fair" in presenting controversial issues or political broadcasts. These are standards which in themselves may seem difficult to oppose. Indeed, to take issue with them seems almost like attacking the Boy Scout Oath. But the issue here is not whether these standards are acceptable standards of conduct. The question is whether or not the FCC has any right to impose such standards.

Ultimately, the justification advanced for the Commission's vaguely conceived and dimly illumined policies toward nontechnical regulation, particularly in the area of programming, centers around the basic assumption that, whatever may be the application of the first amendment to common forms of expression or to other mass communications media, the rules are different for radio and television because they are unique. There are varying explanations given by the courts, by the Commission, and by critical observers as to why radio and television are unique. The principal explanations can be fairly summarized into four basic arguments.[293] (1) unlike other communications media, private or public, the means of communications which radio and television use are publicly owned;[294] (2) radio and television communications are uniquely affected with the public interest, and the use of airways is a privilege to be granted to broadcasters only so long as they continue to serve the public;[295] (3) radio and television are uniquely influential and powerful as communications media;[296] and (4) unlike other communications media, private or public, there are physical and technical limitations imposed on access to and the use of the radio and television media.[297] Without question each of these notions contains some germ of the truth. The problem is that they have become more than just arguments to be analyzed and critically evaluated. They have become ideologies which have taken the place of thoughtful reasoning. Comment about the "unique" nature of broadcasting has become so far removed from practical considerations that it has become a kind of modern-day analogue to the medieval discourses on the number of angels that can stand on the head of a pin.

One of the most persistent of modern shibboleths used in support of virtually every form of FCC regulation has been the proposition that the airways and broadcast spectrum are owned by the public, that is, they are "public domain" administered in trust for the public by the FCC. According to this theory, the broadcast licensee is permitted to use this public domain only so long as it serves the public interest, as determined by the FCC.[298] Because of this public ownership, the Commission has a broad regulatory authority and even a duty to oversee all aspects of the licensee's use of such public property. According to proponents of this argument, this necessarily includes overseeing the station's program operations.

---

[293] For a good, brief discussion of the principal arguments, see Sullivan, Editorials and Controversy: The Broadcaster's Dilemma, 32 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 719, 757–66 (1964). See also Pierson, The Need for Modification of Section 326, 18 Fed. Comm. B.J. 25–26 (1963); Note, Regulation of Program Contest by the FCC, 77 Harv. L. Rev. 701, 713 (1964).

[294] See, e.g., H.R. Rep. No. 281, 88th Cong., 1st Sess. 205–07 (1963).

[295] See Television Corp. v. FCC, 294 F.2d 730, 733–34 (D.C. Cir. 1961); S. Rep. No. 994, 87th Cong., 1st Sess., pt. 6, 1 (1962).

[296] See, e.g., Hearings on S. 1898 Before the Communications Subcomm. of the Senate Comm. on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 86th Cong., 2d Sess. 18 (1960).

[297] See, e.g., National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 215–16 (1943); KFKB Broadcasting Ass'n v. Federal Radio Comm'n, 47 F.2d 670, 672 (D.C. Cir. 1931).

[298] H.R. Rep. No. 281, 88th Cong., 1st Sess. 205–07 (1963).

As is true of so many of the concepts which have become encrusted on the law, there is a superficial appeal in the public domain idea which makes it hard to dispel. even in the minds of those whom one would not assume disposed to the type of constitutional intrusions which it is used to support.[299] Little effort has ever been made to look beneath the superficiality of the concept of public ownership of the broadcast spectrum to determine whether it has any practical logic or meaning. Logically the concept is meaningless. To say that the airways or spectrum can be owned by anyone is simply to indulge in fantasy. Surely no one seriously supposes that the airways are a thing of nature which can be possessed, occupied, or used in any normal sense of the word. In actuality, "airways" is merely convenient shorthand, an abstraction for a phenomenon created as a result of the use of privately owned transmission facilities. The "spectrum" is a purely artificial construct of the Commission itself. To give this construct an independent nature and then attempt to justify the regulation itself in those terms is entirely circular. It is like saying that the Commission owns the frequencies because it has the power to regulate their use, and that it has the power to regulate their use because it owns them.

One may perhaps speak with some sense about public ownership of air rights or space through which electrical impulses are trasmitted, but this is quite different. Moreover, even this concept will not support any claim for rightful regulation. All such air space is not publicly owned. And even if it were all publicly owned, this would not support regulation of broadcast communications or speech as distinguished from any other kind of communication or speech. If, for example, this hypothetical public ownership of air space is a basis for regulating broadcast speech, is it not also a basis for regulating virtually all types of speech that similarly use air space—in short, all forms of oral communications from loudspeaker announcements to backyard gossip? This is an absurd proposition. but how would the distinguishing line between broadcasting and other forms of speech be drawn? Clearly reliance on the ownership concept itself provides no basis for such a distinction.

In any event the public ownership concept is plainly insufficient justification for government interference with free speech under well-established constitutional doctrine. The Supreme Court has made it emphatically clear, for example. that public ownership of postal facilities does not justify censorship of the content of private correspondence or other printed matter sent through the mail.[300] Nor does public ownership of parks. streets. or other property justify otherwise unconstitutional restraints on free speech.[301] Public ownership of the airways, whatever it may mean, is surely no exception.

In substance. the public ownership argument seems really to be a paraphrase of a widely held, seldom well-stated assumption that because broadcasting is an activity "affected with a public interest," restraints which would not otherwise be permitted in a purely private sector of society are warrented and even necessary.[302]

While a few would dispute that broadcasting is affected with a public interest. this fact does not justify any intrusion on free speech which would not otherwise be permissible. It is. therefore, neither controlling nor even particularly pertinent that Congress concluded that broadcasting is affected with a public interest, provided for periodic licensing of broadcast facilities, and stated that a license to broadcast is purely a privilege and not a right.[303] The Supreme Court has made it emphatically clear that the right to license does not carry with it the right to place unconstitutional limitations or conditions on the license and particularly that it confers no authority to censor or interfere with free speech, whether or not the license be characterized as a mere privilege.[304] Indeed, far from expanding an agency's powers with respect to first amendmendment freedoms, the authority to license is a basis for even closer scrutiny of the agency's actions in this respect. Recognizing that a degree of censorship may be an inherent tendency in the exercise of administrative licensing powers, the Court has indicated it will scutinize such licensing activities with particular care to ensure that they are not used to override first amendment guarantees.[305]

---

[299] Justice Douglas, whom few would accuse of being an apologist for regulation of free speech under any pretext, appears to have accepted the public domain theory in conjunction with the "spectrum scarcity" argument, as justifying different rules for radio and television:

> "We have, of course, a system of licensing for radio and television stations. But the problem there is quite different. The channels all lie in the public domain, the air space above the earth being under the exclusive control of Congress. The channels are restricted in number. It is necessary to regulate all if interference is to be kept at a minimum and service is to be efficient. What the government owns or controls in the airways it can regulate as it sees fit."

W. DOUGLAS, RIGHT OF THE PEOPLE 76–77 (1958).

A more extreme statement of the case for plenary regulation by the FCC could scarcely have been made by the FCC itself. It should be emphasized, however, that the loose, even offhand, observations in a book are not the same as a carefully considered judicial decision.

[300] Hannegan v. Esquire, 327 U.S. 146 (1946).

[301] See, e.g., Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290, 293–4 (1951); Saia v. New York, 334 U.S. 558 (1948) (by implication); Hague v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496, 515–16 (1939).

[302] Television Corp. of Michigan, Inc. v. FCC, 294 F.2d 730 (D.C. Cir. 1961). It should be pointed out that the context in which this statement was made was not one involving any constitutional or even statutory question of Commission authority. Rather, it was a wholly gratuitous remark made in the course of admonishing the licensee and the FCC that broadcasting must serve the public.

Implicit in many, if not most, of the arguments advanced for a greater governmental interference with broadcast speech than is permitted for other types of communications media is the usually unarticulated assumption that broadcasting is uniquely influential and powerful as a medium of communication.

There is perhaps a degree of truth in this belief, at least in the case of television.[306] First, there is the immediacy of a televised message as compared with the printed word. For example, few who watched the classic televised political campaign debates between Kennedy and Nixon in 1960 would seriously question that television had a far greater impact on each viewer than any verbatim newspaper coverage would have. This is not to say that news, editorials, and other public affairs information are necessarily more effectively covered by broadcasting. But item for item, a well-done television program is likely to have far greater impact on the average person than is a comparable newspaper article.[307] Second, the impact of radio and television in terms of the size of audience far exceeds that of any other mass communications medium. Consider, for example, a well known, regularly scheduled news program, the "Huntley-Brinkley Report." Nielson audience ratings for January 1967 indicate that during this period each broadcast reached an average of nearly ten million homes.[308] This is more than three times the combined average daily circulation of the New York Times, the Washington Post, the Chicago Tribune, the Los Angeles Times, and the St. Louis Post Dispatch,[309] five of the largest and most influential newspapers in the country. Obviously it cannot be denied that television is an influential and powerful communications medium.

It remains to be seen, however, whether adequate justification has been shown for greater government interference with speech in the case of broadcasting than in the case of less powerful media. Although television may have a great effect in terms of its immediacy and the extent of its audience, radio is not nearly so effective. Yet no one has suggested that radio and television might be regulated in differing degrees. In addition, the influence and importance of any single television station, which is the basic regulatory unit, has been misunderstood and exaggerated. The audience test mentioned above, for example, does not take into account that the audience reached by the program is not the result of a single, monolithic voice but actually the voices of more than 700 individual stations.[310] Even narrowing this number down to take into account those stations under common ownership, it is apparent that there are a substantial number of different entities responsible. It may be argued that since most local stations are merely outlets for the three major networks and a handful of program suppliers that it is the net effect of broadcasting as an industry which is the essential fact in determining to what extent the FCC should interfere with programming. But if this approach is accepted, one must alter the comparative picture since newspapers, too, have their networks. Like broadcast stations, newspapers often speak with one voice—that of the Associated Press, United Press or other news service or, more accurately, that of the originating source. The relative impact of television would thus seem comparable not to one newspaper or even five, but more realistically to all newspapers subscribing to a major wire service.

---

[303] S. Rep. No. 994, 87th Cong., 1st Sess., pt. 6, 1 (1962) (emphasis in last sentence added). For the concurring view of former FCC Chairman Minow, see FREEDOM AND RESPONSIBILITY IN BROADCASTING 173 (Coons ed. 1961).

[304] E.g., Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963); Hannegan v. Esquire, 327 U.S. 146, 156 (1946); Terral v. Burke Constr. Co., 257 U.S. 529 (1922); see generally Note, Unconstitutional Conditionals, 73 HARV. L. REV. 1595 (1960).

[305] See Saia v. New York, 334 U.S. 558 (1948); Hannegan v. Esquire, 327 U.S. 146, 156 (1946); Hague v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496 (1939).

[306] I would be inclined to doubt that the impact of a radio message is anywhere near as strong as that of a well-written newspaper or magazine story.

[307] See Fairly, Can You Believe Your Eyes?, IX HORIZON 24 (1967), for a persuasive commentary on the impact of television news programming. However, it must be admitted that the presumed impact of television can be and sometimes is highly exaggerated. To many people, television has, like radio, become largely a part of the din of civilization which many need to hear but not necessarily pay any attention to.

[308] BROADCASTING MAGAZINE, February 13, 1967, at 68. An entertainment special covered by the same reporting period, "The Bob Hope Christmas Show," reached nearly 21 million homes. Id. at 66.

[309] Based on the then current ABC circulation data, AYER & SONS, DIRECTORY OF NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS 106, 189, 284, 600, 767 (1965), indicates the combined average daily circulation of these newspapers to be 3,087,547.

Even if one unrealistically aggregates all of the television stations under four headings according to their affiliation with one of the three major networks or their independent status, and even if one considers this as a potential of four distinct and potentially different voices accounting for all broadcast programming, is this in itself grounds for government interference with programming? Is it constitutionally necessary, in short, to have at least a possibility of more than four distinct voices on all subjects? We have only two national political parties which, based on the same theory which leads us to believe that there are only four potentially distinct broadcast voices, give us only two political viewpoints. Does this warrant some form of government interference with political speech or perhaps government subsidization of a third party point of view? In all but a handful of American cities there are, at the most, two daily newspapers and thus, in theory, only two distinct and potentially different viewpoints from the daily press. Does this perhaps warrant government interference through subsidizing more local newspapers or controlling the content of those newspapers which do exist?

In the final analysis it is doubtful that the Supreme Court would ever hold that the application of the first amendment's protection of free speech depends on any subtle and tenuous evaluation of the influence of the speaker. Justice Douglas, concurring in Superior Films v. Department of Education stated: "Motion pictures are of course a different medium of expression than the public speech, the radio, the stage, the novel, or the magazine. But the First Amendment draws no distinction between the various methods of communicating ideas. On occaision one may be more powerful or effective than another. . . . Which medium will give the most excitement and have the most enduring effect will vary with the theme and the actors. It is not for the censor to determine in any case.[311] "

Although all of these various rationalizations concerning the uniqueness of radio and television have occupied an important place in the ideology of broadcast regulation, ultimately the rationale to which almost all return is that of "spectrum scarcity." As Justice Frankfurter stated in the NBC[312] case, "Unlike other modes of expression, radio inherently is not available to all . . . and that is why, unlike other modes of expression, it is subject to governmental regulation."

The most obvious shortcoming of Justice Frankfurter's logic is that, notwithstanding conceded physical limitations on frequency availability and the corresponding limitation on the number of broadcast facilities which can be operated, the fact remains that radio and television stations are more numerous than any of the other competing mass communications media. For example, as of June 30, 1966, there were 5,881 radio and 721 television stations operating.[313] The number of radio and television stations is substantially greater than, for example, the number of daily newspapers, of which there were [310] 1966 FCC Ann. Rep. 116–18 shows 721 television stations operating as of June 30, 1966.

---

[311] 346 U.S. 587, 589 (1954) (concurring opinion).

[312] National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 226 (1943). For an excellent critical analysis of NBC and the spectrum scarcity argument, see Sullivan, Editorials and Controversy: The Broadcaster's Dilemma, 32 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 719, 757–66 (1964).

[313] 1966 FCC Ann. Rep. 116–18. This figure does not include television translators and boosters. As of that date, there were an additional 318 radio and 158 television stations (exclusive of translators and boosters) authorized but not operating. Most of these latter are stations which had received construction permits but had not then received licenses or "program test authority."

1,751 operating as of January 1, 1966.[314] The disparity between the number of newspapers and the number of radio and television stations is most strikingly evident when it is noted that only the largest cities can boast two or more daily newspapers not under common ownership.[315] By contrast virtually every city large enough to have a daily newspaper is served by at least two television stations and several radio stations.[316] While the number of daily newspapers has slowly declined, the number of competing radio and television stations has rapidly increased and continues to increase.[317]

It is often said that the limitations on access to and use of the newspaper medium is an economic limitation, not a technical one. The distinction, however, is entirely specious. Contrary to common assumption, the spectrum is not nearly saturated. There are few, if any, areas of the country today where additional radio and television stations are not technically possible.[318] Moreover, it is at least doubtful whether, given the present structure of the industry, the spectrum will ever be completely saturated with radio and television stations.[319] Although there is currently a trend towards an increased number of stations, particularly UHF television stations, it seems unlikely that the trend will continue to the technical saturation point. In almost all radio and television markets, economic barriers to entry will come into play before the technical barriers. The economic limitations have already become the dispositive factor in the growth of radio and television stations in many, if not most, small and medium-sized markets. The barrier to entry to further stations in those areas is not the technical unavailability of frequencies, but rather the economic inability of the area to support an additional station and the unavailability of sources of programming different from that which is already being provided by the existin gstations. This situation then is identical to the situation in all large mass communications media. It is impossible, therefore, to distinguish radio and television from newspapers, movie theaters, or magazine and book publishers on this basis. If the barriers to entry and limitations on access to the use of mass communications media are to be relied on as a basis for imposing regulation of free speech which would not otherwise be justified, such regulation should not discriminate against radio and television but should extend to all communications media.

One commentator, recognizing that the natural barriers to entry into and the limitations on access to the newpaper industry are as great as those which surround broadcasting, has recently proposed that newspapers should also be subject to some kind of general editorial regulation, similar to the fairness doctrine, to ensure that a diversity of viewpoints is presented to the public.[320] According to this proposal, by Professor Barron, such regulation would not only be consistent with the first amendment but it would promote the essential spirit of the first amendment which, in his view, was not designed to protect the right to speak freely so much as to protect the right of the public to hear a diversity of viewpoints.[321] Since barriers to entry and limitations on access effectively limit the right of the public to receive such a diversity of views, newspapers and presumably all other mass media should be required to present all sides of an issue. Despite a certain superficial appeal, Professor Barron's proposition is unsupportable. His theory fits well with John Stuart Mill's utilitarian defense of free speech and with the traditional thinking which conceives of free speech as a surer way to the truth,[322] but it is inadequate as an exposition of the meaning and thrust of the first amendment and free speech today. One major justification for free speech is, of course, the benefit which the public at large derives from hearing a diversity of viewpoints and ideas. But if the sole or even the paramount aim of the first amendment is merely to ensure that the public is able to hear a Babel of voices, the first amendment is not the great libertarian principle it has been thought to be. Freedom of speech is a justifiable aim in itself insofar as it helps to create the individual freedom and security essential to a free society. It need not be buttressed by any apologies that it will assure the dissemination of a diversity of viewpoints, that it will ensure a free marketplace for ideas, or that it is a surer means of advancing the truth.

---

[314] U.S. BUREAU OF THE CENSUS, STATISTICAL ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES 523 (87th ed. 1966).

[315] See AYER & SONS, supra note 309, at 1250–71 (1965).

[316] See 1967 TELEVISION FACTBOOK; 1967 BROADCASTING YEARBOOK. Although, except as the information is set forth throughout the above standard references, there is no single published source which clearly identifies the number of radio and television services which each city receives, a fair idea of the multiple television service available is given in a 1960 Nilson study, Television '60, which shows that some 94% of all television homes (94% of all homes in the United States, see 1967 BROADCASTING YEARBOOK 18) can receive at least three television stations and some 81% can receive at least four. No distinction is drawn here between a city to which a station is licensed and a city which receives service. Drawing such a distinction as a general proposition is unrealistic, at least so far as television is concerned. As a practical matter, a station need not be physically located in or technically assigned to a city in order to serve that city adequately, particularly where the cities are part of the same culturally and socially integrated metropolitan area.

[317] From 1950 to June 30, 1966, the number of radio stations on the air more than doubled from 2,897 to 5,881; and the number of television stations (exclusive of translators and boosters) increased seven times, from 104 to 721. 1966 FCC ANN. REP. 116–18. By contrast, from 1950 to January 1, 1966, the number of daily newspapers declined from 1,772 to 1,751. U.S. BUREAU OF THE CENSUS, STATISTICAL ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES 523 (87th ed. 1966).

[318] On February 9, 1966, the Commission adopted its newly revised, computer-determined Table of Assignments for television channels. Fifth Report, UHF Channel Assignments, 6 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1643 (1966). The revised Table at that date provided for 1,756 fixed VHF and UHF assignments (in 792 cities). Id. at 1667. However, the Table made only two assignments in the upper UHF frequency band, Channels 70–83, these channels proposed to be used for small "community" stations on an ad hoc basis. Id. at 1666. Thus, the 1,756 assignments (stations) do not include some 17% of the spectrum. Moreover, even as to channels below 70, the Table is not "saturated" and thus there is space for additional assignments over and above the 1,756 reflected in the Table. Id. at 1649, 1673–74. See, e.g., UHF Channel Assignments in Palm Springs, 6 P & F RADIO REG. 2d 1533 (1966) (adding another UHF channel to Palm Springs). In short, even with present technology, there is, at a conservative estimate, room for three or more times the 721 stations operating as of June 30, 1966. See note 318 supra.

[319] See Second Report 1772.

It is suggested that if the government does not place some direct editorial control on mass communications media, it is in essence allowing them to be censors,[323] given the effective limits on entry into such media. According to Barron, this problem cannot be met by general legislation such as the antitrust laws, but must be dealt with by some kind of direct editorial control.[324] In short, we are told to replace the private censor with a government censor. The portrayal of the mass media as all-powerful private censors, subject to no one's influence but their own, is greatly exaggerated. Moreover, the supposed inability of the antitrust laws or, in the case of broadcasting, the various diversification policies and multiple ownership rules to increase competition is due more to the manner in which they are presently being applied than to any inherent deficiency in their approach.

Finally, if it is true that the barriers to entry and the limitations on access to the use of mass communications media give too much control to the mass media, this still does not resolve the problem. The question of what kinds of corrective regulation should be provided and how much government supervision should be permitted remain. What are we to conclude from the fact that there are, for example, not sufficient finances to provide every city of a quarter million population with more than three local television stations or two local newspapers? Do we infer from this fact that the government must take upon itself the responsibility of guiding, if not controlling, the program policies of these stations or the editorial policies of the newspapers? If so, does this extend equally to stations in communities which have ten stations and four newspapers? What kind or degree of control would be permitted on this basis? At what point is the line drawn between complete control and mere "influence" of program choice? What standard shall underlie the Commission's judgement in acting on such matters? If, for example, audience surveys show that eighty-five per cent of the population in a given market prefers light entertainment, should the Commission be guided by this or must it take upon itself the role of a "leader" in guiding popular choice by setting down more elevated, "enlightened" standards? I would agree with those who strongly protest the slavish attitudes with which most broadcasters follow the lowest common denominator of public taste, as represented by audience ratings. I emphatically agree with the idea, as expressed by one critic, that "the first task of the purveyors of entertainment and intelligence is to anticipate, gamble on, whet, stimulate, elevate, and/or broaden the public taste."[325] But how can this responsibility be adequately enforced by a government agency without seriously compromising on the first amendment?

---

[320] Barron, Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right, 80 HARV. L. REV. 1641 (1967).

[321] Id. at 1648–49.

[322] Were an opinion a personal possession of no value except to the owner; if to be obstructed in the enjoyment of it were simply a private injury, it would make some difference whether the injury was inflicted only on a few persons or on many. But the peculiar evil of silencing the expression of an opinion is, that it is robbing the human race; posterity as well as the existing generation; those who dissent from the opinion, still more than those who hold it. If the opinion is right, they are deprived of the opportunity of exchanging error for truth; if wrong, they lose, what is almost as great a benefit, the clearer perception and livelier impression of truth, produced by its collision with error.

J. S. MILL, ON LIBERTY, IN UTILITARIANISM, LIBERTY AND REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT 104 (Everyman Lib. 1951). Compare Justice Holmes' dissent in Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616, 630 (1919).

[323] Barron, supra note 320, at 1648.

[324] Id. at 1654.

Neither society as a whole, Congress, nor the FCC has ever formulated any principles which satisfactorily guide judgement on such matters consistent with the aims of an open society. There have developed, in a long Anglo-American tradition of legal and social thinking, various controls on the abuse of free speech, but nowhere in this tradition has there been any developed thinking going beyond sporadic and occasional restraints, such as prohibition of defamatory speech, obscenity, fraud, and otherwise patently harmful or socially disrupting speech. There is no tradition of establishing, for example, standards of "fairness," "diversity," or "balance." These are judgements which, for better or for worse, have been left to the admittedly sometimes quixotic judgment of the public, unguided by their "enlightened" cultural, social, or political leaders.

There may be little reason to trust the judgment of broadcasters or the managers of other mass communications media but is there any more reason to have an abiding faith in the judgment of the FCC or any other governmental agency? The probability of the mass media's being responsive to public needs is, I think, as great, if not greater than the probability that the FCC's judgement will adequately reflect those needs. And ultimately, the danger to a free society from a reliance on the judgment of private broadcasters is less than from a reliance on the judgement of the FCC. Barron has expressed a realistic concern over the tendency of the mass media to avoid the controversial, novel, and heretical ideas whose expression is so crucial to a vital growing society.[326] It is, however, naive in the extreme to suppose that government supervision, through the fairness doctrine or other means, would ultimately promote heterodoxy. As has been pointed out above, government intervention in broadcast programming has in fact been a major impetus toward conformity and orthodoxy.

Where does the foregoing evaluation, if correct, lead us? There are undoubtedly some who would conclude that these considerations must lead ineluctably to the conclusion that the Congress and the Commission should be allowed to regulate only the technological aspects of radio and television. This conclusion, however, seems as extreme in principle as it is naive. There is no constitutional principle which says that, merely because some forms of regulation of free speech are unconstitutional, all forms of regulation which might affect or in some manner restrain free speech are similarly unconstitutional. The first amendment does not forbid the Commission from going beyond its role as "traffic cop" of the airways. Radio and television are certainly not constitutionally exempt from general social and economic regulation merely because their business is the business of communication.

Thus radio and television, like newspapers, are subject to the general laws which bind all persons, institutions, and businesses, such as the antitrust laws, labor laws, and laws governing libel, slander, fraud, and other socially disruptive conduct and speech. Concededly there are first amendment limitations on the application of such laws, but the limitations are not unique to radio and television. They extend as well to newspapers, movie theaters, or soap box orators.

Moreover, it does not necessarily follow that because the Commission may not constitutionally impose its own standards of orthodox programming or its own standards of balance, fairness, and diversity that it may not in general insist that a licensee investigate and be responsive to demonstrated needs of his community. The first amendment does not require that a licensee must be permitted to operate a radio facility purely in his private and selfish interest with no concern for public needs and interests. The first amendment comes into play, however, when the Commission, in the name of reviewing a licensee's responsiveness, begins to concern itself with programming or program operations to the point of establishing standards of acceptable and nonacceptable programming. It has already reached and gone beyond this point.

---

[325] L. White, The American Radio 221 (Comm'n on Freedom of the Press ed. 1947).
[326] Barron, supra note 320, at 1645–47.

Although some supporters of strong Commission regulation predict dire consequences in the event the Commission should relinquish any of its regulatory oversight of licensee program operations, it is doubtful that the Republic will falter should the Commission's thus for unfettered powers in this area be curbed to conform to the first amendment as interpreted for and applied to other communications media. On the basis of the first forty years of regulation, it may be difficult to say that the cause of free speech has suffered egregiously at the hands of the FCC. But there is every indication that the problem is serious and becoming increasingly more so. The fairness doctrine which the Commission seems bent on applying and interpreting with increasing rigidity, cases such as Palmetto, and an increasing preoccupation with. if not fetish for, balanced programming are three very strong reasons for taking a less sanguine view of FCC regulation in the next forty years and for implementing more vigorous first amendment limitations on regulation in this field.

[From the Texas Law Review, Vol. 48:783, 1970]

RIGHT OF ACCESS TO MASS MEDIA—GOVERNMENT OBLIGATION TO ENFORCE FIRST AMENDMENT

BY CLIFTON DANIEL*

Mr. Daniel contends that any judicial or legislative regulation of access to the press would be unconstitutional. He admits that there is a problem, but his solution is intra-industry diversity or increased competition with the numerical growth of media voices.

What I am about to say here will come as no surprise to Professor Barron. He has heard or read it all before. Since he and I last met, however, he has gained an ally, in the person of Vice President Agnew. Mr. Barron has somewhat gingerly embraced this new alliance. He is right to be cautious. The Vice President is not a very good example of a man who has been denied access to the press; nor is President Nixon.

In the very speech in which he attacked the television networks, Mr. Agnew remarked that the President had a television audience of 70 million Americans for his policy statement on Vietnam. In that same speech Mr. Agnew raised the question whether his own remarks would be allowed on the air by the "small and unelected elite," as he called it, that runs the networks. As he spoke, his words were being broadcast in full on all three national networks, and they were printed in full in The New York Times. Mr. Agnew was not demanding access to the networks for President Nixon. He has that any hour of the day or night. The Vice President was really complaining that access had been given to the networks' own employees, who had the temerity to analyze, interpret, and criticize—very mildly criticize—the President's speech.

Even though the Vice President makes a poor case, there is a problem of access to the press in this country. However, the dimensions of the problem have been greatly exaggerated, and the proposed legal remedies are improper or impractical. My contention is that the remedies should be left largely to the press itself and to the reading public, and that adequate remedies are available. About the dimensions of the problem: I suppose there are some publishers and editors who capriciously and arbitrarily refuse to print material with which they disagree. But I don't know them. In an adjudication made two years ago, the British Press Council, which is the official British forum for complaints against the press, had this to say:

> We are finding more and more that even quite large localities cannot support more than one newspaper. We are satisfied, however, that most editors of such newspapers are now accepting it as a duty to see, as far as possible, that events and views of interest to all shades of opinion are impartially reported while reserving the editorial right to come down on one side or the other.[1]

---

* Associate Editor of The New York Times. A.B., 1933, University of North Carolina.

[1] PRESS COUNCIL OF LONDON, ENGLAND, 15TH ANN. REP., THE PRESS AND THE PEOPLE 111 (1968).

Exactly the same thing could be said—and truthfully said—about the press in this country. More than thirty years ago, Eugene Meyer, who had quarreled with the New Deal, resigned from the Federal Reserve Board, and bought The Washington Post, set out deliberately to find a New Deal columnist for his newspaper. He thought his readers were entitled to get the New Deal point of view as well as his own. Hundreds of American publishers and editors take the same attitude today. They go out of their way to find columnists and commentators who are opposed to their own editorial policies. This is true of both liberal and conservative newspapers.

New ideas are not being suppressed. On the contrary, a hurricane of dissent is blowing through the world. It is shaking the foundations of all our institutions. Can anyone doubt the truth of that statement? When and where has it ever before been possible for a man like the Reverend Ralph D. Abernathy to reach an audience of millions by simply painting a few signs, assembling 150 poor people, and appearing before the television cameras at the gates of Cape Kennedy?

I thought until I got into this argument that the main complaint against the press was that we were giving too much access to the unorthodox—hippies, draft-card burners, student rioters, black militants, and the people who make dirty movies and write dirty books. At least, that is the message I get both from the mail that comes across my desk and from Mr. Agnew.

Recently I came upon a two-page advertisement in Newsweek. It was an ad for the Westinghouse Broadcasting Company, and it said:

> 50 years ago, Martin Luther King's voice would never have gotten past these walls.
>
> Martin Luther King, Jr. started out in a simple Alabama church. With a congregation no larger than his father had before him.
>
> Unlike his father, he was heard throughout America. At a time when Americans of all races had need of hearing him.[2]

That is true. The voices of protest and dissent are being heard. Even so, I still concede that there is a problem of access to the press. But its dimensions are not great and the solutions proposed are not practical.

Advocates of the right of access blandly ignore the problems and techniques of editing a newspaper. Professor Barron speaks of the press as having "an obligation to provide space on a nondiscriminatory basis to representative groups in the community."[3] Note the key words: (1) space; (2) nondiscriminatory; and (3) representative groups.

Space! How much space? Last year, The New York Times received 37.719 letters to the editor. At least eighty-five to ninety percent of these letters were, in the words of our slogan, "fit to print." However, The Times was able to accommodate only six percent. If we had printed them all—all 18 million words of them—they would have filled up at least 135 complete weekday issues of The New York Times. Yet, every letterwriter probably felt that he had some right of access to our columns. Some letterwriters and readers have been aggressively trying to enforce that presumed right. For many months the adherents of an artistic movement called Aesthetic Realism have been petitioning and picketing The New York Times, demanding reviews for books and paintings produced by members of the movement. Criticism, incidentally, would be meaningless if critics were required to give space to artistic endeavors they consider unworthy of it.

Art galleries in New York plead for reviews. They contend that it is impossible to succeed in business without a critical notice in The Times. That is probably true. But no one, surely, is entitled to a free ad in the newspapers. No artist has a right to a clientele. He has to earn his audience by the forcefulness of his art, the persuasiveness of his talent. How much more cogently does this apply to political ideas!

Nondiscriminatory! Discrimination is the very essence of the editing process. One must discriminate or drown. Every day of the year The New York Times receives an average of one million, three hundred thousand words of news material. At best, a tenth of it can be printed. A highly skilled, high-speed process of selection is involved—a massive act of discrimination, if you like—discrimination between the relevant and the irrelevant, the important and the unimportant. Actually, 168 bushels of wastepaper, most of it rejected news, are collected and thrown away every day in the editorial departments of The New

---

[2] NEWSWEEK. Dec. 15. 1969. at 86–87.

[3] Barron Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right, 80 HARV. L. REV. 1641, 1666 (1967).

York Times. Do you imagine that the courts have the time to sort it all out? Do they have the time and, indeed, do they have the wisdom? Even if judges do have the time to do my job as well as their own, I think Ben Bagdikian, the leading critic of the American press, is right when he says that "judges make bad newspaper editors." [4]

Representative groups! What constitutes a representative group? Who is to decide? I would say that representative groups already have access to the press. It is the unrepresentative ones we have to worry about. I am not prepared to argue that it is easy for anybody with a cause or a grievance to get space in the newspapers. Indeed, it is not easy—it should not be. When you begin editing by statute or court order, your newspaper will no longer be a newspaper. It will be "little more than a bulletin board," as Richard W. Jencks, President of CBS Broadcast Group, has said, "a bulletin board for the expression of hateful or immature views." [5]

Nowhere in the literature on access to the press is there any conspicuous mention of the hate groups. Does this newfangled interpretation of freedom of the press mean that an editor would be obliged to give space to ideas that are hateful to him? Must he give space to advertisements that are offensive to his particular readers? Must a Jewish editor be forced to publicize anti-Semitism? Must a Negro editor give space to the Ku Klux Klan?

I can assure you that the hate-mongers are as eager as the do-gooders to gain access to the press—the bad guys are as eager as the good guys—and I think Professor Barron knows that. It seems to me that he looks at these problems in a very simplistic way and defines them in parochial terms. All but the most localized media have national connections of some sort: they broadcast network television programs, they buy syndicated columnists, and they subscribe to the services of the great national news agencies. In determining who is to have access to the press, who would decide how widely an idea should be disseminated? Must it be broadcast in prime time on the national networks? Must it be distributed by the Associated Press and United Press to all their clients? And must all the clients be required to publish or broadcast it? Just asking these questions shows how impractical it is to enforce access to the press by law or judicial fiat. It is impractical in another sense. In contested cases, it might take a year or more to gain access to the press for a given item of news. If there is anything deader than yesterday's news, it is last year's news.

Perhaps Professor Barron senses these practical difficulties. His proposals for legislation are very vague and generalized. He does not say exactly what kinds of material must have access to the press and who would administer the access statutes. Also, his remedy is illusory in that it does not make available any additional newspaper space. It would only redistribute the existing space—probably to nobody's satisfaction, including his. Not only is it impractical to edit newspapers by statute and judicial interpretation, but it would, in my view, be improper—that is to say, unconstitutional—because freedom of the press, as defined by the first amendment, means freedom of the press. It does not mean freedom if or freedom but. It means freedom period. Professor Barron's proposition, however exhaustively elaborated, cannot disguise that it involves regulation of the press—freedom but.

I defy Professor Barron, as good a lawyer as he is, to write an access statute that would not entail some measure of official control of the press. Professor Barron cannot have it both ways: either the press is going to be required to do something or it is not. To do him credit, it seems that Professor Barron shrinks from the ultimate and inevitable consequences of his own theories. He says that "[o]perators of the media, whoever they are, will always have to resist the temptation not just to inform or to persuade opinion but to capture it." [6] What would be the logical result of his own proposal? We can find the answer in Russia, in China, and, most recently, in Czechoslovakia. Control of the press is one of the first aims of a dictatorship. It was the crucial issue between Prague and Moscow.

Professor Barron says—and I believe him—that he does not want a controlled press. He only wants to make the press legally responsible and accountable for its news and views. That is precisely what the Constitution says we must not do. The first amendment very plainly states that Congress shall make no law abridging freedom of the press. It is impossible to guess what the makers of our Constitution would have said about television, but I have a pretty good idea of what they meant by freedom of the printed word, and they certainly did not mean that should be controlled, regulated, restricted, or dictated by government officials, legislators, or judges. Indeed, the makers of the Constitution meant exactly the opposite—that officialdom, constituted authority, should keep its hands off the press, that it should not tell newspapers what to print or what not to print.

---

[4] Bagdikian, Right of Access: A Modest Proposal, 8 Colum. Journalism Rev. 10 (1969).

[5] Address by Mr. Jenks, The General Conference of CBS Television Network Affiliates in New York, May 20, 1969.

[6] Barron, Access—The Only Choice for the Media, 48 Texas L. Rev. 766, 782 (1969).

To repeat: my proposition does not mean that there is no need for greater access to the press. It simply means that legislators and judges should not be—indeed cannot be—the ones to decide how much access there should be. Editors should decide, under the constant and conscientious pressure of public and official opinion. There are effective devices that newspapers and their readers could employ and do employ: a page of dissenting opinions; more letters to the editor; no restrictions on political advertising; an ombudsman for the readers; a column to deal with readers' complaints and queries; a press council of community representatives to meet regularly with the editors; hiring reporters from minority groups to bring the views of their communities into the newsroom; and establishing a grievance committee—as the American Society of Newspaper Editors is now proposing to do—to receive complaints about the press. My own special remedy is diversity—the remedy envisioned by the Constitution and advocated by Judge Learned Hand—a diversity of voices in the community, a diversity of outlets for opinion, more newspapers, more broadcasting stations, and more competition.

Professor Barron says that "[i]n the American press, the number of dailies has steadily dwindled." [7] That is not true. Last year there were four more dailies in the United States than the year before. As someone has said, newspapers are not dying; they are just moving to the suburbs. The decline in the number of newspapers has been arrested.

The number of media voices in the country—newspapers, radio and television stations, and local magazines—has vastly increased. In 1968, Dr. Raymond Nixon of the University of Minnesota completed a study of recent trends in newspaper ownership.[8] Dr. Nixon found that more than 1,500 cities had daily newspaper service, as compared to 1,396 cities in 1945. He further reported that, while there were only forty-five cities that had commercially competing local dailies, there were 1,298 daily cities with a total of 4,879 competing "media voices." A "media" voice is any separate ownership of communications media. This trend—decentralizing the opinion-making process—should be encouraged. Freedom of speech is better served by a multiplicity of media than by attempts to control the existing media.

I am aware that not everybody with a cause can afford a newspaper to promote it. It is not as difficult, however, to launch a new newspaper as some people have you believe. In 1896 a smalltown publisher, Adolph S. Ochs, came to New York from Chattanooga, Tennessee, borrowed 75,000 dollars, brought the moribund New York Times, and converted it into an enterprise now worth 400 million dollars on the American Stock Exchange. They say nobody will ever be able to do that again. I wonder.

Fourteen years ago, Norman Mailer, the novelist, and Edwin Fancher each put up 5,000 dollars to start an offbeat, neighborhood weekly in Greenwich Village. Altogether, only 70,000 dollars—less than Adolph Ochs needed to gain control of The New York Times—had to be invested in the Village Voice before it turned a profit. Its circulation is now more than 127,000—greater than the circulation of ninety-five percent of United States dailies. Its annual profit is considerably more than the capital that was required to launch it. From the beginning, the Village Voice has been a forum for those unorthodox opinions that are said to be seeking access to the press. It was the Village Voice that blazed the trail for the underground press. While some may think that the underground press is scandalous, its existence is nevertheless welcome proof that our press is indeed free and that the first amendment does not have to be reinterpreted, rewritten, or wrenched out of context to give expression to unorthodox ideas.

Until now, I have said nothing about the right of reply—the right of reply to group and personal attacks. I have left it to the last because it does not provide as much of a problem for newspapers as enforced access to the press. Indeed, the right of reply is widely recognized and accepted. In practice, most newspapers recognize a prior-to-publication right of reply when dealing with controversial matters. On The New York Times, we have a standing rule that anyone who is accused or criticized in a controversial or adversary situation should be given an opportunity to comment before publication. The rule is sometimes overlooked in the haste of going to press. It is often not possible to obtain comment from all interested parties, but the principle is there and the effort is required. More importantly, the same is true of the news agencies that serve practically every daily paper and broadcasting station in the United States.

---

[7] Id. at 772.

[8] Nixon, Trends in U.S. Newspaper Ownership: Concentration with Competition, 14 GAZETTE 181 (1968).

The right of reply after publication is also widely accepted. However, I would caution against creating an absolute right of reply or trying to enshrine such a right in law. I would particularly caution against guaranteeing a right of reply to large, ill-defined, hypersensitive population groups. Newspapers must have the right to refuse to publish a reply, provided they are willing to accept the consequences of doing so—a suit for damages, for example.

[Reprinted by permission, Harvard Law Review, Vol. 85:768. Copyright 1972 by the Harvard Law Review Association]

THE EDITORIAL RESPONSIBILITY OF THE BROADCASTER: REFLECTIONS ON FAIRNESS AND ACCESS

By LOUIS L. JAFFE*

Professor Jaffe explores the soundness of the recent application of the fairness doctrine to broadcast advertising and of the recent decision of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia creating a first amendment right to purchase broadcast time for political advertising. He concludes that since broadcasting has only a marginal impact on the public's political consciousness and that since extension of the fairness and access doctrines may exact significant costs in terms of other important values, the logic of those recent decisions must be carefully limited.

Television is under heavy pressure from consumer, environmental action and other groups to increase its availability as a forum for discussion. This pressure has produced a judicial response. Two developments in particular raise complex problems: the extension of the fairness doctrine to advertising[1] and the right, recently established by a panel of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit to buy time for noncommercial advertisements,[2] "advertorials" as this Review[3] has recently called them. The doctrines of fairness and access do have some beneficial value in expanding the scope of public debate on issues of importance. But the grounding and scope of these doctrines is uncertain and if pressed too tendentiously their contribution might be outweighed by their cost in other important values.

I. TELEVISION AND POLITICAL CONSCIOUSNESS

The significance which we attach to fairness and access depends on an estimate of the impact of television on behavior and attitudes, a subject on which there is sharp controversy. Most of the ardent advocates of fairness and access entertain the view that the potential of TV for good and bad is enormous. They speak of it as a resource for enlightenment and reform which is being wasted. They begin by equating its influence with its ubiquity. "There are 60 million homes in the United States," says Commissioner Nicholas Johnson, "and over 95 percent of them are equipped with a television set . . . In the average home the television is turned on some five hours forty-five minutes a day. The average male viewer, between his second and sixty-fifth year, will watch television for over 3000 entire days. . . . ."[4]

Although there is no doubt that Americans spend a great deal of time in front of television screens, there is considerable doubt that their behavior and attitudes are influenced proportionately. Most research has established little to justify, or even demonstrate, Johnson's estimate of television's unique and crucial influence.[5]

---

* Byrne Professor of Administrative Law, Harvard University. A.B., Johns Hopkins 1925; LL.B., Harvard, 1928, S.J.D., 1933.

[1] Friends of the Earth v. FCC, 449 F.2d 1164 (D.C. Cir. 1971); Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine to Cigarette Advertising, 9 F.C.C.2d 921 (1967), aff'd sub nom. Banzhaf v. FCC, 405 F.2d 1082 (D.C. Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 842 (1969).

[2] Business Executives' Move for Vietnam Peace v. FCC, 450 F.2d 642 (D.C. Cir. 1971), petition for cert. filed, 40 U.S.L.W. 3317 (U.S. Jan. 11, 1972) (No. 864).

[3] 85 HARV. L. REV. 689, 692 (1972).

[4] N. JOHNSON, HOW TO TALK BACK TO YOUR TELEVISION SET 13 (1970).

Students of communications theory believe that the possibility of persuasion bears a direct relation to both the latent and expressed resistance of the individual, and that his resistance is a function of his character, his experience, his loyalties, his values, his personal strengths and weaknesses.[6] In persuading people to buy goods, the influence of broadcast advertising is probably great because resistance is low.[7] But resistance to political persuasion is probably much higher. The task of selling a tube of toothpaste to a five star general is much simpler than convincing him that war is wicked. Most of the research findings point to the conclusion that television and other mass media reinforce preexisting ideas rather than change them.[8] Indeed, viewers may be skeptical even of information which runs contrary to their political beliefs: a great number of persons were convinced that television pictures of police action in Chicago in August, 1968 had been so selective as to be simply untruthful.[9] And those whose minds are swayed by a television whiff on Tuesday are likely to be changed back by a contrary whiff on Thursday. Who among us advocating withdrawal forthwith from Vietnam will be persuaded by an argument to the contrary by Mr. Agnew over television or via any other medium? Such field studies as have been devised suggest that individuals may blank out what they do not wish to hear[10] and that it is no more difficult to do this with television than with other media.

I do not wish to leave the impression that I believe that all argumentation is futile. There is a small but significant group of persons, usually known as intellectuals, who are seriously committed to the pursuit of truth and are prepared to subject themselves to a continuous dialogue. These persons can profit from television as they can from other media, formal and, even more importantly, informal. Nor do I mean to argue that majorities cannot be ultimately persuaded away from their earlier commitments. They will not be entirely insensitive to the views of their neighbors. They will take instruction from their acknowledged leaders, and, even more importantly, they will be influenced by the accumulation of experiences which invalidate the premises of their earlier beliefs. Television can play an important role in such a transformation. Televised news of the horrors of the Vietnam War have had an important impact on public opinion. Continued exposure to obnoxious or alien views may erode conviction and finally lead to the discovery that one has taken for granted what he does not or cannot believe. The important point, however, is that the influence of television broadcasting on the public's political consciousness should not be exaggerated; it is only one among many bearers of experience.

---

[5] For example: "It is our tentative judgment that the social role played by the very existence of the mass media has been commonly overestimated." Lazarsfeld & Merton, Mass Communications, Popular Taste and Organized Social Action, in Mass Communications 495 (2d ed. W. Schramm 1960).

[6] See Berelson, Communication and Public Opinion, in Mass Communications, supra note 5, at 43; Lazarsfeld & Merton, supra note 5. See also Janis, Personality as a Factor in Susceptibility to Persuasion, in The Science of Human Communication 54–64 (W. Schramm ed. 1963).

[7] But cf. Note, Cigarette Advertising and the Public Health, 6 Colum. J. Law & Social Prob. 99, 112–16 (1970) (cigarette advertising seems to have little impact on whether people in fact smoke). The success of broadcasting in increasing total consumption should not, however, be exaggerated. Advertising may simply allow a competitor to maintain his present market position. It is fashionable to attribute the consumption-minded character of our society to commercial television. Cf. J.K. Galbraith, The New Industrial State 208–09 (1971). But, as H.G. Wells pointed out long ago in fictionalized form, see H.G. Wells, Tono-Bungay (1908), our society was consumption-oriented long before the advent of television.

[8] See Pool, The Effect of Communication on Voting Behavior, in The Science of Human Communication, supra note 6, at 128–37. See generally J. Klapper, The Effects of Mass Communications (1960). This is not to say broadcasting cannot have a great influence in rallying those already committed to a cause. For example, after KING-TV in Seattle broadcast a series of programs on local ecology problems more than five thousand people joined the station's Puget Sound Coalition to work in independent groups to improve the local environment. See Alfred I. DuPont-Columbia University, Survey of Broadcast Journalism 25 (1970–71) [hereinafter cited as Columbia Survey].

[9] See R. Baker & S. Ball, Mass Media and Violence: A Staff Report to the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence 37–38 (1969) (news commentators hypothesized public simply chose not to believe the scenes of disorder broadcast during the convention); Gould, Intruders in the Newsrooms, N.Y. Times, Nov. 17, 1968, § 2, at 29, col. 1 (various government inquiries sparked by adverse public response to television coverage of the turmoil surrounding the 1968 Democratic National Convention); N.Y. Times, Oct. 29, 1968, at 94, col. 5 (FCC orders networks to respond to protests over news coverage of Convention).

[10] See note 8 supra.

Indeed, even as an organ for disseminating information on political affairs, the power of television broadcasting should not be overestimated. True, it reaches a larger audience than any other medium: those who cannot read adequately or at all, those who are too lazy to read, those who can never get enough news. But a mass audience which relies entirely, or to a great extent, on TV news is by its very nature not prepared to listen to or digest news of any great complexity or detail. John Whale, who has covered the news in England and in the United States for Independent Television News, has this to say of the limited potential of television news in spreading political information:[11]

> There is by now not much serious argument left about whether it is a good thing to promote racial harmony, or rebuild slums, or keep down inflation, or avoid foreign military involvements. The argument is about how, not whether. It is about the how of these questions that people must vote. Yet television is not well equipped to help them with the how. Mass literacy has promised a slow advance towards an educated electorate which would have some hope of making reasonably well-based decisions. That advance will not be sustained by an electorate which looks principally to television for its news.

The short of this discussion is that legal doctrines should be developed and assessed free from any grandiose conceptions of the influence of television on political life. Broadcasting has at best an incremental and at worst a marginal effect on political consciousness. Too high a price in administrative and judicial inefficiencies, or in broadcasting revenues, should not be paid for doctrines designed to increase the number of voices heard on the air.

II. THE FAIRNESS DOCTRINE AND ADVERTISING

The continuing and evolving difficulty of defining the editorial responsibility of the broadcaster is in large measure, though not entirely, a function of the technology of the industry. From the very beginning radio was conceived not only as an organ of communication, but as a unique, as well as a scarce, facility of intercommunication comparable to the telephone. It is this dual function which has made it so difficult to define its status either in practice or law. The very special status of broadcasting was recognized by the Federal Radio Commission as early as 1929.[12] The doctrine was developed that the broadcaster must give adequate coverage to public issues and that it must fairly represent opposing views.[13] This has come to be called the fairness doctrine, which has continued to be part of the common law of the Commission [14] and has been enforced by warnings that persistent violation might result in a refusal to renew a station's license. The Commission has, however, made the point again and again that the broadcaster has considerable discretion in operating the doctrine.[15] He is to decide whether a question raises an issue of public importance. Similarly committed to the discretion of the broadcaster is the format, the amount of time, and, most importantly, who shall speak.[16] To be sure, the

---

[11] J. WHALE, THE HALF-SHUT EYE 203 (1969).

[12] Great Lakes Broadcasting Co., 3 F.R.C. Ann. Rep. 32 (1929), rev'd on other grounds, 37 F.2d 993 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 281 U.S. 706 (1930).

[13] See generally Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 F.C.C. 1246, 1249–50 (1949) and cases cited therein.

[14] In 1949, the Commission abandoned its rule that the broadcaster could not express his personal opinions on the air, see Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 F.C.C. 1246, 1253 (1949), over the opposition of the American Civil Liberties Union, which feared that an unsatisfactorily administered fairness doctrine would not be an adequate check on the risk broadcasters would become propagandists. See AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION, OUR UNCERTAN LIBERTIES 53–54 (28th Annual Report 1947–48). The prohibition against the expression of personal opinion stil applies in British broadcasting. Television Act of 1964, c. 21, § 3, sched. 2.

[15] The Commission requires only that the licensee act "reasanobly and in good faith." See Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine in the Handling of Controversial Issues of Public Importance, 29 Fed. Reg. 10415, 10424 (1964) [hereinafter cited as Fairness Regulations]; Madalyn Murray, 5 P & F RADIO REG.2d 263 (1965).

[16] See Fairness Regulations at 10416; Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 F.C.C. 1246, 1251–52 (1949). The Supreme Court has indicated that opposing points of view should be expressed by individuals committed to them. See Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 392 n.18 (1969), quoting J.S. MILL, ON LIBERTY 32 (R. MacCallum ed. 1946) Licensees can fulfill their obligation by announcing thir willingness to broadcast opposing views by volunteers, which will suffice if a response is brought forth See Mid-Florida Television Corp., 40 F.C.C. 620, 621 (1964). The Commission has proposed that where an announcement does not bring forth a spokesman, particularly if the controversial ideas expressed are the subject of a series of broadcasts, the licensee must notify specific individuals of the opportunity to present contrasting views. See Obligations of Broadcast Licensees Under the Fairness Doctrine, 23 F.C.C.2d 27, 29 (1970). Where the licensee rejects a volunteer spokesman as inappropriate, he must seek out others. Richard G. Ruff, 19 F.C.C.2d 838 (1969). But if his good faith efforts are fruitless, he may continue to broadcast his own point of view. Obligations of Broadcast Licensees Under the Fairness Doctrine, supra at 30–31.

Commission will review the licensee's performance. Some of its rulings, however, have led cynics to charge that the Commission reflects popular prejudices in making these determinations.[17]

Perhaps in partial response to such cynicism, in 1967 the Commission enacted a regulation embodying two particular applications of the doctrine, one dealing with personal attacks [18] and one with political editorials,[19] a violation of which would be punishable by a fine of not more than $10,000.[20] "When, during the presentation of views on a controversial issue of public importance, an attack is made upon the honesty, character, integrity or like personal qualities of an identified person or group," the licensee within one week must transmit a copy of the script and offer gratis an opportunity to reply.[21] A similar rule applies to an editorial endorsing a candidate.[22] The regulation does not apply to attacks made by candidates or their spokesmen or to newscasts and interviews.[23]

These regulations, and the fairness doctrine in general, were challenged by the broadcasters, but were upheld by the Supreme Court in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v FCC.[24] The broadcasters contended that the fairness doctrine violated their first amendment rights by chilling their free expression.[25] They argued that a broadcaster might hesitate to broadcast views which would lay the basis for a claim for free time.[26] In fact, the constitutional shoe turned out to be on the other foot. The court held that the fairness doctrine, and even a right to command time, is not only tolerated by the first amendment but is required by it.[27] "It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters which is paramount. . . ." The fairness doctrine promotes "the purpose of the First Amendment to preserve an unhibited marketplace of ideas. . . . That right [of viewers and listeners] may not constitutionally be abridged either by Congress or by the FCC." [28] Although it may seem anomalous to posit a right of the people which is not the right of any person in particular, we are becoming more and more familiar with the judicial enforcement of public or group interests at the suit of individuals and groups who may or may not be direct beneficiaries of the judgment.[29] We must therefore conclude on the basis of the pronouncements in Red Lion that the fairness doctrine is in a somewhat loose sense a first amendment requirement.

---

[17] See, e.g., Friends of the Earth, 24 F.C.C.2d 743, 757–58 (1970) (Commissioner Johnson, dissenting), rev'd 449 F.2d 1164 (D.C. Cir. 1971). For example, it might be argued that the Commission reflected popular prejudices when it permitted broadcasters to deny time to atheists to reply to religious broadcasts, see, e.g., Madalyn Murray, 5 P & F Radio Reg.2d 263 (1965); Robert H. Scott, 11 F.C.C. 372 (1946), and in its apparent holding that arguments against Communism do not require an equal time response. See Fairness Regulations at 10419–20.

[18] 47 C.F.R. § 73.123(a) (1971) (standard broadcast stations); id. § 73.300(a) (FM broadcast stations); id. § 73.598(a) (noncommercial educational FM broadcast stations); id. § 73.679(a) (television broadcast stations).

[19] Id. §§ 73.123(c), .300(c), .598(c), .679(c).

[20] 47 U.S.C. § 501 (1970).

[21] 47 C.F.R. §§ 73.123(a), .300(a), .598(a), .679(a) (1971).

[22] Id. §§ 73.123(c), .300(c), .598(c), .679(c). A copy of the script of the editorial must be transmitted to ther qualified candidates, or to the candidate opposed, within 24 hours, or if the editorial is broadcast within 72 hours of an election, in advance of the broadcast. Id.

[23] Id. §§ 73.123(b), .300(b), .598(b), .679(b).

[24] 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

[25] Brief for Petitioners at 18–23.

[26] Brief for Petitioners at 28; Brief for National Broadcasting Company, Inc. as micus Curiae, on Petition for Writ of Certiorari to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, at 8–9. The broadcasters, to be sure, did not allege they were acting so selfishly. Furthermore, they are, to some degree, legally bound to broadcast controversial programs. See Fairness Regulations at 10424; Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 F.C.C. 1246, 1249 (1949) (requirement that broadcasters operate in the public interest includes a duty to present programs devoted to the discussion and consideration of public issues). Nonetheless, there is considerable possibility the broadcaster will exercise a large amount of self-censorship and try to avoid as much controversy as he safely can. The Red Lion Court argued that the Commission could penalize at renewal time any broadcaster who failed to discharge his responsibility. 395 U.S. at 393–94. It seems doubtful, however, that except in cases of glaring failure to discuss paramount issues, the Commission could detect editorial caution. In any case, it must have been the Court's view that whatever the risks, they were worth taking. The rather unrealistic assumption that the Commission can deal successfully with editorial caution is otherwise some evidence of wishful thinking.

[27] 395 U.S. at 390.

[28] Id.

[29] See, e.g., Office of Communication of United Church of Christ v. FCC, 359 F.2d 994 C. Cir. 1966) (listeners to broadcasts have standing to sue as persons "aggrieved" under the Communications Act); Scenic Hudson Preservation Conference v. FPC, 354 2d 608 (2d Cir. 1965), cert. denied, 384 U.S. 941 (1966) (conservation group had standing to attack licensing of power installation where aesthetic concerns were allegedly given inadequate consideration). See generally Jaffe, Standing Again, 84 HARV. L. REV. 3 (1971).

Although I have in the past raised some question about the crucial importance of the fairness doctrine,[30] I do not question that it serves some useful purposes. In an occasional case, such as the enforced anticigarette campaign, the fairness doctrine appears to have had considerable success in public education. It has also had an educational effect in improving the character of public discussion by providing a model exemplified by the panel discussion. But these benefits must be placed in context. Although the most zealous advocate of fairness treats each broadcast as weaving an almost magical spell around the cocooned listener, as I have previously noted, the total influence of broadcasting on political attitudes is at best marginal.[31] Certainly, the impact of any particular response broadcast will not be too great. Moreover, it is sheer chance that any individual who has heard one side of a controversial broadcast will be in his chair to hear the required reply. I would conclude, therefore, that there is very little point in the Commission spending as much time as it does in reviewing the discretion of the broadcaster, and even less in the court of appeals reviewing the Commission's exercise of discretion. This is not based on any concern for the broadcaster or belief in his righteousness, but simply on the proposition that a little more or less discussion of this or that is of negligible significance and time spent over it is wasteful.

This brief review of the history and utility of the fairness doctrine brings us to the story of the cigarette advertisement and the controvery which rages over the application of the fairness doctrine to advertisements. The cigarette story has been told many times[32] but it is worth telling again. A then recent graduate of the Columbia Law School, John F. Banzhaf III, now a professor at George Washington Law School, petitioned the Communications Commission for a ruling that cigarette advertisements impliedly asserted the healthfulness of smoking and required the broadcaster under the fairness doctrine to broadcast statements to the contrary. The Commission, in one of its boldest actions, upheld the claim and ordered the broadcasters to give free time for anticigarette statements.[33] Having provided a forum for one side in a controversy, the broadcasters were placed under a duty to present the opposing view. The decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit [34] and has ever since haunted the Commission. Its logic can be expanded to justify so many demands for free time as to threaten broadcasting's advertising base. It can be argued that almost all advertising places a product in its most favorable light and does not communicate its significant and controversial countervailing costs. Automobiles pollute the air and overcrowd the cities. Drugs may induce too much reliance on drugs. Cereals may not be as nourishing as some think they should be, quite apart from whether false claims are made.

Several recent cases highlight the problem. The first involves broadcasts urging youths to join the military. Over the extensive dissent of Nicholas Johnson, the Commission rejected both a tenuous claim that the advertisement implied the propriety of our military policy in Vietnam and elsewhere and a more plausible claim that the advertisement asserted the controversial proposition that being a soldier was a useful thing for the country and for the soldier.[35] The majority of the Commission had previously treated the cigarette decision as sui generis [36] on the ground that cigarettes have been officially established as a prime health hazard and that the saturation advertising for smoking reinforced the danger. That distinction was applicable to the military recruiting ads. There is no question, I think, that as compared with any other case so far presented cigarette advertisements are exceptional, at least in degree. Cigarettes undeniably present a health hazard of major proportions. Other countries, England for example,[37] have arrived at the same conclusion and entirely forbid the broadcasting of cigarette advertising as we now do.[38] Furthermore, before the recent ban, it is my impression cigarette advertisements saturated the airwaves to a far greater extent than advertisements for military recruitment. Finally, as the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit noted in affirming the Commission majority,[39] it was inconceivable that any American was uninformed that the desirability of the draft, military service, and the Vietnam War was a controversial issue. Petitioners' voices on the airwaves would not have furthered the goal of informing the public that controversy existed. In contrast, before the massive anticigarette campaign began few Americans were aware of the connection between cigarettes and health dangers.

---

[30] Jaffe, The Fairness Doctrine, Equal Time, Reply to Personal Attacks, and the Local Service Obligation: Implications of Technological Change, 37 U. CIN. L. REV. 550 (196[illegible]).

[31] See pp. 769–71 supra.

[32] See, e.g., THE NEW YORKER, Dec. 19, 1971, at 46.

[33] WCBS, 8 F.C.C.2d 381, aff'd on rehearing, 9 F.C.C.2d 921 (1967).

[34] Banzhaf v. FCC, 405 F.2d 1082 (D.C. Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 842 (1969).

[35] San Francisco Women for Peace, 24 F.C.C.2d 156 (1970); David C. Green, 24 F.C.C.2d 171 (1970), aff'd, 447 F.2d 323 (D.C. Cir. 1971); Alan F. Neckritz, 24 F.C.C.2d 175 (1970), aff'd, 446 F2d 501 (9th Cir. 1971).

[36] See WCBS, 9 F.C.C.2d 921, 942–43 (1967) (industry claim that the cigarette decision could be extended to advertisements for automobiles, detergents, and high cholesterol foods dismissed as a "parade of horribles").

[37] See INDEPENDENT TELEVISION AUTHORITY, ANNUAL REPORT AND ACCOUNTS 1965–66, at 50 (1966).

In a more recent decision, the Commission has not fared so well with a different panel of the same Court of Appeals. In connection with advertisements for high-powered automobile motors and gasoline the Commission had taken the position that the link between the product advertised and environmental pollution was too tenuous to justify a right of reply.[40] The Commission refused to follow the cigarette decision on grounds not of logic but of general policy. Very simply it saw the spectre of fairness seriously undercutting the advertising base of television if the logic were pressed to the extremes of consumerist thinking. The Court of Appeals reversed the Commission in Friends of the Earth v. FCC [41] and held that an advertising display of the prowess of a high-powered motor car raised the issue of air pollution. The court simply appealed to the logic of the cigarette decision without apparent concern that so extended an application might implicate all advertising. The Commission had balanced the likely gain for public enlightenment against the threat to revenue. The court never so much as considered whether this balancing might not be a reasonable exercise of discretion.

But advertising for the time being does support most broadcasting; extensions of the fairness doctrine must take that into account. It is part of the problem that the "little" licensee may not be able to afford quite the same cutbacks as the immensely privileged and lucrative stations in the great markets. The cost to them must be balanced against the marginal benefits of the fairness doctrine in heightening political consciousness.[42] Nevertheless, there will be extensions of the fairness doctrine of a gradual and incremental character. The weaker licensees must suffer the risks involved in being part of an industry which on balance enjoys an exceptionally profitable monopoly.

What then should be the rule as to the application of the fairness doctrine to advertisements? There is some demand for its abolition. I think that it should be retained. The cigarette case attests to its potential for good. That case, however, is exceptional when compared to other instances in which its application has been urged. If the mere advertisement of gasoline, automobiles, or electrical energy were to be held to raise an issue of environmental pollution, the cases might be similar. But such a holding would press far the rationale of the cigarette case, since the environmental impact of these products is a function of many variables.

But it is not easy to formulate a fully satisfactory rule for applying the fairness doctrine to advertising. Its application is most obvious where the advertisement is explicitly controversial. But the advertiser may avoid the explicit precisely to foreclose a claim to rebuttal, or because he believes the subliminal is more effective. It should suffice to trigger the doctrine that by implication he intends to speak to a current, publicly-acknowledged controversy. However, with rare exceptions, such as cigarettes, at least that much should be required.[43] Mere advertising of a product, unless as with cigarettes its malignity is well-established, should not suffice; I therefore question the extension of the fairness doctrine to permit antipollution rejoinders to automobile ads. The broadcaster in deciding whether to accept an advertisement should be able to forecast the applicability of the fairness doctrine. This he can do if a reading of the advertisement reveals an intention to address, even though only implicitly, a current controversy. Once he accepts an advertisement of this character, he understands that he must expect to make time available for a reply.

---

[38] Public Health Cigarette Smoking Act of 1969, 15 U.S.C. § 1335 (1970). As an ironic sidelight, it should be mentioned that when the broadcasters challenged the constitutionality of the total ban on cigarette advertising, Judge Wright, one of the most zealous judicial proponents of the fairness doctrine, dissented from a three-judge court's holding that the statute was constitutional on the grounds that it infringed the public's right to hear procigarette commercials. Judge Wright argued that if procigarette advertising raised an issue of public importance requiring a fairness reply it was inconsistent to now hold the making of such statements could be constitutionally forbidden. See Capital Broadcasting v. Mitchell, 333 F. Supp. 582, 587–94 (D.D.C. 1971) (Wright, J., dissenting).

[39] See Green v. FCC, 447 F.2d 323, 329 (D.C. Cir. 1971). See also Neckritz v. FCC, 446 F.2d 501 (9th Cir. 1971).

[40] See, e.g., Friends of the Earth, 24 F.C.C.2d 743 (1970), rev'd, 449 F.2d 1164 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

[41] 449 F.2d 1164 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

[42] See pp. 769–71 supra.

[43] In the present inflammed state of public opinion even this "intention to address" limitation may create problems. Suppose that General Motors engages in institutional advertising to foster a benign public image without any intention to address a particular

In another recent case the Commission itself, in a unanimous opinion,[44] made an important concession to the Johnson position by holding that a series of ads of Standard Oil of New Jersey, by emphasizing the need for developing petroleum reserves in Alaska, impliedly constituted an argument for building the hotly debated Alaska Oil Pipeline. More significantly, however, the case addressed the issue of the timing and exposure that had to be given the reply ads to satisfy the fairness doctrine. On rehearing, NBC was able to convince a majority that it had presented and was fairly presenting opposing views in its general programming.[45] This, however, did not satisfy Commissioner Johnson, who would have held that as applied to paid ads NBC should place response material which would reach the same audience as saw the original spots—Meet the Press, Saturday Night News, Sunday Night News—with the same force and same regularity as the original spots.[46] However, anticigarette spots were broadcast on the basis of only about one to every five cigarette advertisements and not necessarily to the same audience as the original commercial. Since, however, the anticigarette ads reminded an individual that he endangered his immediate personal health if he did not give up his smoking habit, they were likely to be effective no matter when broadcast. In contrast, the force of antigasoline, antiautomobile, and various other environmental messages is much more remote, since the individual does not feel as directly threatened by the advertised evil. The lesser impact of the antipollution ads suggests Commissioner Johnson is clearly right in his contention that the environmental countercommercial should be given a position comparable to the commercial with sufficient exposure to make likely public awareness of the controversy.

Johnson's suggestions are moderate compared to those of the National Citizen's Committee for Broadcasting (NCCB). It demands that twenty percent of available advertising time be set aside for free rebuttals, that all time be available for sale for rebuttal commercials and that countercommercials follow the original ad immediately "whenever possible."[47] There is merit in setting aside a gross amount of free time for countercommercials. But the problems of rationing it, of deciding what groups are representative and how much air time should be devoted to any one subject are great. It could only work, I think, if the broadcaster were given very large discretion in its administration. A number of broadcasters are already setting aside periods of free access, though not specifically for countercommercials.[48]

I conclude, after this impressionistic examination, that the logic of applying the fairness doctrine to advertisements should not be expansively exploited. To do so would encourage constant recourse to the Commission and promote uncertainty in the industry. In 1966 the FCC received 409 fairness complaints: in 1970 it received just over sixty thousand.[49] The consequent cost in energies expended is not worth the marginal gains in public enlightenment. Furthermore, the general public does not share what I believe is the root cause of the drive for extension of the fairness doctrine: a distaste for advertising as the basis of television because of a belief that it promotes false values, distorts priorities, and must be consistently fought.

---

current controversy. Ralph Nader, however, may logically claim the right to a fairness response on the grounds that the character of General Motors as an institution is a controversial issue to which the GM ads intended to speak. Arguably the Commission applied the fairness doctrine to a case analogous to our GM hypothetical when it held that a local action group protesting the operation of a local charity had a right to a fairness reply to the charity's advertisements. See United People, 32 F.C.C.2d 124 (1971). The United People case is perhaps distinguishable from the GM hypothetical on the grounds that in United People the controversy was far more immediate and sharply focused and occurred within the local community a licensee is especially obligated to serve.

[44] National Broadcasting Co., 30 F.C.C.2d 643 (1971).

[45] Wilderness Society and Friends of the Earth, 31 F.C.C.2d 729 (1971).

[46] Id. at 742 (Commissioner Johnson, dissenting).

[47] Reply Comments of NCCB Submitted to the FCC in Docket No. 19,260—Fairness Doctrine at 2-3.

[48] See p. 790 infra. These problems of implementing the NCCB scheme are the same as those which would arise under any system of free "access" to air time. See pp. 787–92 infra.

[49] BROADCASTING, Dec. 27, 1971, at 21.

III. Access

The Commission has recently been required to wrestle with a question somewhat akin to fairness, yet significantly different—that of access. The broadcaster satisfies the fairness requirement when he puts on a program adequately reflecting a viewpoint in opposition to the one previously aired. The broadcaster, however, retains control of the program format and the selection of the opposition speaker. In contrast, one who claims a right of access argues there is a public or constitutional interest in his particular voice being heard on the air even over the opposition of the broadcaster. There is under the statute an access right for an opponent after a broadcaster sells time to a political candidate.[50]

A controversy now rages as to whether a licensee must sell time for "advertorials," spot announcements or noncommercial advertisements involving the broadcasting of opinion on controversial issues. A number of broadcasters have refused to accept advertorials carrying an anti-Vietnam War message. They gave as their reason that a spot announcement on an issue of public importance is superficial sloganeering.[51] But such reasoning may be thought an expression of intellectual snobbery. The uncomplicated truths and falsehoods most apt for mass media may be better and more succintly said in one than five minutes. The message at least alerts the listener to the issue and, if it comes from a source which he trusts or distrusts, helps him to find his way to the taking of sides. It may thus form one legitimate link in the intricate, drawn-out process of opinion formation. The broadcasters' real reasons for hostility to advertorials may center around their fear that the average listener, bored or angered by the political message, may not watch the commercials or programs that follow. They may also fear that the application of the fairness doctrine to advertorials may compel enormous amounts of free time for rebuttals.

For a time the broadcasters' fears must have been assuaged by the Commission, which refused to compel broadcasters to accept the one minute anti-war advertorials proferred by a group called the Business Executives' Move for Vietnam Peace (BEM).[52] Dissenting Commissioner Johnson emphasized the first amendment irony of the Commission's position, which resulted in preference for commercial as opposed to political speech.[53] But it is perverse to attribute the broadcasters' practice to an evaluation of the comparative worth of commercial and political expression. Rather, the practice reflected the fact that commercial advertising has been and is the financial base of the industry. Commissioner Johnson's dissent presaged further trouble for the broadcasters. A divided panel of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia Circuit reversed the Commission's decision.[54] It first held that broadcasting constituted state action; therefore first amendment obligations attached to a licensee's actions.[55] It then held that although no one person—whether this plaintiff or another—had a right of access, a flat ban on all editorial advertising was invalid. It basically adopted the position of Commissioner Johnson: "[I]f the First Amendment prohibits anything at all, it must be a censorial discrimination among ideas."[56] The matter was remanded to the FCC to formulate "a scheme of reasonable regulations"[57]—the one that would "avoid any possibility of chaos and confusion"[58] and would prevent domination [of the airwaves] by a few groups or a few viewpoints."[59] Judge McGowan, dissenting, could not find such compulsions in the first amendment. He estimated the task imposed on the Commission as one of "heroic proportions,"[60] "one whose very complexities may undermine the premise upon which it is founded."[61] The obligations of the fairness doctrine, he felt, adequately satisfied the public's right to know.

---

[50] Communications Act of 1934, 47 U.S.C. § 315(a) (1964). The Commission has extended this right to a candidate's supporters where spokesmen for other candidates are permitted to buy time. See Nicholas Zapple, 23 F.C.C.2d 707 (1970).

[51] Business Executives' Move for Vietnam Peace, 25 F.C.C.2d 242 (1970), rev'd, 450 F.2d 642 (D.C. Cir. 1971), petition for cert. filed, 40 U.S.L.W. 3317 (U.S. Jan 11, 1972) (No. 864).

[52] Id. In a companion case, the Commission ruled in part that a station could not arbitrarily deny time for the solicitation of funds for political purposes. Democratic Nat'l Comm., 25 F.C.C.2d 216 (1970) rev'd on other grounds sub. nom Business Executives Move for Vietnam Peace v. FCC, 450 F.2d 642 (D.C. Cir. 1971), petition for cert. filed, 40 U.S.L.W. 3317 (U.S. Jan 11, 1972) (No. 864).

[53] Business Executives' Move for Vietnam Peace, 25 F.C.C.2d 242, 252 (1970).

[54] Business Executives' Move for Vietnam Peace v. FCC, 450 F.2d 642 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

[55] Id. at 651–54.

[56] Id. at 660.

[57] Id. at 663.

[58] Id.

[59] Id. at 664.

[60] Id. at 666.

A. ACCESS AND STATE ACTION

The first issue before the BEM court was whether broadcasting and licensee actions are state action. Proponents of the view that it is[62] and the court[63] relied to some extent on holdings that transportation systems,[64] and school newspapers[65] operated by a public authority could not, if they accepted advertising at all, refuse paid editorials. But is a broadcaster a public authority? On this question Commissioner Johnson, dissenting below,[66] derived comfort from Marsh v. Alabama[67] and Amalgamated Food Employees v. Logan Valley Plaza.[68] In Marsh the Court held that the industrial proprietor of a "company town" could not forbid meetings and speeches on its "public" streets. The proprietor functioned as a municipality and had to afford its inhabitants the usual rights and opportunities available to residents in more conventional municipalities. Logan Valley extended Marsh to the sidewalk complex surrounding a suburban shopping center. The center could not, the Court held, insulate its shops from the labor picketing to which shops are normally subject. Here private property serving functions which are normally and traditionally public—for example, as streets and squares—was held to acquire the status of public property. But the transmission of information by electromagnetic waves has not in that specific sense seemed a commonly accepted public function. BEM, therefore, does not flow naturally from Marsh and Logan Valley.

Indeed, Judge Wright, speaking for the court, refused to hold that broadcasting was inherently a public forum analogous to the streets in Marsh or the shopping center in Logan Valley.[69] Rather he grounded his rationale on the fact that broadcasting is licensed to use the airwaves, and is regulated in that use; and the airwaves, he said, "are 'a limited and valuable part of the public domain,' leased out temporarily by the federal government which retains ultimate control over them."[70]

The popular cliché that the broadcaster is using "the public's airwaves" is a vague, indeterminate concept. I think we would have heard little of it had not the existing technology required regulation of broadcasting to avoid interference. For in one way or another we all use air and space. To speak of owning such resources is a solecism.

Judge Wright's further argument, that broadcasting is state action because it is regulated, is also not entirely satisfactory. The argument does have some force when what is being regulated is a public utility like a transportation system whose very premise is universal public service.[71] Broadcasting, however, is not such a public utility. Furthermore, we are all regulated in thousands of ways in our use of our houses and our streets. We are all inextricably and ultimately dependent upon and interdependent with government. Yet because we believe it to be important to distinguish the private and public spheres, our acts, our failures to act, our prejudices, and our misconducts do not become acts of government. If we discriminate, indeed, if we are permitted to discriminate, against blacks, government has not therefore discriminated. We are each of us private centers of power and initiative, and it would be ironic to conclude that if in the public interest a person or an enterprise must be very much regulated, his actions by reason of that very liability become the actions of the state. By merely tolerating my action the state does not adopt it as its own; the failure of a court to prohibit such conduct does not make it the conduct of the court.[72] Although Shelley v. Kraemer[73] held that enforcement of a restrictive covenant against black occupancy was state discrimination, that case is distinguishable from BEM and was correctly decided because in effect a seller was compelled to discriminate against his will.[74] As support for an affirmative obligation on government to act against discrimination, moreover, it stands alone in the case law.[75]

---

[61] Id.

[62] See Johnson & Westen, A Twentieth Century Soapbox: The Right to Purchase Radio and Television Time, 57 VA. L. REV. 574, 590–91 (1971) [hereinafter cited as Johnson & Westen].

[63] 450 F.2d at 659.

[64] Wirta v. Alameda-Contra Costa Transit Dist., 68 Cal.2d 51, 434 P.2d 982, 64 Cal. Rep. 430 (1967); Hillside Community Church, Inc. v. City of Tacoma, 76 Wash.2d 63, 455 P.2d 350 (1969).

[65] Lee v. Board of Regents, 306 F. Supp. 1097 (W.D. Wis. 1969), aff'd, 441 F.2d 1257 (7th Cir. 1971); Zucker v. Panitz, 299 F. Supp. 102 (S.D.N.Y. 1969).

[66] 25 F.C.C.2d at 258.

[67] 326 U.S. 501 (1946).

[68] 391 U.S. 308 (1968).

[69] 450 F.2d at 659.

[70] Id. at 652, quoting Office of Communication of United Church of Christ v. FCC 359 F.2d 994, 1003 (D.C. Cir. 1966).

[71] See Public Util. Comm'n v. Pollack, 343 U.S. 451 (1952).

In sum, the arguments of Judge Wright stretch the concept of state action very far. I would have preferred to place the decision on a more modest basis. Advertorials do serve a legitimate purpose. In a monopoly-based video system there should be some provision for them. It would therefore be legitimate to interpret the statute as making some room for them. This might have been done by the Commission as a matter of policy, and it is always open to a reviewing court to transmute desirable policy into propositions of law.[76] Putting BEM on a statutory ground would have left the way open for Congress to reformulate the broadcaster's advertorial obligations should experience or the political process dictate change. To be sure, arguments based on the Constitution are very fashionable these days and might be seen by a judge as protection against congressional or administrative manipulation. But if we are to live with this ruling, the regulatory scheme will have to be flexible, and flexibility is more difficult to achieve under the mighty connotations of the first amendment.

Another problem that could have been avoided by placing the BEM holding on statutory grounds is the inevitable question whether printed publications are also state action. The current legal status of the fairness and access obligations of printed publications is mixed. In a few states, statutes require a paper to print replies to a defamatory attack on an individual.[77] Last Term a plurality opinion of the Supreme Court commented approvingly on such statutes arguing that they took "into account the individual's interest in access to the press." [78] A legislative proposal has been made to extend to newspapers the broader fairness obligation of presenting balanced coverage on issues of public importance.[79] But two recent federal courts of appeals decisions have refused to compel newspapers or magazines to accept advertorials.[80]

As discussed shortly, there is some danger in one-newspaper towns that the press will suppress local news for corrupt reasons, and the risk is aggravated if the newspaper and the TV station are commonly owned, a situation which should not be tolerated. It is probably feasible to require newspapers to print advertorials and replies to attacks on individuals, although additional administrative burdens would thereby be created for enforcement. However, even Professor Emerson, a most zealous proponent of free speech, believes that "any effort to solve the broader problems of a monopoly press by forcing newspapers to cover all 'newsworthy events' and present all view-points under the watchful eyes of petty officials is likely to undermine such independence as the press now shows without achieving any real diversity." [81]

But how then to distinguish the press from television? The air-waves are limited? There is more monopoly? It is sometimes said in reply that in fact there are more radio and TV stations than newspapers: over ninety-five percent of American cities do not have competitive newspapers.[82] But it is not the number of broadcasting stations and newspapers that should be compared. Rather, as Professor Emerson suggests,[83] the comparison should be with printing presses; they far outnumber television stations. That numbers do play a significant role in the need for a fairness doctrine is indicated by the fact that radio is no longer seriously monitored for fairness doctrine compliance. If monopoly is not accepted as adequate to explain the difference in theory and practice between broadcasting and the press, another justification may be hazarded. Radio did not originate as an organ of expression and made no claim to be such. It was seen as a facility somewhat comparable to the telephone and the telegraph or as a forum where entertainment and debates could be presented. Initially the FRC refused even to allow radio to editorialize.[84] Though the Supreme Court has confirmed the broadcaster's right of free speech,[85] broadcasting, or at least TV, continues to be conditioned by its original historic function as a facility of dissemination, not of expression for its owner.

---

[72] There is respectable law review commentary to the contrary. See Black, The Supreme Court, 1966 Term, Foreword: "State Action," Equal Protection, and California's Proposition 14, 81 HARV. L. REV. 69 (1967). But law review commentary is all it is.

[73] 334 U.S. 1 (1948).

[74] See Pollack, Racial Discrimination and Judicial Integrity: A Reply to Professor Wechsler, 108 U. PA. L. REV. 1, 13 (1959).

[75] Cf. Evans v. Abney, 396 U.S. 435 (1970).

[76] See L. JAFFE, JUDICIAL CONTROL OF ADMINISTRATIVE ACTION 575 (1965).

[77] See, e.g., MISS. CODE ANN. § 3175 (1942); WIS. STAT. § 895.05(2) (1961).

[78] Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc., 403 U.S. 29, 47 n.15 (1971) (Brennan, J.).

[79] H.R. 18927, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. (1970).

[80] Associates & Aldrich Co. v. Times Mirror Co., 440 F.2d 133 (9th Cir. 1971); Chicago Joint Bd., Amalgamated Clothing Workers v. Chicago Tribune Co., 435 F.2d 470 (7th Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 402 U.S. 973 (1971). See also Resident Participation of Denver, Inc. v. Love, 322 F. Supp. 1100 (D.C. Colo. 1971).

[81] T. EMERSON, THE SYSTEM OF FREE EXPRESSION 670–71 (1970).

[82] See Note, Resolving the Free Speech-Free Press Dichotomy: Access to the Press through Advertising, 22 U. FLA. L. REV. 293, App. I, Table I, at 317 (1969).

[83] T. EMERSON, supra note 81, at 670–71.

There is a broader rationale for holding broadcasting to be state action which, although not advanced by the BEM court, has been utilized by commentators. Professor Barron,[86] Nicholas Johnson,[87] and most recently Professor Walden [88] subscribe to the proposition that today—as distinguished from some never-identified halcyon age—great decision-making powers are lodged in the hands of a few who operate without defined legal responsibilities or any formal duties of public accountability.[89] Such great private power, it is reasoned, must be brought under constitutional control. This rationale would obviously make the print, as well as the broadcast media, state action. These commentators further assert that the mass media, the networks, and the newspaper chains practice "private censorship" and that it, not governmental censorship, poses the greatest threat to our free society.

The proposition that the threat of government censorship is much less than that of private censorship cannot withstand the lesson of the government's attempt to suppress publication of the Pentagon Papers.[90] An argument of this sort can only be made by one who, not having lived under a system of government censorship, appears to have no idea what it really means. If one private person suppresses a fact there are others who may publish. Not so if government forbids!

It must be conceded that particularly in cities with a single newspaper—a situation aggravated if the paper owns the only TV station—there is a considerable risk of suppression of local news because of a likely tie-in of the newspaper with the local power structure. Here there may be more need for the finding of state action and the ensuing first amendment obligations than in the great national concerns, though ironically it is in connection with the latter that the question has been raised. Yet even this need should not be exaggerated. A reading of the most recent report of the Alfred I. Dupont-Columbia University Survey of Broadcast Journalism shows that a number of local stations are developing bold and independent news and public affairs programs in areas such as race relations, slum housing, and environmental pollution.[91] Newsmen in Indianapolis reported a belief that "professionalism is increasing steadily at the local level." [92] There is, I think, no question that both the networks and the local stations are doing very good work in journalism, at least as compared with the painfully dull and shoddy character of their entertainment programs.

To say that the media have great decision-making powers without defined legal responsibilities or any formal duties of public accountability is both to overestimate their power and to put forth a meaningless formula for reform. How shall we make the New York Times "accountable" for its anti-Vietnam policy? Require it to print letters to the editor in support of the war? If the situation is as grave as stated, the remedy is fantastically inadequate. But the situation is not that grave. The New York Times, the Chicago Tribune, NBC, ABC, and CBS play a role in policy formation, but clearly they were not alone responsible, for example, for Johnson's decision not to run for re-election, Nixon's refusal to withdraw the troops from Vietnam, the rejection of the two billion dollar New York bond issue, the defeat of Carswell and Haynsworth, or the Supreme Court's segregation, reapportionment and prayer decisions. The implication that the people of this country—except the proponents of the heory—are mere unthinking automatons manipulated by the media, without nterests, conflicts, or prejudices is an assumption which I find quite madden-ng. The development of constitutional doctrine should not be based on such ysterical overestimation of media power and underestimation of the good ense of the American public.

---

[84] See note 14 supra.

[85] See Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367, 386 (1969); United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 334 U.S. 131, 166 (1948).

[86] See Barron, An Emerging First Amendment Right of Access to the Media?, 37 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 487 (1969); Barron, Access to the Press — A New First Amendment Right, 80 Harv. L. Rev. 1641 (1967).

[87] See Johnson & Westen 603–07.

[88] See Walden, Book Review, 24 J. Legal Ed. 111 (1971).

[89] See id. at 115–17.

[90] See New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971).

[91] Columbia Survey 24–27.

[92] Id. at 30.

B. THE PROBLEMS OF IMPLEMENTING BEM

Pursuant to the remand in BEM, the Commission and the networks will ave to formulate regulations implementing the right of access created by that ecision.[93] There first will be the question of rationing the available time. Com-issioner Johnson has suggested first-come, first-serve.[94] But, the fee system ould mean that the rich will hog the available time. Judge Wright recognized his problem but felt it could be remedied by the fairness doctrine, which would equire acceptance of "at least some advertisements on the other side of the ssue, free of charge if necessary." [95] This need not, said the Judge, alarm the roadcaster since the question is simply the acceptance of "some" editorials. But the broadcaster in this situation cannot control potential fairness claims s he can with the ordinary commercial. He cannot, therefore, control the allo-ation of his most precious resource, advertising time. If advertorials engender airness obligations, the number the broadcaster is required to take must be imited by some quota, perhaps graded to his profit level.

Judge Wright's "fairness" solution to the problem of access for those who annot afford commercial rates, as problematical as it is, does not satisfy this eview,[96] which has argued that to permit broadcasters to charge the going ate for advertorials will favor the rich proponents of the status quo. Unless he poor are able to get on the air at no cost or at submarket rates, the argu-ment continues, their views will go unrepresented, thwarting to that extent the ery purpose of access.

The notion that the regular rate will necessarily exclude unpopular views r representation of the disadvantaged is only partly true. BEM itself was a ase of a demand to present advertorials against the Vietnam War, views hich were at one time extremely unpopular and to some extent are still so oday. As this Review recognizes,[97] there are well-funded groups devoted to he cause of the disadvantaged. Only those groups who cannot convince wealthy atrons to support them will not be able to purchase advertorial time. Finally, s Judge Wright emphasized, to some extent the fairness doctrine does require he presentation of diverse views. Indeed, one gets the feeling the Review is reating the advertorial in particular and broadcasting in general as if it were he only rather than just one more more avenue of expression.

This Review has further suggested that market rates might discriminate gainst the poor in the exercise of a "fundamental" first amendment right and herefore might not withstand an equal protection challenge.[98] The Supreme ourt has on occasion struck down arrangements which discriminated against he poor in the exercise of certain "fundamental" rights. Thus the Court has nvalidated a one year residency requirement for public assistance,[99] a poll tax n voting,[100] the payment of fees to perfect a criminal appeal.[101] Most recently n Boddie v. Connecticut,[102] the Court split between equal protection and due rocess grounds in relieving an indigent civil plaintiff seeking a divorce from filing fee. The Court's due process majority—seeking to restrict its ruling—mphasized "the basic position of the marriage relationship . . . and the con-omitant state monopolization of the means for legally dissolving" it.[103]

But the Court has made it clear that its capacity to alleviate the disadvan-ages of poverty is limited. Schemes which work out to the detriment of the oor are not ipso facto invalid.[104] First, even when a legislative scheme affects fundamental interest of the poor, it may stand if it has a "compelling" justifi-ation. Here, the broadcaster's interest in maintaining their revenues, or the to-be-discussed difficulties of administering any non-market access system might constitute such a justification. Second, the first amendment interests of the indigent here are marginal. Their freedom of speech is not totally suppressed. Unlike the divorce courts in Boddie, television is not an exclusive forum; there are many other avenues of expression.

---

[93] 450 F.2d at 665.

[94] Democratic Nat'l Comm., 25 F.C.C.2d 216, 234–35 (1970) (dissenting opinion).

[95] 450 F.2d at 664.

[96] 85 HARV. L. REV. 689, 694 (1972).

[97] Id. at 694–95.

[98] Id. at 694 n.28.

[99] See Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969).

[100] See Harper v. Virginia Bd. of Elections, 383 U.S. 663 (1966).

[101] See Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956).

[102] 401 U.S. 371 (1971).

[103] Id. at 374.

[104] See James v. Valtierra, 402 U.S. 137 (1971).

The concept of a special rate for those unable to pay the going rate, furthermore, would raise incredible administrative problems. There is no very obvious standard for setting the rate. This Review argues the rate should be set so as to keep down the number of frivolous access requests and yet not make the desired access too difficult to achieve.[105] But that means an arbitrary guess. And how would one define the group whose ability to pay is to be determined? Are any five, one hundred, or one thousand people gotten together to claim access a "group"? Should there be a minimum number of individuals? And do we then inquire into the resources of the five or the one hundred or the one thousand to determine their ability to pay or simply go by what they choose to call their treasury? In suggesting the going rate, Commissioner Johnson may have meant to avoid this hornet's nest of unanswerable questions.[106] He may have realized that to encumber the new device with such a load would bring the whole concept into question.

C. ACCESS TO SUBSTANTIAL LENGTH PROGRAMMING

As distinguished from the question of access for advertorials, there is also the question of access for substantial length programming. Commissioner Johnson has suggested that five percent of prime time, a total of six hours per week, be set aside for issue programs.[107] Applicants would probably command time on a first-come, first-serve basis and would pay the amount charged for the commercials generally aired with the time bloc. Johnson adds the qualification that they might have to meet "pre-established quality standards."[108] This qualification, of course, highlights the administrative difficulties of access devices, difficulties which would be increased if they were mandated or reviewed by the Commission. He suggests that as to these programs the fairness doctrine could be suspended and time for reply would have to be bought at the going rates.[109] I find this suggestion attractive. A device of this sort would recognize the public sense of television as both a provider of programs and a means of face-to-face communication.

Some stations have taken steps to implement substantial length access on their own. At least one public station, WGBH in Boston, makes thirty minutes available to any group or individual five times a week. With a two month backlog of applicants, WGBH has not yet had to cut off anyone for breaking the program's four rules forbidding identification of private persons, incitement of violence, obscene language, or solicitation of funds.[110] A few commercial stations have introduced more modest access programs, such as the reading out of letters to the station. Furthermore, cable television, with its many-channeled capacity, will increase the potential access of individuals to broadcast programming. Practically all cable franchises require that one or more channels be reserved for individual communication. Two New York City cable companies are each making two channels available for public-access programming, which in one case will be supported by foundation grants.[111] It will, however, for a long time be the case that the traditional over-the-air broadcast reaches many more people, particularly those of a class who cannot or will not pay for cable. For this reason, minority groups will not regard access to cable as adequate.

D. ACCESS AND MINORITIES

But access for minority groups to express their own life styles is probably even more important than opportunities to present positions on specifically defined issues. BEM recognized that there is a constitutional interest in self-expression involved in the access question,[112] although the problem before the court was access for political positions. Minorities, particularly blacks, see broadcasting as a means of communicating to their own people and to whites their style of expression. The broadcasting industry is almost entirely controlled by whites and its modes of expression for the most part are those of the dominant white culture.[113] Recently Michael Novak has reminded us that television personnel are predominantly professional and do not mix with "ordinary people." [114] Thus, television's style is the style of the educated class. Its speech and manner unconsciously express its own imagination and sense of reality. "Even when it tries to be pluralistic and diverse and objective, it places its own distinctive limitations and stamp on what it touches." [115] "The controlling style is one of 'fairness,' 'objectivity,' 'dispassionateness,' 'balance,' 'hard evidence.' One tries to present 'both sides.'" [116] But "[n]ot everybody has the same faith in 'facts' or in 'contradictions.'" Blacks do not trust the objectivity of the educated, neither do ethnics. Novak concludes that "[c]ountless Americans never hear their own accents, emotions, doubts, hatreds, aspirations, loyalties, reflected on the screen: ethnics as well as blacks feel the lack poignantly." [117] Access to broadcasting, either by affording minorities opportunities to produce their own programs, or by affording them some say in the programming choices made by predominantly white, professional television personnel, may help to overcome or to minimize these limitations.

---

[105] 85 HARV. L. REV. 689, 695 (1972).
[106] Johnson & Westen 605.
[107] Democratic Nat'l Comm., 25 F.C.C.2d 216, 235 (1970) (dissenting opinion).
[108] Id.
[109] Id.
[110] COLUMBIA SURVEY 26–27.
[111] See N.Y. Times, Oct. 26, 1971, at 83, col. 1; id., Sept. 25, 1971, at 62, col. 2.
[112] 450 F.2d at 655.

Both legal doctrines and licensee actions have begun to respond to the need for minority self-expression. Black groups have been effective in holding up license renewals until they received assurances that money would be spent on black programming and that they would be asked to participate in formulating the programs.[118] The recent decision of Judge Wright assuring a full hearing for those challenging incumbent licensees will substantially increase the leverage of these challenging groups.[119] An agreement recently negotiated with WBAP-TV in Dallas provides for one black and one Mexican-American news anchorman to be "seen and heard regularly." [120] More than one hundred community groups are being assisted by the Office of Communication of the United Church of Christ in securing similar concessions from broadcasters.[121]

But some demands of minorities and special interest groups may be both dangerous and preposterous. The Chicanos are mounting an attack on stations throughout the Southwest seeking to improve their image on television. In Los Angeles, a Chicano group charges that ABC-TV has portrayed Mexicans in a demeaning manner and demands that it be allowed to monitor all scripts and veto any program it considers racist.[122] This group also seeks to promote shows featuring Chicanos in significant roles, to promote group pride.[123] One can sympathize with these attempts and yet worry about programming that must offend no one, particularly those who are most sensitive. Other values must be balanced against the desirability of minority group access.

[From The Washington Post, July 13, 1971]

Esso, the FCC, and the Fairness Doctrine

Government-television relations simply cannot be viewed in black and white, as Congressman Staggers and the FCC have proved in recent weeks. Congressman Staggers raised one aspect of the issue of government supervision by attempting to subpoena unused film from the CBS documentary "The Selling of the Pentagon," said the answer in this case seems simple enough—the first amendment protects against government intrusion of this sort into programing.

Now the FCC has raised quite a different, and less clear-cut aspect of the question of government supervision of the airways by ruling that NBC has an obligation to present views contrary to those expressed in three Esso commercials. According to the commission, the three ads advocate one side of controversial issues of public importance, namely, the need for quick development of Alaska's North Slope oil fields and the alleged ecological safety of a pipeline across the state. Consequently, the three fall under the Fairness Doctrine, the FCC concluded, and NBC must present opposing viewpoints in commercials, sponsored programs, of, if necessary, free time.

---

[113] Citizens Communication Center v. FCC, 447 F.2d 1201, 1213–14 n.36 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

[114] Novak, The Inevitable Bias of Television, in COLUMBIA SURVEY 122.

[115] Id.

[116] Id. at 126.

[117] Id. at 130.

[118] See Office of Communication of United Church of Christ v. FCC, 359 F.2d 994 (D.C. Cir. 1966).

[119] Citizen's Communications Center v. FCC, 447 F.2d 1201 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

[120] BROADCASTING, July 5, 1971, at 9.

[121] Id., July 12, 1971, at 33.

[122] Id., June 28, 1971, at 23.

[123] Id.

The Fairness Doctrine has always trod a fine line between government meddling and a reasonable degree of government control over the public airways, and the Esso case is very close to the line, involving as it does not only program content but the pocketbook. These concerned with the vigor of the media cannot help worrying, if only because the number of commercial messages which may now deserve replies seems staggering, at least at first glance. Those less concerned with the overall picture may simply wonder whether we must now endure an anti-Pucker Power march for every Pucker Power parade.

According to the FCC, the answer is No. Stations will continue to leave product claims to the Federal Trade Commission, and may ignore general institutional advertising. The FCC has rejected petitions to reply to army recruiting ads, for example, stating that the ads advocate joining the army, not the policies in which the army participates. Only spots which argue one side of controversial issues of public importance fall under the newly expanded scope of the Fairness Doctrine, and these need be countered only with a reasonable opportunity for expression of opposing views, not equal time.

Admittedly there is a line to be drawn between product and institutional goodwill advertising, on the one hand, and arguments over controversial issues, on the other. But to our eyes it's a wavy line at best. What constitutes a controversial issue of public importance, and whether a station has offered reasonable opportunity for differing viewpoints, are in themselves subjective and controversial decisions. Motives of petitioners, economic effects, and the public interest also affect FCC rulings, making decisions even more difficult and unpredictable.

And yet, despite justified practical and philosophical concerns, we believe the FCC could follow no other course with the Esso commercials. To ignore totally the force of paid advertising would be to open the way to unfairness on a major scale. We trust the FCC will continue to tiptoe in this delicate area, with a healthy respect for the independence of broadcasters to balance the goal of making limited communications channels available to many points of view.

REMARKS OF CLAY T. WHITEHEAD, DIRECTOR, OFFICE OF TELECOMMUNICATIONS POLICY EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

International Radio and Television Society Newsmaker Luncheon
New York, October 6, 1971

This is a major speech—I read the advance billing and felt I had to say that. I was also billed as one of the youngest and most controversial figures in government and communications. Before I've even opened my mouth, Nick Johnson hates me.

Before I read that advance billing, we had planned one of my usual speeches. You know—a state of the universe message. But after a year of stating and restating the problems, I guess I can't get away with that any more. So this won't be that kind of speech, but I've gotten attached to the format, so I'd like to spend a little time on the state of broadcasting. I don't claim to have the expertise that any of you have in broadcasting; but in the first year of OTP's life, we've been exposed to many of the relationships between government, broadcasting, and the public. Today, I want to focus on those relationships.

I'll probably sound a bit naive to you when I say that some of these relationships don't make sense and should be changed. But why can't they be changed? —especially when they are the cause of many of our problems. The Communications Act isn't sacrosanct. It's a 37-year-old law that was intended to police radio interference—and it has frozen our thinking about broadcasting ever since. But something more than that is needed in a day when the electronic mass media are becoming the mass media.

There are a number of directions to choose from, and I'm here to propose one —one that redefines the relationships in the Communications Act's triangle of government, private industry, and the public.

But before I tell you what my proposals are, let me first tell you why I think a change is needed and why you should want one too.

Look at the current state of the broadcasting business. You sell audiences to advertisers. There's nothing immoral about that, but your audience thinks your business is providing them with programs. And the FCC regulates you in much the same way the public sees you. It requires no blinding flash of originality on my part to see that this creates a very basic conflict.

CBS's Programming Vice President says: "I've got to answer to a corporation that is in this to make money, and at the same time face up to a public responsibility. . ."

His counterparts at the other networks have the same problem. They all have to program what people will watch—what gets the lowest cost-per-thousand. Sometimes that's what the people want to watch, but more often than not it's the least offensive program.

But you don't care what I think about your programs—and you shouldn't have to care what any government official thinks about your programs.

But what does the public think? The signs aren't good.

Look at the new season: Twenty-two new prime-time network law and order shows and situation comedies fill in between movies and sports. It's the same old fare. Life's Harris poll is being interpreted to show that there is wide public dissatisfaction with the entertainment you offer.

Kids and teenagers are developing an immunity to your commercials. Do you doubt that advertisers are questioning the effectiveness of TV as a sales medium?

How long will you be able to deliver our children to food and toy manufacturers? Parents are calling the Pied Piper to task—there were 80,000 letters to the FCC concerning the ACT petition alone.

Consider the anomaly of blacks as your most faithful viewers and your most active license challengers.

I suppose it looks like I'm just another critic taking cheap shots at TV. But there's another side to the broadcasting business. In my part of Washington, it's no insult to call someone a successful businessman. You have created a successful business out of the air—people do watch television. Sure your success is measured in billions of dollars, but it's also measured in public service and all those sets in use.

But your success is taking its toll. It's giving you viewership, but not viewer satisfaction—public visibility but not public support.

You've always had criticism from your audience but it never really mattered—you never had to satisfy them; you only had to deliver them. Then the Rev. Everett Parker read the Communications Act. You all know the outcome of the WLBT-United Church of Christ case. Once the public discovered its opportunity to participate in the Commission's processes, it became inevitable that the rusty tools of program content control—license renewal and the Fairness Doctrine—would be taken from the FCC's hands and used by the public and the courts to make you perform to their idea of the public interest.

Surprise! Nick Johnson is right. The '34 Act is simply being used and enforced. But where is that taking us?

Look at where we're going on license renewals. In city after city, in an atmosphere of bewilderment and apprehension, the broadcaster is being pitted against the people he's supposed to serve. The proxy for the public becomes the patsy who is held responsible for the Vietnam War, pollution, and the turmoil of changing life styles. As the East Coast renewals come up again, you're snickering about ascertainment—sure it was designed for Salina, Kansas, and not New York City—but I'll wager you'll all wrap yourself in interview sheets when your applications are filed in March. But that won't make you less vulnerable at renewal time because you can have no assurance that your efforts over the years will count for anything if a competing application is filed. "Substantial performance" becomes "superior performance" at the drop of a semantic hat and means that the government has finally adopted program percentage minimums. That's the current price of renewal protection.

So while we all talk about localism, we establish national program standards. You go through the motions of discovering local needs, knowing that the real game is to satisfy the national standards set by government bureaucrats. But it's not a game. Right now your programs are being monitored and taped and the results will be judged under the FCC's 1960 Program Statement. Can you be safe in all 14 program categories?

The Fairness Doctrine and other access mechanisms are also getting out of hand. It is a quagmire of government program control and once we get into it we can only sink deeper. If you can't see where it's leading, just read the Red Lion and BEM cases. The courts are on the way to making the broadcaster a government agent. They are taking away the licensees' First Amendment rights and they are giving the public an abridgeable right of access. In effect, the First Amendment is whatever the FCC decides it is.

However nice they sound in the abstract, the Fairness Doctrine and the new judicially contrived access rights are simply more government control masquerading as an expansion of the public's right of free expression. Only the literary imagination can reflect such developments adequately—Kafka sits on the Court of Appeals and Orwell works in the FCC's Office of Opinions and Review. Has anyone pointed out that the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Communications Act is 1984? "Big Brother" himself could not have conceived a more disarming "newspeak" name for a system of government program control than the Fairness Doctrine.

I'm not seriously suggesting that the FCC or the courts want to be "Big Brother" or that 1984 is here, or that we can't choose a different path from the one we now seem to be on. You are at a crossroads—now you're probably clutching your "Chicago Teddy Bears" and wondering when Whitehead is going to get to the point. The point is: We need a fundamental revision of the framework of relationships in which you, the government, and the public, interact. The underpinnings of broadcast regulation are being changed—the old status quo is gone and none of us can restore it. We can continue the chaos and see where we end up. But there has to be a better way.

I have three proposals. They are closely related and I want you to evaluate them as a package that could result in a major revision of the Communications Act. The proposals are: One, eliminate the Fairness Doctrine and replace it with a statutory right of access; two, change the license renewal process to get the government out of programming; and three, recognize commercial radio as a medium that is completely different from TV and begin to de-regulate it.

I propose that the Fairness Doctrine be abandoned. It should be replaced by an act of Congress that meets both the claim of individuals to use of the nation's most important mass media and the claim of the public at large to adequate coverage of public issues. These are two distinct claims and they cannot both be served by the same mechanism.

Access: As to the first of them—the individual's right to speak: TV time set aside for sale should be available on a first-come, first-served basis at nondiscriminatory rates—but there must be no rate regulation. The individual would have a right to speak on any matter, whether it's to sell razor blades or urge an end to the war. The licensee should not be held responsible for the content of ads, beyond the need to guard against illegal material. Deceptive product ads should be controlled at the source by the Federal Trade Commission. This private right of access should be enforced—as most private rights are enforced—through the courts and not through the FCC.

License Renewals: As to the second claim—the opportunity of the public to be informed on public issues: This is the type of "public interest" traditionally protected by regulatory agencies, but it should be done in a manner which recognizes it as an overall right, which cannot sensibly be enforced on a case-by-case basis. It can best be protected, I suggest, not in countless proceedings involving individual complaints, but in the course of the renewal process. The licensee would be obligated to make the totality of programming that is under his control (including public service announcements) responsive to the interests and concerns of the community. The criterion for renewal would be whether the broadcaster has, over the term of his license, made a good faith effort to ascertain local needs and interests and to meet them in his programming. There would be no place for government-conceived program categories, percentages and formats, or any value judgment on specific program content.

There should be a longer TV license period with the license revocable for cause and the FCC would invite or entertain competing applications only when a license is not renewed or is revoked.

I believe these revisions in the access and renewal processes will add stability to your industry and avoid the bitter adversary struggle between you and your community groups. They recognize the new concerns of access and fairness in a way that minimizes government content control.

I'm not saying that this will eliminate controversies. But it will defuse and change the nature of the controversies.

Radio De-Regulation: We can go further with radio. Yesterday I sent a letter to Dean Burch proposing that OTP and the FCC jointly develop an experiment to de-regulate commercial radio operations.

We proposed that one or more large cities be selected as de-regulatory test markets in which radio assignments and transfers would be pro-forma. Renewals would not be reviewed for programming and commercial practices. And the Fairness Doctrine would be suspended. The experiment should be only a first step. For most purposes, we should ultimately treat radio as we now treat magazines.

These are my proposals. The proposals are just that—I have no legislation tucked in my back pocket that we are about to introduce. But, I will work for legislation if there is support for these proposals. In short, my message on all these proposals is that we've tried government program control and bureaucratic standards of fairness and found that they don't work. In fact, they can't work. Let's give you and the public a chance to exercise more freedom in a more sensible framework and see what that can do.

There is one further aspect of freedom I would like to discuss. Some people suggest that this Administration is trying to use the great power of government licensing and regulation to intimidate the press. Some even claim to see a malicious conspiracy designed to achieve that end. They must ascribe to us a great deal of maliciousness, indeed—and a great deal of stupidity—in the attempt to reconcile their theory to the facts. It is not this Administration that is pushing legal and regulatory controls on television, in order to gain an active role in determining content. It is not this Administration that is urging an extension of the Fairness Doctrine into the details of television news—or into the print media.

There is a world of difference between the professional responsibility of a free press and the legal responsibility of a regulated press. This is the same difference between the theme of my proposals today and the current drift of broadcasting regulation. Which will you be—private business or government agent? —a responsible free press or a regulated press? You cannot have it both ways—neither can government nor your critics.

[From the Columbia Law Review, Vol. 71, June 1971]

Notes

Cable Television and The First Amendment*

Introduction

The traditional argument reconciling governmental regulation of television with the first amendment is based upon the technology of broadcasting. The reasoning is that, as the electromagnetic spectrum is finite, the number of channels available is limited. Thus, to prevent chaos, the government must allocate these channels to serve the public interest. Cable television [CATV], however, provides a new mode of television signal transmission which is not subject to the same limitations as broadcasting, and so this rationale for the limitation of first amendment rights of broadcasters seems inapplicable to cablecasters.

This Note is concerned with the application of the first amendment to CATV. The first half examines the rationales that have been suggested to justify a control over television programming stricter than that constitutionally permissible in other media and the applicability of these theories to a cable-based system. A model for governmental regulation of CATV program content within constitutional bounds is proposed in the second half.

I. THE TECHNOLOGY OF CATV [1]

CATV refers to a specific mode of transmission of television signals. Broadcast television signals are transmitted to the receiver over the air by use of a frequency of the electromagnetic spectrum. CATV signals travel to the receiver through a coaxial cable with a capacity, given present technology, of as many as eighty-two channels.[2]

CATV was first developed as a method of delivering broadcast signals to rural homes that could not receive adequate reception directly off the air.[3] In recent years, however, CATV has begun to move into urban centers at a quickening pace. By the beginning of 1970 there were an estimated 2,385 CATV systems serving 4.5 million people—or about 7.8% of all television homes.[4] Thus, although CATV was originally developed as a conduit for broadcast signals, the possibility of program origination is one of the features that makes CATV, with its plentiful channel space, a potentially revolutionary force in the communications industry. The Federal Communications Commission [FCC] has recognized this possibility and now requires that any CATV system with more than 3,500 subscribers originate on at least one channel.[5]

---

* This Note was prepared with the editorial assistance of the 1970–71 Board of Editors.

[1] For a more detailed discussion of the technology and regulatory history of CATV, see Note, Regulation of Community Antenna Television, 70 COLUM. L. REV. 837, 837–53 (1970).

[2] Sands, CATV and the Telephone Industry, TEL.-ENG'R & MGMT., Feb. 1, 1968, at 25. The largest system currently being installed, at San Jose, California, provides for forty-two channels. BROADCASTING, Feb. 2, 1970, at 36.

[3] THE MAYOR'S ADVISORY TASK FORCE ON CATV AND TELE-COMMUNICATIONS, A REPORT ON CABLE TELEVISION AND CABLE TELECOMMUNICATIONS IN NEW YORK CITY 4 (1968) [hereinafter cited as MAYOR'S TASK FORCE REPORT]. See M. SEIDEN, AN ECONOMIC ANALYSIS OF COMMUNITY ANTENNA TELEVISION SYSTEMS AND THE TELEVISON BROADCASTING INDUSTRY (1965).

While CATV provides near perfect reception[6] and relieves crowding of the electromagnetic spectrum,[7] it is the potential for program diversity and innovative channel uses through full utilization of the many channels that is one of the most exciting aspects of the new technology.[8] The low cost of CATV origination will enable cable systems operators to exploit fully their expanded channel capacity by making television time available to potential originators who, heretofore, have been unable to afford access to the broadcast channels. The equipment needed to originate on CATV involves an investment of as little as $2,700 per year for a minimum system to $55,000 per year for a sophisticated color system.[9] Among the most significant potential uses of these CATV origination channels is "public common carrier" service,[10] which would be made available to anyone wishing to buy time. In such an arrangement, the CATV operator would provide a studio and the technical expertise, but would have no control over what is broadcast.[11] Because of the low cost of CATV origination and transmission (public common carrier time might be sold for as little as $5 per hour),[12] public common carrier channels could easily develop into true community forums to which all opinions would have equal access.

The most salient feature of CATV for the purposes of this Note is that, unlike broadcast television, there are no technical limitations on the potential number of channels available in a given locale. Should all the channels on a given cable be in use, there is no technological reason why another cable could not be laid, economic factors permitting.[13]

In discussing CATV program content control, it would be helpful to keep in mind two alternative structures for the television industry as possible developments in the forseeable future. In the more extreme (but not unrealistic) model,[14] CATV would totally displace broadcasting as the mode of television transmission. As is true of electricity wire, cable is able to reach virtually every home in the country.[15] Very probably, today's broadcasters would maintain their origination function, but they would no longer be in the transmission business; rather they would lease channel space from the local CATV operator on a full-time basis.[16]

---

[4] BROADCASTING, Jan. 26, 1970, at 55.

[5] CATV—First Report and Order, 34 Fed. Reg. 1751, 17655 (1969).

[6] This accounts for some of its popularity in urban areas where "ghosting" is a constant problem due to tall buildings. MAYOR'S TASK FORCE REPORT, supra note 3, at 5.

[7] A steady increase in the number of those wishing to use mobile radio communications has produced a situation known as "the silent crisis." Id. at 6.

[8] Memorandum to CATV—Second Report and Order, 35 FED. REG. 10903 (1970). See Barnett & Greenberg, A Proposal for Wired City Television, 1968 WASH.U.L.Q. 1, 2 (1968) [hereinafter cited as Barnett & Greenberg].

[9] CATV—First Report and Order, 34 Fed. Reg. 17651, 17655 (1969).

[10] This Note uses the term "public common carrier" to refer to the operation of a station that is readily available to individual members of the public. The term "common carrier" as applied to CATV is commonly used to signify that the CATV operator will lease channel space to anyone, but, in that broader sense, it does not include the specific requirements that the CATV operator provide the studio and technical expertise in order to facilitate the general public's access to the medium of television. Without such a requirement, a common carrier channel would be available only to those groups possessing the money and expertise to establish their own origination studio. See, e.g., L. JOHNSON, THE FUTURE OF CABLE TELEVISION: SOME PROBLEMS OF FEDERAL REGULATION 56–61 (1970) [hereinafter cited as L. JOHNSON]; Barnett & Greenberg, supra note 8, at 13; Note, supra note 1, at 874–75.

[11] The FCC has accepted this policy as a goal. CATV—First Report and Order, 34 Fed. Reg. 17651, 17653–54, 17656 (1969).

[12] Barnet & Greenberg, supra note 8, at 21.

[13] There are communications systems in various stages of development, such as laser and wave guide systems which can, through a single cable, supply tens of thousands of channels. Installation of them would even do away with these possible added economic burdens of having to lay new cable whenever channel scarcity developed. See, e.g., TIME, Apr. 12, 1971, at 59.

[14] See Note, supra note 1, at 844–45 and authorities cited in footnotes 50 & 51. See generally Barnett & Greenberg, supra note 8.

[15] Those rural homes to which direct cable connection would be either impossible or too costly to be feasible can be included in the system by the use of a multi-channel microwave transmission system in conjunction with the cable system. See Note, supra note 1, at 843–44 and authorities cited in footnotes 46–49.

[16] See Barnett & Greenberg, supra note 8, at 13; MAYOR'S TASK FORCE REPORT, supra note 3, at 55–64.

But as it is not clear that the powerful and entrenched broadcasting industry will be totally eclipsed within the next twenty years, it is helpful to posit as a second model a system in which broadcast and cable television are both active. In such a system, the two modes would both operate as origination and transmission media, with CATV also supplying public access channels.[17] But because of its coexistence with broadcast television, CATV would have less of an impact on the communications media in general and this might be of significance in dealing with the systems in light of the first amendment.[18]

II. THE PRESENT SYSTEM OF TELEVISION CONTENT REGULATION

The statute creating the Federal Communications Commission states that the FCC cannot act as a censor: "And no regulation or condition shall be promulgated or fixed by the Commission which shall interfere with the right of free speech by means of radio communication." [19]

Although thus limited by the statute and by the first amendment, the FCC does have broad regulatory powers to "make such rules and regulations and prescribe such restrictions and conditions, not inconsistent with the law, as may be necessary to carry out . . ." the statutory commands regarding radio and television regulation.[20] The Commission is also empowered to grant licenses "if public convenience, interest, or necessity will be served thereby. . . ." [21] These statutory grants have been broadly construed [22] so as not to confine the FCC to regulation of the technical aspects of radio and television, but rather to permit the Commission to regulate all facets of radio communication in order to "encourage the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest." [23]

The "public interest" standard has been used to justify denials of license renewals because of programming that the FCC itself finds to be against the "public interest." [24] The "public interest" criterion has also been used to justify rules [25] that relate directly to program content.[26]

Such rules and standards as are developed by the Commission are enforced primarily through the license renewal process.[27] By granting only a short-term license renewal,[28] the FCC can usually bring a recalcitrant licensee into line.[29] Of course, denial of renewal [30] or license revocation [31] are the ultimate sanctions and, as such, are rarely invoked.[32] However, the renewal process itself is an effective method of regulation because the licensee has the burden [33] of coming forth with proof of his compliance with FCC rules.[34] Furthermore, the frequency of this review (every three years) [35] ensures "that the Commission will scrutinize the actual performance of the station in relation to the performance promised." [36] Also, the licensee's stake in the process is enormous: he has a large capital investment in a highly profitable business that can continue only at the pleasure of the FCC. Therefore, the licensee will be extremely reluctant to incur the wrath of the Commission and will generally respond to subtle administration regulation.

---

[17] See L. JOHNSON, supra note 10, at viii. The future of the communications industry is further complicated by the potential of satellite and laser beam communications. However, this Note keeps the models as simple as possible in order to avoid obfuscating the first amendment issues.

[18] See sections III-C-4, VI-A-1, and VI-B infra.

[19] 47 U.S.C. § 326 (1964).

[20] 47 U.S.C. § 303(r) (1964).

[21] 47 U.S.C. § 307(a) (1964). See Trinity Methodist Church, South v. FRC, 62 F.2d 850 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 288 U.S. 599 (1932); KFKB Broadcasting Ass'n v. FRC, 47 F.2d 670 (D.C. Cir. 1931).

[22] See, eg., NBC v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 214–18 (1943).

[23] 47 U.S.C. § 303(g) (1964).

[24] Robinson, The FCC and the First Amendment: Observations on 40 Years of Radio and Television Regulation, 52 MINN. L. REV. 67, 98–103 (1967) [hereinafter cited as Robinson].

[25] See, e.g., 47 C.F.R. § 73.679 (1971) (a portion of the fairness doctrine). The fairness doctrine was first promulgated by the FCC. Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 14 Fed. Reg. 3055 (1949). Later, Congress adopted this policy by an amendment to 47 U.S.C. § 315(a). Act of Sept. 14, 1959. Pub. L. No. 86-274, 73 Stat. 557.

[26] The power to refuse a license on grounds of past or proposed programming necessarily entails some power to define the station's public interest obligations with respect to programming . . . . [E]lementary canons of administrative and constitutional law prevent the Commission from terminating a license without giving reasons or from condemning a station's overall programming as inimical to the public interest without identifying the offending material and particularizing the public interest. And if the Commission must explain its view of the public interest when it denies or revokes a license, it may surely give advance notice of its views by way of an official ruling which is subject to judicial review. Banzhaf v. FCC, 405 F.2d 1082, 1095 (D.C. Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 842 (1969).

[27] 47 U.S.C. §§ 307–13. See Robinson, supra note 24, at 118–21.

[28] 47 U.S.C. § 307(d), as implemented by 47 C.F.R. § 73.630(a).

[29] See, e.g., Loyola Univ., 24 P & F RADIO REG. 766 (1962) (one year renewal because of failure to fulfill previous promises as to programming); Allentown Broadcasting Corp., 40 F.C.C. 122 (1961) (one year renewal because of variance between programming proposals and actual performance); Robinson, supra note 24, at 120–21; Note, Regulation of Program Content by the FCC, 77 HARV. L. REV. 701, 703 (1964).

[30] 47 U.S.C. § 307 (1964).

[31] 47 U.S.C. § 312 (1964).

[32] Robinson, supra note 24, at 98; Note, supra note 29, at 703.

[33] 47 U.S.C. § 309(e) (1964). See, e.g., Office of Comm. of United Church of Christ v. FCC, 359 F.2d 994, 1007 (D.C. Cir. 1966).

> [T]he direct methods of content regulation—other than allocation and renewal of licenses—have rarely been used; indirect means, such as letters of advice and statements of policy are more common. Since renewal decisions are generally based on evaluations of overall programming, the importance the Commission will attribute to any single broadcasting factor is seldom certain. Thus, in light of the value of their franchises and the expense of renewal hearings, most broadcasters would prefer to follow FCC suggestions than to risk losing their licenses. Not only do stations tend to be attentive to FCC advice, they often seek out such advice before making broadcasting decisions. The Commission, on the other hand, has been reluctant to deprive broadcasters of their existing licenses even where it finds some aspects of their programming objectionable. Consequently, there has been a tendency to channel control through a system of "feeling out" rather that through specific rules, direct penalties, and clear holdings which are capable of being litigated.[37]

The effectiveness of such Commission control, then, coupled with the usual absence of judicial review [38] has led one commentator to characterize the license renewal process an "in terrorem control." [39]

FCC attempts to insure that all programming is in the public interest have led it to impose sanctions against the broadcasting of obscenity, profanity, and other similarly offensive speech,[40] defamation,[41] fraudulent contests,[42] illegal lotteries,[43] harmful medical advice,[44] and gambling information.[45] The FCC has also sought to impose affirmative obligations on the licensees to meet certain broad programming standards, such as balance,[46] diversity,[47] localism,[48] and public interest broadcasting.[49] In addition, specific affirmative obligations are imposed by the statutory requirements of equal time for political broadcasts,[50] and the FCC-promulgated fairness doctrine, which requires the licensee to present all side of issues of public importance[51] and to provide reply time to anyone personally attacked[52] over the licensee's station.

---

[34] Robinson, supra note 24, at 119.

[35] While the statute, 47 U.S.C. § 307(d) (1964), provides for a license period of no longer than five years, administrative practice is to give three year licenses. 47 C.F.R. § 73.630(a) (1971).

[36] Robinson, supra note 24, at 119.

[37] Note, supra note 29, at 703–04.

[38] For a specific example of the way a licensee may be deprived of judicial review of a censorship decision, see Palmetto Broadcasting Co., 33 F.C.C. 250 (1962), aff'd sub nom. Robinson v. FCC, 334 F.2d 534 (D.C. Cir.) (per curiam), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 843 (1964). In Palmetto the FCC examiner recommended denial of license renewal because of off-color jokes and other offensive material broadcast on the radio station. The Commission affirmed, setting out as an alternative rationale the proposition that because the licensee at first denied knowledge of the off-color material, he did not have the requisite "character" to be a licensee. The Court of Appeals affirmed on the narrow "character" grounds and thereby avoided any real judicial review of what was basically a censorship decision.

[39] Robinson, supra note 24, at 118. See Head v. Board of Examiners, 374 U.S. 424, 433–37 (1963) (Brennan, J., concurring).

[40] See, e.g., Pacifica Foundation, 36 F.C.C. 147 (1964); Palmetto Broadcasting, 33 F.C.C. 250 (1962), aff'd sub nom. Robinson v. FCC, 334 F.2d 534 (D.C. Cir.) (per curiam), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 843 (1964); Mile High Stations, Inc., 28 F.C.C. 795 (1960). Broadcast of such speech has also been declared a criminal act by Congress in 18 U.S.C. § 1464 which is based on a provision of the Radio Act of 1927. The Commission, however, has not often relied on this provision in broadcast cases. W. K. JONES, CASES AND MATERIALS ON REGULATED INDUSTRIES 1180 (1967).

[41] See, e.g., Trinity Methodist Church, South v. FRC, 62 F.2d 850 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 288 U.S. 599 (1932).

[42] See, eg., KWK Radio Station, Inc., 34 F.C.C. 1039 (1963). Broadcast of fraudulent and deceptive communications has been declared illegal by 18 U.S.C. § 1343 (1964). See also 47 U.S.C. § 509 (aimed specifically at fraudulent contests).

[43] See, e.g., WRBL Radio Station, Inc., 2 F.C.C. 687 (1936). Broadcast of information concerning lotteries is barred by 18 U.S.C. § 1304 (1964). FCC implementing regulations are 47 C.F.R. §§ 73.122, 73.292, & 73.656 (1971).

[44] See, e.g., KFKB Broadcasting Ass'n v. FRC, 47 F.2d 670 (D.C. Cir. 1931).

[45] See, e.g., Community Broadcasting Service, Inc., 20 F.C.C. 168 (1955). Broadcast of gambling information is outlawed in 18 U.S.C. § 1304 (1964). FCC implementing regulations are 47 C.F.R. §§ 73.122, 73.292, & 73.656 (1971).

Although the FCC is presently involved in extensive regulation of CATV,[53] it has, as yet, devoted little attention to the question of content regulation on CATV. The Commission has, however, held that the equal time,[54] fairness doctrine[55] and sponsorship identification[56] requirements are applicable to CATV.[57] The Commission assumed that these regulations furthered the public interest and that, therefore, CATV operators should not be allowed to circumvent them. The FCC did not feel that, in this regard, the "public interest" in CATV programming was any different from the "public interest" in broadcast television.[58] The Commission rejected the possibility that CATV, unlike broadcast television, may raise special constitutional problems with the observation that: "Since CATV systems use broadcast signals as the backbone of the service they provide, they come within the regulation of this agency, if reasonably related to the public interest. If the regulation is so related, it is not barred by the first amendment. [Continuing in a footnote.] It is thus immaterial that the scarcity of frequencies rationale underlying first amendment rulings in the broadcast field does not apply directly to the cable technology." [59]

Although the possibility of frustration of broadcasting policy may be a sufficient basis for ancillary FCC jurisdiction over CATV,[60] it does not seem to be a sufficient answer to a constitutional challenge. If the technological basis for finding content regulation consistent with the Constitution is, admittedly, inapplicable to CATV, it would seem wise to institute a fuller investigation of the constitutional problems of program content regulation in this new medium. It is highly unsatisfying that the FCC sought to dismiss the matter with the mere assertion that CATV program content regulation was constitutional because it was reasonably related to a constitutionally valid regulation of a related medium—broadcast television. The possible constitutional bases for the regulation of speech on CATV is the subject of the remainder of this Note.

---

[46] FCC, PUBLIC SERVICE RESPONSIBILITY OF BROADCAST LICENSEES 12–14 (1946) [hereinafter cited as PUBLIC SERVICE RESPONSIBILITY]. "The Commission . . . has always insisted that a "well-balanced program structure" is an essential part of the broadcasting in the public interest. . . . [S]tations have been asked, on renewal, to set forth the average amount of time . . . devoted to entertainment programs, religious programs, educational programs, fraternal programs, etc., and the Commission has relied upon the data . . . ." Id. at 12–13. See Robinson, supra note 24, at 113–14.

[47] PUBLIC SERVICE RESPONSIBILITY, supra note 24, at 15. "It has long been an established policy . . . of the Commission that the American system of broadcasting must serve significant minorities among our population, and the less dominant needs and tastes which most listeners have from time to time." Id. See Statement of Policy on Programming, 25 Fed. Reg. 7291 (1960).

[48] 47 U.S.C. § 307(b) (1964); PUBLIC SERVICE RESPONSIBILITY, supra note 46, at 36–39. The FCC has consistently recognized "the need for adequate reflection in programs of local interest, activities, and talents." Id. at 37. See L. JOHNSON, supra note 10, at 2.

[49] PUBLIC SERVICE RESPONSIBILITY, supra note 46, at 39–40. The licensee must devote an adequate amount of time to "the dissemination of news, information, and opinion, and for the discussion of public issues." Id. at 39.

[50] 47 U.S.C. § 315(a) (1964) provides in part: "If any licensee shall permit any person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office to use a broadcasting station, he shall afford equal opportunities to all other such candidates for that office in the use of such broadcasting station."

[51] Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 14 Fed. Reg. 3055 (1949). The Commission stated that "broadcast licensees have an affirmative duty generally to encourage and implement the broadcast of all sides of controversial public issues over their facilities.' Id. at 3056. The fairness doctrine was subsequently given specific congressional approval by amendment to 47 U.S.C. § 315 (1964). See note 25 supra. See also Applicability of Fairness Doctrine in the Handling of Controversial Issues of Public Importance, 29 Fed. Reg. 10415 (1964).

[52] 47 C.F.R. § 73.679(a) (1971) provides: "When, during the presentation of views on a controversial issue of public importance, an attack is made upon the honesty, character, integrity or like personal qualities of an identified person or group, the licensee shall, within a reasonable time . . . transmit to the person or group attacked . . . an offer of a reasonable opportunity to respond over the licensee's facilities." See also Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969) (holding that the Commission did not exceed its authority in adopting the personal attack rules).

[53] For an extensive discussion of the FCC's jurisdiction over and current regulation of CATV, see Note, supra note 1.

[54] 47 C.F.R. 74.1113 (1971). See also note 50 supra.

[55] 47 C.F.R. 74.1115 (1971). See also notes 51 & 52 supra.

[56] 47 C.F.R. 74.1119 (1971). The FCC requires that a station identify all those who, directly or indirectly, give the broadcaster valuable consideration in payment for the transmission of any matter.

[57] CATV—First Report and Order, 34 Fed. Reg. 17651, 17658–59 (1969).

[58] Id.

[59] Id. 1769 & n.28.

[60] Note, supra note 1, at 858–59.

III. THE APPLICATION OF THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO TELEVISION

The first amendment reads in part that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press. . . ." [61] Concerning these phrases, Alexander Meiklejohn makes two important observations:

> "First, let it be noted that, by those words, Congress is not debarred from all actions upon freedom of speech. Legislation which abridges that freedom is forbidden, but not legislation to enlarge and enrich it." [62]

And again.

> "[t]hat amendment, then, we may take it for granted, does not forbid the abridging of speech. But, at the same time, it does forbid the abridging of the freedom of speech." [63]

Such theoretical concepts have been the basis of the oft-mentioned judicial maxim: "It has never been held that liberty of speech is absolute." [64]

A. Types of governmental interference with speech

Government restraints on the content of speech can be characterized by the nature of the interference—those which impose negative restraints and those which impose affirmative ones. A negative restraint is one which seeks to eliminate, censor, or control communication. An affirmative restraint, on the other hand, is one that imposes an obligation to communicate some message. It is the negative restraint that has typically been at issue in free speech controversies.[65]

In recent years, however, problems involving affirmative restraints have attracted increasing attention,[66] as a result of increased government pressure on the media to present items and views that might not otherwise be given attention. The equal time requirement [67] is one obvious example. The FCC's fairness doctrine [68] and requirement of balanced programming [69] are others. It might be argued that such affirmative restraints are prima facie valid because the first amendment forbids only such laws as abridge speech [70] and such requirements in no way abridge speech, but rather impose an obligation to speak. But as pointed out above, the first amendment prohibition goes to governmental action "abridging . . . the freedom of speech"; [71] and, arguably, that freedom is abridged when one is required to say something when one would prefer tor remain silent, or perhaps, prefer to spend one's limited time in talking of something else. Furthermore, certain affirmative restraints may have the negative effect of causing avoidance of certain speech in order to avoid incurring the affirmative obligation [72]—for example, the evasion by a broadcaster of controversial issues so as not to incur large fairness doctrine obligations, which accrue if many people seek to present conflicting opinions on the issue.

Concerning the first amendment rights of the various media then, especially those of the broadcast media, the problems inherent in affirmative restraints have come to the fore. And, in light of this, the affirmative-negative dichotomy is of considerable significance.

B. Application of the first amendment to the various media

The Supreme Court has construed the first amendment as applicable to any "significant medium for the communication of ideas." [73] However, it has consistently asserted that one media is not "necessarily subject to the precise rules governing any other method of expression. Each method tends to present its own peculiar problems." [74]

---

[61] U.S. Const. amend. I.

[62] A. Meiklejohn, Free Speech and Its Relation to Self Government 16 (1948).

[63] Id. at 19.

[64] Times Film Corp. v. City of Chicago, 365 U.S. 43, 47 (1961). See, e.g., Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olsen, 283 U.S. 697, 716 (1930); Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652, 667 (1924); Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 52 (1918).

[65] See, e.g., Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495 (1952); Feiner v. New York 340 U.S. 315 (1951); Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290 (1951); Niemotko v. Maryland. 340 U.S. 268 (1951); Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940); Debs v. United States, 249 U.S. 211 (1919); Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919).

[66] See, e.g., Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969); Banzhaf v. FCC, 405 F.2d 1082 (D.C. Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 842 (1969).

[67] See note 50 supra.

[68] See notes 51 & 52 supra.

[69] See note 46 supra.

[70] See generally Barron, Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right, 80 Harv. L. Rev. 1641 (1967) [hereinafter cited as Barron].

[71] A. Meiklejohn, supra note 62, at 19 (emphasis added).

[72] RTNDA v. United States, 400 F.2d 1002 (7th Cir. 1968), rev'd sub nom. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

[73] Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 501 (1952).

[74] Id. at 503 (motion pictures). See Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290, 308 (1951) (street meeting); Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77, 85-88 (1948) (sound truck); Saia v. New York, 334 U.S. 558, 563 (1948) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting) (loudspeaker).

Consistent with that view, the Supreme Court, in Times Film Corp. v. City of Chicago,[75] upheld a city ordinance requiring all motion pictures to be licensed before they could be shown in the city. Petitioner had relied upon Near v. Minnesota ex rel Olson,[76] which held a newspaper licensing scheme to be invalid as a prior restraint. In Times Film, the Court noted with approval the language from Joseph Burnstyn Inc. v. Wilson [77] declaring that different media may be treated differently [78] and stated that they had previously held "that 'the phrase prior restraint is not a self-wielding sword. Nor can it serve as a talismanic test.' " [79] The Court, evidently, was comfortable with the proposition that what was unconstitutional when applied to printed matter might be permissible when applied to motion pictures.

Thus, the question of first amendment standards as applied to government restraints on the various media requires analysis of possible justifications, based upon individual media attributes. There is no reason why application of the first amendment cannot take into account the problems peculiar to each specific medium, so long as one can supply a legitimate constitutional rationale for the standard invoked in a particular context. In the following section, this Note will discuss the various rationales that have been suggested to justify a greater interference with speech on broadcast television than that allowable respecting other media and explore the legitimacy of the same in regard to a cable-based system.

C. Justifications of television content regulation

1. Scarcity Theory. The scarcity justification was first set forth by Justice Frankfurter in National Broadcasting Company v. United States: "Unlike other modes of expression, radio inherently is not available to all. That is its unique characteristic, and that is why, unlike other modes of expression, it is subject to governmental regulation.[80]

The argument begins with the assumption that the technical limitations of the electromagnetic spectrum force the government to allocate the available channels. Since Government cannot avoid this allocative function, the argument continues, public policy dictates that the allocation be done on a rational basis.[81] Congress has designated the "public interest" as a standard to be used.[82] In order to insure that this standard is being met, the FCC can review the content of the licensee's programming in connection with any renewal applications or revocation proceedings.[83] But since it would be poor administrative practice (and possibly a denial of due process) for the FCC to subject a licensee to possible license revocation without the licensee having known what was expected of him, the FCC may promulgate guidelines as to what programming practices it considers to be in the public interest.[84]

The validity of this rationale has been challenged on the grounds that the effective limiting factor in the television industry, as in the newspaper industry, is economic and therefore television, like newspapers, cannot be denied full free speech protection.[85] Indeed, most metropolitan areas have more radio and television stations than newspapers and in many areas there are available frequencies that remain inoperative.[86] It was on the basis of this argument that the Seventh Circuit, in Radio Television News Directors Association v. United States, [RTNDA] declared the FCC's fairness doctrine unconstitutional.[87] However, the Supreme Court in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC subsequently reversed RTNDA, relying on the technical limitations of the electromagnetic spectrum.[88]

---

[75] 365 U.S. 43 (1961).

[76] 283 U.S. 697 (1931). See text accompanying notes 138 & 144 infra.

[77] 343 U.S. 495 (1952).

[78] 365 U.S. at 49.

[79] Id.

[80] 319 U.S. 190, 226 (1943). In RTNDA v. United States, 400 F.2d 1002, 1018 n.43 (7th Cir. 1968), rev'd sub nom. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969), the court indicated that: "NBC v. United States . . . does not support the Commission's position that the broadcast press is not entitled to the same order of first amendment protection as the printed press. At issue in that case was the validity of the Commission's chain broadcasting regulations. The only constitutional issue raised there was whether the denial of a station license for engaging in certain network practices was a denial of free speech." However, NBC is consistently cited as authority for the proposition that frequency scarcity justifies governmental regulations of program content. See, e.g., 395 U.S. at 389, 395; CATV—First Report and Order, 34 Fed. Reg. 17651, 17659 (1969); Robinson, supra note 24, at 87.

[81] Z. CHAFEE, GOVERNMENT AND MASS COMMUNICATIONS 638 (1965) [hereinafter cited as CHAFEE]; T. EMERSON, THE SYSTEM OF FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION 663 (1970) [hereinafter cited as EMERSON].

[82] 17 U.S.C. § 307(a) (1964).

[83] KFKB Broadcasting Ass'n v. FRC, 47 F.2d 670 (D.C. Cir. 1931).

[84] Banzhaf v. FCC, 405 F.2d 1082, 1095 (D.C. Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 842 (1969).

[85] RTNDA v. United States, 400 F.2d 1002, 1018–19 (7th Cir. 1968), rev'd sub nom. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969). One might, on the other hand, argue that economic factors creating a scarcity of newspapers would justify governmental interference with them. See Barron, supra note 70.

In a cable-based system, on the other hand, there is no scarcity of channels. Any local system in the current state of development may carry as many as eighty-two channels on a single cable and, economic factors permitting, more than one cable can be installed. Thus, for CATV to be subject to stricter content regulation than that applicable to newspapers, other rationales must be found; technological scarcity does not suffice as a constitutional justification.[89]

2. Public Domain Theory. The FCC has claimed that their right to regulate television stems from public ownership of the electromagnetic spectrum.[90] This position has found the support of Justice Douglas, who has employed it to justify the system of television licensing:

> The channels all lie in the public domain, the air space above the earth being under the exclusive control of Congress. . . . What the government owns or controls in the airway it can regulate as it sees fit.[91]

Though at first blush this argument might be thought unavailable as a justification for content regulation of a cable system, it must be remembered that a CATV operator generally needs some form of local franchise before he can lay his cable,[92] and it is not inconceivable that a local franchising agency might attempt to condition the use of the municipality's streets by the cable operator on acceptance of certain content regulation standards.[93]

This public domain approach would seem, however, in the light of accepted constitutional doctrine, to Bead to a diametrically opposite conclusion. Indeed, public ownership of the place of communication is usually considered to be a reason for applying, not suspending, first amendment protection.[94] Otherwise, if this argument were taken to its logical conclusion, it would mean the justification of regulation of all forms of communication which make any use of the streets, air space, or other elements in the public domain.[95]

---

[86] RTNDA v. United States, 400 F.2d 1002, 1019 (7th Cir. 1968), rev'd sub nom. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969). The conclusion that technical scarcity is not a major factor in television broadcasting has been challenged by the FCC. The Commission has stated that, as of August 1, 1968, there were no available commercial VHF channels in the top 100 markets. Further, of the 297 UHF channels allocated in those 100 markets, all but 84 had been authorized or applied for. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367, 398 n.25 (1969).

[87] RTNDA v. United States, 400 F.2d 1002 (7th Cir. 1968). Although the facts of the case concerned only the personal attack side of the fairness doctrine, in dictum the Court treated the doctrine as a whole.

[88] Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367, 396–401 (1969). Unlike the court in RTNDA, the Court in Red Lion noted that technical scarcity was indeed a major factor in the television industry. Id. at 398. As a result, the Court did not deal with the constitutional significance of the alleged economic bar to free speech. See generally Barron, supra note 70.

[89] Apart from the scarcity question, it has been argued that public interest-oriented regulation is necessary due to the need for governmental allocation to prevent chaos on the airways which would otherwise result from frequency jumping, channel stealing, interference, etc. Such, indeed, was the situation early in the century, when broadcasting was in its formative years, and it was exactly this which led Congress to pass the Radio Act of 1927, ch. 169, 44 Stat. 1162 (1927), repealed by F.C.C. Act, ch. 652, § 602, 48 Stat. 1102 (1934). See W. K. JONES, CASES AND MATERIALS ON REGULATED INDUSTRIES 1022–24 (1934). Since it is not possible for the government to adopt a "hands-off" attitude toward television, regulation (in all its aspects) has seemed more palatable to certain commentators. See EMERSON, supra note 81, at 661; CHAFEE, supra note 81, at 638. Since there is no similar need to regulate communications traffic over the cable, this rationale cannot justify CATV regulation.

[90] See RTNDA v. United States, 400 F.2d 1002, 1019 (7th Cir. 1968), rev'd sub nom. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969); Robinson v. FCC, 334 F.2d 534, 537 (D.C. Cir. 1964) (per curiam).

[91] W. DOUGLAS, THE RIGHT OF THE PEOPLE 76 (1958). See also Note, supra note 29, at 713 and authorities cited therein at n.92.

[92] See, e.g., section 362 of the CHARTER OF NEW YORK CITY which provides that the Board of Estimate shall have: "The exclusive power in behalf of the city to grant franchises . . . involving the occupation or use of any of the streets of the city, whether on under or over the surface thereof, for . . . pipes or other conduits or ways or otherwise for the . . . transmission of electricity . . . heat or power." See also Illinois Broadcasting Co. v. City of Decatur, 96 Ill. App. 2d 454, 455, 238 N.E.2d 261, 263 (1968); MAYOR'S TASK FORCE REPORT, supra note 3, at 14, 44.

[93] Illinois Broadcasting Co. v. City of Decatur, 96 Ill. App. 2d 454, 455, 238 N.E.2d 261, 263 (1968), is suggestive of the wide ranging powers some municipalities have sought to exercise over CATV franchises. The New York MAYOR'S TASK FORCE REPORT supra note 3, at 59, specifically rejects, though not on constitutional grounds, the proposition that the city regulate the content of CATV programming.

3. Privilege Theory. An offshoot of the public domain justification is the argument that use of a frequency (or use of a street under or over which the cable travels) is a privilege granted by government to which certain conditions may be attached. The Commission has maintained that: "Those who obtain licenses are granted a privilege and consequently must act as 'trustee[s] for the public'. . . . Therefore, according to the Commission, a licensee, exercising such a privilege, must abide by Commission imposed rules. . . ." [96]

Reasoning similar to that which lies behind this privilege theory has been used as a foundation for the argument that, as use of the mails is a privilege afforded by the government, regulation of the content of the mails is permissible.[97] But such a line of argument has consistently been rejected by both the Court and scholars,[98] even when use of the mails has been treated as a privilege.[99] In fact, the courts have generally been unreceptive to the claim that a government may condition the grant of a privilege on the surrender of a constitutional right.[100] Furthermore, the concept of a government-bestowed privilege as applied to broadcast television is based upon the scarcity of available frequencies and the concomitant FCC licensing. But a CATV system with sufficient numbers of channels open to the general public on some form of common carrier basis would undermine any possible grounds on which a privilege argument might be based.

4. Impact Theory. In his dissent in Kunz v. New York, Justice Jackson argued that "[t]he vulnerability of various forms of communication to community control must be proportioned to their impact upon other community interests." [101] The greater the capacity for evil inherent in a particular medium, it has been suggested, the wider the permissible scope of community control.[102]

Such a "capacity for evil" approach to the control of communication content seems, however, constitutionally unsound, as it assumes that a government official can validly make judgments on behalf of the public as to the value of ideas sought to be communicated. But it is precisely this type of judgment which the first amendment seeks to preserve for the individual citizen. Even in its best light, this "capacity to influence" argument runs counter to the spirit of the amendment. As Alexander Meiklejohn has forcefully argued: "[t]he principle of the freedom of speech springs from the necessities of the program of self-government." [103]

One of the major aims of the first amendment is to allow disgruntled citizens to persuade their fellow countrymen in the hope of affecting the public decision-making process.[104] To assert, then, that if a particular medium has a high capacity to influence, it may be all the more strictlly regulated as to its content and presentation is to argue that when the first amendment is on the verge of fulfilling its promise, it should be suspended.

---

[94] E.g., Hague v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496, 515–16 (1938) (ordinance prohibiting meetings or distribution of printed matter in public places without a permit held void). "Wherever the title of streets and parks may rest, they have immemorially been held in trust for the use of the public and, time out of mind, have been used for purposes of assembly, communicating thoughts between citizens, and discussing public questions. . . . The privilege of a citizen of the United States to use the streets and parks for communication of views on national questions may be regulated . . . but it must not, in the guise of regulaion, be abridged or denied." See Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290, 293–94 (1951) (reversal of conviction for holding meeting on city street without a permit); CHAFEE, supra note 81, at 280; Robinson, supra note 24, at 151–53.

[95] RTNDA v. United States, 400 F.2d 1002, 1019 (7th Cir. 1968), rev'd sub rom. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

[96] Id. See Television Corp. of Michigan v. FCC, 294 F.2d 730, 733–34 (D.C. Cir. 1961).

[97] See Hannegan v. Esquire, 327 U.S. 146, 156 (1945).

[98] See, e.g., Lamont v. Postmaster General, 381 U.S. 301, 305 (1965), quoting with approval (and with a few grammatical changes) the language of Justice Holmes's dissent in Milwaukee Pub. Co. v. Burleson, 255 U.S. 407, 437 (1921): "The United States may give up the Post Office when it sees fit, but while it carries it on the use of the mails is almost as much a part of free speech as the right to use our tongues. . . ." See also CHAFE, supra note 81, at 276–80.

[99] E.g., Hannegan v. Esquire, 327 U.S. 146, 156 (1945).

[100] See, e.g., Frost & Frost Trucking Co. v. R.R. Comm'n of California, 271 U.S. 583 (1926); Lawson v. Housing Authority of Milwaukee, 270 Wis. 269, 70 N.W.2d 605, cert. denied, 350 U.S. 882 (1955).

[101] 340 U.S. 290, 308 (1951). See Times Film Corp. v. City of Chicago, 365 U.S. 43 (1961).

[102] Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 502 (1952) (movie censorship via licensing).

[103] A. MEIKLEJOHN, supra note 62, at 26. The Supreme Court has, itself, forcefully asserted "a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust and wide-open. . . ." New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270 (1964).

While the above would indicate that an impact theory can in no way justify negative restraints, affirmative restraints may be justified in certain circumstances. The first amendment is based on "the classical argument of Milton and John Stuart Mill, that only through open discussion is truth discovered and spread." [105] The technology of modern communications, however, is such that this theory of truth ascertainment through competition of ideas may be unattainable without governmental interference.[106] A legal right to speak is fruitless if one is denied access to the avenues of communication.[107] If one medium has an unusually potent impact on community thought, free competition of ideas may be impossible if that medium is able successfully to exclude certain ideas. Thus any such distortion of public debate through the manipulation of an enormously influential and relatively inaccessible mass medium is inimical to the goals of the first amendment [108] and arguably presents legitimate constitutional justification for the imposition of certain affirmative restraints on broadcast television.

But the structure of a fully developed cable system would radically alter the status quo. With channel space much more accessible to members of the public desiring to present their ideas, and with a vastly greater number of channels on the air at any one time—no one, two, or three channels having quite the captive audience they have in today's world of limited spectrum space—justification for even such affirmative restraints, at least on the cable channels, would be greatly weakened.

5. Imposition Theory. It has been argued that when a speaker attempts to reach unwilling listeners, the right of privacy supplies a limiting factor to the first amendment.[109] In Kovacs v. Cooper,[110] the Supreme Court upheld a municipal ordinance designed to regulate loudspeakers: "To enforce freedom of speech in disregard of the rights of others would be harsh and arbitrary in itself." [111] The Court has also been solicitous of the privacy of individuals in regard to an unwilling exposure to pornographic materials.[112]

The right of privacy cannot, however, be used to confer broad censorship powers on the government. In Kovacs, the Court noted that any regulation to protect unwilling members of the general public from having offensive communication thrust upon them must be narrowly drawn so as to preserve the opportunity of the speaker to gain the attention of potentially willing receivers of the communication in question.[113]

The "imposition theory" was applied to television in Banzhaf v. Federal Communications Commission [114] where the theory was used by the D.C. Circuit in upholding the constitutionality of the FCC's requirement that television licensees provide free time to public health groups to counteract the effects of cigarette advertising. The court reasoned that, although such affirmative restraints would assumedly be unconstitutional if applied to the printed media, the differences between television and newspapers justified differing first amendment treatment: "Written messages are not communicated unless they are read, and reading requires an affirmative act. . . . Similarly, an ordinary habitual television watcher can avoid these commercials only by frequently leaving the room, changing the channel, or doing some other affirmative act." [115]
This rationale, however, is valid only when confined to the realm of short advertising interspersed among the material the viewer wishes to see, for turning on

---

[104] See United States v. Carolene Prods. Co., 304 U.S. 144 n.4 (1938).

[105] CHAFEE, supra note 81, at 471.

[106] Barron, supra note 70, at 1641. See EMERSON, supra note 81, at 4.

[107] Barron, supra note 70, at 1643.

[108] See Banzhaf v. FCC, 405 F.2d 1082, 1102 (D.C. Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 842 (1969); EMERSON, supra note 81, at 4; Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 14 Fed. Reg. 3055, 3056 (1949).

[109] See, e.g., Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77 (1949); Saia v. New York, 334 U.S. 558, 563 (1948) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting: "Surely there is not a constitutional right to force unwilling people to listen."); Breard v. Alexandria, 341 U.S. 622 (1951).

[110] 336 U.S. 77 (1949).

[111] Id. at 88.

[112] See Redrup v. New York, 386 U.S. 767 (1967) (per curiam).

[113] Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77, 87 (1949).

[114] 405 F.2d 1082 (D.C. Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 842 (1970).

[115] Id. at 1100.

a television or watching a particular program is certainly as much an affirmative act as the reading of a newspaper or a particular article therein. We must remember the obvious: one may turn off a television set on encountering objectionable communication as freely as one can stop reading printed material. The Banzhaf distinction, then, is valid to the extent that we can identify what the viewer was willingly watching and can isolate messages and material that are thrust upon him in such a way that he cannot reasonably be expected to avoid them if he wishes to see the remainder of the program that interests him.

6. Accessibility Theory. Television, broadcast and cablecast, is unquestionably distinguishable from printed material in that it is, at the flick of a switch, readily accessible to all members of the family and the community, including young children.[116]

The Supreme Court has declared its willingness to uphold a statutory prohibition of distribution to minors of material which, if judged by adult standards, would not be held obscene. In Ginsberg v. New York,[117] the Court maintained that: "Constitutional interpretation has consistently recognized that parents' claims to authority in their own households to direct the rearing of their children is basic in the structure of our society. . . . The legislature could properly conclude that parents and others, teachers for example, who have this primary responsibility for children's wellbeing are entitled to the support of laws designed to aid discharge of that responsibility." [118]

The Court was careful to note that the statute in question did not forbid the distribution of such material to adults, nor did it absolutely prevent a minor from receiving the material if his parent or guardian thought no harm would result.[119] Thus the Court seems to have endorsed the theory that a state should confine itself to aiding parents in their efforts to shelter children and should not itself attempt to impose a moral code on minors.[120]

The Ginsberg decision may, therefore, given the nature of distribution in the television industry, support the proposition that certain negative restraints on television program content, unconstitutional if applied to other media, would be acceptable here. But, at the same time, any restrictions based on this argument would have to be narrowly drawn so as to comply with the teaching of Butler v. Michigan.[121] In that case a Michigan statute prohibiting the sale of such books as would have a harmful effect on children was held unconstitutional because it would interfere with the first amendment rights of adults. The Court said that the legislation here at issue was: "Not reasonably restricted to the evil with which it is said to deal. The incidence of this enactment is to reduce the adult population of Michigan to reading only what is fit for children." [122]

7. Justification Based on the Economic Structure of the Industry. Assuming that the goal of the owners of both television and periodicals is to maximize profits, realization of this goal, given the present technological situation and market structure, requires significant differences in their content. For both, advertising is the economic base and, for both, audience maximization is the means for achievement of maximum advertising revenue. The newspaper, however, is an expandable medium. There is no fixed limit on its size, and it can include stories of limited appeal to attract minority audiences without any reduction in stories of wide appeal. Also, the industry as a whole is expandable —new magazines and newspapers can be started without a concomitant necessity of eliminating any existing publications. Thus normal economic forces will lead to diversification of content in periodicals. A television channel, on the other hand, is limited by the number of hours in a day or, more especially, in "prime time"; [123] and this means that the television operator can maximize audiences only by broadcasting, at all times, programs with the widest possible

---

[116] See W. K. Jones, Cases on Regulated Industries 1190 (1967).

[117] 390 U.S. 629 (1968).

[118] Id. at 639.

[119] Id.

[120] See Henkin, Morals and the Constitution: The Sin of Obscenity, 63 Colum. L. Rev. 391, 413 n.68 (1963).

[121] 352 U.S. 380 (1957).

[122] Butler v. Michigan, 352 U.S. at 383.

[123] The hours between 7 and 11 are usually considered "prime time."

attraction.[124] This attempt to appeal to the "lowest common denominator" in the audience tends to create a certain exaggerated similarity of program content at the expense of any substantial diversity.[125]

It has been suggested that this situation justifies the FCC's imposition of affirmative restraints such as balance,[126] localism,[127] and diversity: [128]

> [M]inority interests and the general public interests in the free exchange of information and ideas—protection of which underlie the first amendment—are fostered by FCC regulation. To invalidate this scheme of regulation in the name of the Constitution would undercut the very protection the Constitution seeks to afford.[129]

This argument, however, avoids the issue of the constitutionality of such restraints by assuming that the Constitution seeks to insure diversity of medial content for the sake of diversity alone. In the discussion of the impact theory above, it was suggested that the first amendment seeks to insure adequate debate on matters of public importance. The present argument, though, does not focus on the presentation of balanced opinions, but rather of balanced programming, or diversity of subjects covered.[130] And apart from preventing media distortions in public debate, it is not at all clear that the first amendment implies affirmative duties of a medium to cover a variety of subjects.[131]

Even if this argument for diversity rules is accepted, the development and expansion of CATV will radically alter the economic structure of the industry, thus rendering highly doubtful the continued legitimacy of the theory. With almost unlimited channel potential, CATV—from the standpoint of the industry though perhaps not from that of individual channel lessee [132]—is an expandable medium. And it is to the capacity of the medium as a whole that one must look for first amendment purposes as it was with the premise that the first amendment requires only that minority tastes be served and not that they be served on every channel that the economic justification theory was posited.

As to the financial viability of such a system, it need only be pointed out that, as the general television audience becomes increasingly splintered by the multiplication of cable channels, appeals to significant minority tastes may draw, by CATV standards, audiences sizeable enough to warrant advertiser interest.[133] Also, new financial bases for programming for the various CATV channels, such as "pay TV" [134] and public common carrier service,[135] will promote a further diversification of offerings. Pay TV will justify programming of limited but intense appeal, as viewers must pay a special fee to see the individual show, and the content of public common carrier programming will be dictated by the desires of the communicator rather than of the average viewer.

---

[124] This analysis is somewhat oversimplified and breaks down, in part, when many channels are operating in a given area, as, for example, in such major metropolitan areas as New York, Los Angeles, and Chicago. As the audience fractionalizes, a program catering to the tastes of a significant minority might draw a larger audience share than a program appealing to the already divided majority tastes. Since few markets are served by more than three or four stations, this fractionalization of audience is not significant.

This entire economic analysis, of course, does not apply to organizations, such as the Educational Television Network, in which profit maximization is not a goal.

[125] Note, supra note 29, at 714; Note, The Listener's Right to Hear in Broadcasting, 22 STAN. L. REV. 863, 864–65 (1970).

[126] See note 46 supra.

[127] See note 48 supra.

[128] See note 47 supra.

[129] Note, supra note 29, at 714.

[130] The impact argument, however, does not meet the problem of dealing with a programmer who decides not to broadcast any matters dealing with issues of public importance. However, the FCC requires the licensee to engage in public interest broadcasting, see note 49 supra, and to encourage the use of their station for discussion of controversial public issues, see note 51 supra. These policies cannot be justified as a matter of eliminating distortions in the impact of public debate, and can only be reconciled with the Constitution by reference to the scarcity argument, i.e., when the medium involved is limited, the government may allocate it in the public interest. See section III-C-1 supra.

[131] But see Note, supra note 125, at 869.

[132] The lessee of one channel would, of course, be limited to 24 hours a day. But given a system of unlimited channel availability, one organization could simultaneously originate over many channels and therefore may be considered to be communicating in an expandable medium.

[133] Since CATV transmission costs are low, see text accompanying note 12 supra, advertising may be sold for much less than on broadcast television. Also, specialized programming will enjoy specialized audiences that may attract certain advertisers whose product would only appeal to such selective groups. See, e.g., BROADCASTING, June 23, 1969, at 62.

[134] See 47 C.F.R. § 73.641.

[135] See note 10 supra.

IV. LICENSING AND CATV

The above discussion was concerned with the areas of permissible content regulation of broadcast and cable television and with the justifications advanced for such regulation. Before suggesting a proper role for the FCC in the regulation of CATV, one must examine the validity of licensing as a means of control over content, especially in light of the rationale for the licensing of broadcast television.

The FCC is statutorily authorized[136] to grant licenses to radio and television broadcasters. The constitutionality of this practice has been upheld because the scarcity of frequency space makes broadcasting a unique mode of communication.[137] However, as channel space on CATV is not limited, the doctrine of prior restraint as applied to the licensing of communication media must be carefully reconsidered.

A. Doctrine of prior restraint

The first amendment significance of prior restraints was made explicit in the landmark decision of Near v. Minnesota ex rel Olsen.[138] The Minnesota statute[139] in question provided:

> "Any person who . . . shall be engaged in the business of regularly or customarily producing, publishing or circulating, having in possession, selling or giving away: (a) An obscene, lewd, and lascivious newspaper, magazine, or other periodical, or (b) a malicious, scandalous and defamatory newspaper, magazine, or other periodical, is guilty of a nuisance, and all persons guilty of such nuisance may be enjoined. . . ."

Petitioner Near was adjudged to have violated the statute by publication of a "malicious, scandalous, and defamatory" newspaper.[140] A permanent injunction was issued.[141] The Supreme Court reversed, declaring the relevant statute unconstitutional because it involved "censorship"[142] and therefore was not within "the permissible scope of subsequent punishment."[143]

Although the Near Court was not explicit in developing a reasoned basis for the prior restraint doctrine,[144] Thomas Emerson has suggested the following justifications: "A system of prior restraint is in many ways more inhibiting than a system of subsequent punishment: it is likely to bring under government scrutiny a far wider range of expression; it shuts off communication before it takes place; suppression by a stroke of the pen is more likely to be applied than suppression through a criminal process; the procedures do not require attention to the safeguards of the criminal process; the system allows less opportunity for public appraisal and criticism; the dynamics of the system drive toward excesses, as the history of all censorship shows."[145]

Nonetheless, in subsequent cases the Supreme Court has not always strictly enforced this prohibition against prior restraints[146] and the extent of applicability of the doctrine is not entirely clear. Yet, while one cannot extrapolate from the cases the constitutional limits of regulatory procedures in the cable television field, certain generalizations are possible. Thus, one can reasonably say that a prior restraint will be disfavored if alternative means are available, will be upheld only if procedural protection is supplied, and must be narrowly drawn so as not to amount to censorship of all communication or to a system in which all communication must be licensed.[147]

---

[136] 47 U.S.C. § 307 (1964).

[137] NBC v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 226 (1942).

[138] 283 U.S. 697 (1931).

[139] Id. at 702, quoting ch. 285, [1925] Minn. Sess. Laws.

[140] Id. at 705.

[141] Id.

[142] Id. at 713.

[143] Id. at 715.

[144] Id. at 713–14, quoting 4 W. BLACKSTONE, COMMENTARIES *151–52.

[145] EMERSON, supra note 81, at 506. For a fuller discussion, see Emerson, The Doctrine of Prior Restraint, 20 LAW & CONTEMPT. PROB. 648 (1955).

[146] E.g., Times Film Corp. v. City of Chicago, 365 U.S. 43 (1961); Kingsley Books, Inc. v. Brown, 354 U.S. 436 (1957). The authority of Times Film was severely limited by Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51 (1965), in which the Court invalidated a movie licensing system because of the lack of procedural safeguards against the dangers of censorship. The procedures required by the Court include the requirements that the government bear the burden of proof, that a judicial rather than administrative ruling be obtained before imposition of a final valid restraint, and that any temporary administrative restraint be of short duration 380 U.S. at 58–59.

[147] See EMERSON, see note 81, at 511.

B. Application of prior restraint doctrine to broadcasting

In KFKB Broadcasting Association v. Federal Radio Commission,[148] the appellant claimed that the FRC's[149] denial of a license renewal because of the broadcasting of "quack" medical advice by the station amounted to censorship. Finding for the FRC, the court held: "This contention is without merit. There has been no attempt on the part of the commission to subject any part of appellant's broadcasting matter to scrutiny prior to its release. . . . [T]he commission has merely exercised its undoubted right to take note of appellant's past conduct, which is not censorship."[150]

But in arriving at this conclusion, the court ignored the nature of the sanction to be imposed—license revocation. Such a sanction results in the denial of a licensee's first amendment protection as to future communication because of past infractions. And this would seem to yield a situation precisely analogous to that condemned as an unconstitutional prior restraint in Near.

"Public interest" licensing, then, such as provided for in the Communications Act and as subsequently interpreted and effectuated by the courts and the Commission in the renewal and revocation procedures clearly can result in prior restraints. Yet there is a need for the licensing of broadcast television as it operates on a limited resource, the electromagnetic spectrum, which must be allocated among potential users. In addition, some centralized technical supervision of the airwaves is required. Because of these factors, it would appear that the government cannot avoid all licensing of the medium. Since, however, scarcity is not a factor in CATV, this rationale for licensing broadcast television is inapplicable to the cable system. Without such a justification, licensing by the FCC of cable television as a means of content control must be closely questioned, especially in view of the more limited controls available to achieve necessary regulation.[151]

C. Application of the prior restraint doctrine to CATV

The most glaring problem with the licensing system as it exists today is the almost complete lack of procedural safeguards.[152] Because of the informality of the proceedings, there are few specific rulings subject to judicial review.[153] And a licensee, having a great financial interest in maintaining his license, is unlikely to risk it by challenging an FCC ruling and broadcasting questionable material. At the same time, maintainance of good relations with the regulatory agency might in numerous ways prove helpful to the licensee.[154] Consequently, he is likely to be especially timid and stay well within the bounds of what the FCC considers to be acceptable speech. Furthermore, as the present system operates largely through what amounts to informally induced self-restraint, the public is likely to remain largely unaware of the extent of government control and, as a result, unconcerned with its implications. Clearly then, the present system of licensing television channels results in what amounts to a prior restraint which should be mitigated to the extent possible, if not eliminated completely.

There is a unique feature of television that remains to be considered. Television communication can instantaneously reach millions of people. One can move against a publisher after publication, but before the questioned material has reached a very wide audience.[155] On the other hand, with television, unless a show is to be repeated, any subsequent proceedings would have no suppressive effect on the questioned communication. This is, however, beside the point. The prior restraint rule is supposed to operate in such a way as to insure communication to the public at large of any and all ideas so long as the speaker is willing to assume the risk of subsequent punishment.[156] Some governmental authorities have undoubtedly used subsequent proceedings to avoid wide dissemination of the troublesome communication.[157] But such misuse of subsequent action must not prevent a proper application of the prior restraint doctrine so as more fully to protect first amendment rights.

---

[148] 47 F.2d 670 (D.C. Cir. 1931).

[149] The Federal Radio Commission was the predecessor of the FCC. It was established by the Radio Act of 1927, ch. 169, 44 Stat. 1162, repealed by F.C.C. Act, ch. 652, § 602, 48 Stat. 1102.

[150] 47 F.2d at 672. See also Trinity Methodist Church, South v. FRC, 62 F.2d 850 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 288 U.S. 599 (1932).

[151] See section V infra.

[152] See text accompanying note 22 supra.

[153] See text accompanying note 23 supra.

[154] See Robinson, supra note 24, at 119–20.

[155] Cf. NEW YORK CODE OF CRIMINAL PROC. § 22-a(1). (As of Sept. 1, 1971, this provision will be in the NEW YORK CPLR).

[156] See Emerson, The Doctrine of Prior Restraint, 20 LAW & CONTEMPT. PROB. 648, 659 (1955).

Since the present FCC licensing procedures for broadcasting, constituting as they effectively do a prior restraint on content, can be justified only on the basis of scarcity of access, the same system applied to CATV would be of doubtful validity. If content is not to be regulated by licensing because of the absence of spectrum limitations, the Commission must be confined in its licensing to purely technical considerations, such as the prevention of signal intereference. Hence it could require the licensing only of the cable transmission systems, not of the individual cablecasters on the various CATV channels.[158]

V. A PROPOSED ROLE FOR THE FCC IN CATV REGULATION

A. A model system

In considering the role of the FCC in CATV regulation, it will be helpful to posit a model of the type of system that may be created in the not too distant future, especially if the FCC encourages development in this direction. A substantial proportion of the nation's homes would be reached by the cable, and national interconnection [159] of the various local systems would allow the development of major cable networks. The local system operator [160] would have at least 20 channels [161] available. Some of these would be used to carry local broadcast signals;[162] others might be utilized by national cable neworks; some channels would be for origination by local cablecasters;[163] some might carry a "subscription television service";[164] certain others could be reserved for the use of the local government in carrying out municipal functions;[165] still others might be reserved for private educational and cultural institutions or other non-profit organizations;[166] and, finally, some channels would serve as public common carriers. For the public common carrier service, the CATV operator would provide the studio, equipment, and technical expertise for a fee to members of the public seeking to originate non-commercial programs.[167] The time would be made available for leasing in a variety of time lengths, probably on a first-come, first-served basis.[168] The CATV operator would have no control over the content of what is broadcast, and would have no discretion in the selection of originators or their assignment to various time slots.

---

[157] See, e.g., Debs v. United States, 249 U.S. 211 (1919); Frohwerk v. United States, 249 U.S. 204 (1919); Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919).

[158] It may be suggested, based on the reasoning of Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51 (1965), that licensing of cablecasters could be saved if procedures were modified to minimize the inherent dangers of prior restraint. Such an approach misconceives the problem. If an administrative procedure impinges on first amendment rights, its retention should be tolerated only if there is an affirmative justification for it. If less offensive means of regulation are available, then licensing, shorn of its primary raison d'etre, should not be saved.

[159] See, e.g., Community Antenna Television Service, Technical Standards, 35 Fed. Reg. 11036, 11037 (1970); CATV—First Report and Order, 34 Fed. Reg. 17651, 17655 (1969).

[160] The term "system operator", as used in this Note, indicates the owner of the cable operation itself, i.e., franchise, wires, and technical equipment. He is to be distinguished from the "channel lessee" or "cablecaster" who originates over a given cable channel, but who is not in any way an owner of the system itself. It is, of course, possible for the system owner also to operate as a cablecaster. In fact, such origination is presently required by the FCC. CATV—First Report and Order, 34 Fed. Reg. 17651, 17655 (1969).

[161] The current FCC proposed rules, 35 Fed. Reg. 11036, 11037 (1970), indicate that the Commission is considering requiring a minimum channel capacity of 20 or 40 channels. See also text accompanying note 2 supra.

[162] 47 C.F.R. § 74.1033 (1971); Proposed Rule Making—Community Antenna Television Systems, 35 Fed. Reg. 11045, 11048 (1970). See MAYOR'S TASK FORCE REPORT, supra note 3, at 55.

[163] To insulate program content from indirect FCC control, it may be advisable to bar the system operator, who would be licensed, from acting as a cablecaster. Such a rule might also lead to fuller utilization of the cable system as well as greater diversity since the CATV operator would not be in competition with other potential and actual users of his system. See L. JOHNSON, supra note 10, at 54; Barnett & Greenberg, supra order requiring all CATV operators with more than 3500 subscribers to begin origination by January 1, 1971. CATV—First Report and Order, 34 Fed. Reg. 17651, 17655 (1969). See Barnett, Cable Television and Media Concentration, 22 STAN. L. REV. 221, 247–48 (1970).

[164] See 47 C.F.R. § 73.641 (1971).

[165] See CATV—First Report and Order, 34 Fed. Reg. 17651, 17653 (1969); Proposed Rule Making—Community Antenna Television Systems, 35 Fed. Reg. 11045, 11048 (1970); MAYOR'S TASK FORCE REPORT, supra note 3, at 57.

[166] See CATV—First Report and Order, 34 Fed. Reg. 17651, 17653 (1969); Proposed Rule Making—Community Antenna Television Systems, 35 Fed. Reg. 11045, 11048 (1970); MAYOR'S TASK FORCE REPORT, supra note 3, at 57.

[167] See CATV—First Report and Order, 34 Fed. Reg. 17651, 17653 (1969); Proposed Rule Making—Community Antenna Television Systems, 35 Fed. Reg. 11045, 11048 (1970); MAYOR'S TASK FORCE REPORT, supra note 3, at 58.

In such a system, the FCC should have an active role in regulation of CATV at the system level. This would include the setting of certain technical requirements, as well as requirements as to the proportional allotment of channels for the various uses suggested above, and also rate regulation for some of these services. Furthermore, as developed below,[169] the Commission should probably have some limited powers over the channel lessees.

The FCC is already exercising some jurisdiction over CATV, and, arguably,[170] much of what is suggested here, such as allocation and rate regulation, can be done by considering CATV as within the common carrier jurisdiction of the FCC.[171] However, the FCC may not have the power to reach the individual channel lessees without a further congressional grant of jurisdiction. The approaches that follow assume statutory jurisdiction and are attempts to confront the problems only from a constitutional standpoint.

B. Regulation of the CATV systems and their operations

Under the system posited, a CATV system operator would be licensed by the FCC. Of course, he might also be subject to state regulation and local franchising,[172] provided there is no federal preemption and the constitutional limits set forth in this Note are complied with. Indeed, given local government's greater familiarity with special local communication needs, the choice of which potential operator should be granted a license might best be left to the franchising procedures of the municipality involved.[173] The FCC could, of course, make itself available to the local agencies as a reservoir of expertise and experience.[174] Pursuant to the local grant or franchise, then, the FCC would license the operator chosen on the condition that he agree, on penalty of license forfeiture,[175] to adhere to any FCC rules relating to cable transmission.

In the proposed system, it seems appropriate that the FCC have power to promulgate rules governing three general areas of concern.

1. Technical Standards Regulations. In order to secure the best possible media system for the public,[176] the Commission would be empowered to require that the cable systems meet certain technical standards. The FCC has already begun to move in this direction by proposing a series of rules that would require a minimum channel capacity,[177] adaptability of the cable for a two-way transmission system,[178] and "that each community within the franchise area of the system be equipped with production capability for the programming of its community channel." [179]

2. Cable and Broadcast Television Coexistence Regulations. Until the time, if ever, that the cable reaches 100% of the homes in a given area, there is a public interest in maintaining broadcast television. Left unregulated, though, CATV might drive out broadcast television at a time when a substantial portion of the public would still not have cable available to them.[180] Thus, whether its long range goal is to preserve a peaceful coexistence between the competing media or merely to provide a decent burial for broadcast television, the FCC must take an active role in the cable-broadcast confrontation so as to protect the public interest.

---

[168] MAYOR'S TASK FORCE REPORT, supra note 3, at 58. See generally VERA INSTITUTE OF JUSTICE, A REPORT ON NEW YORK CITY'S OPTIONS FOR CABLE TELEVISION FRANCHISES 7–10 (1970).

[169] See sections VI–A–2 & B infra.

[170] See, e.g., Note, supra note 1, at 864–75.

[171] 47 U.S.C. §§ 201–23 (1964).

[172] See, e.g., Illinois Broadcasting Co. v. City of Decatur, 96 Ill. App. 2d 454, 238 N.E.2d 261 (1968).

[173] Community Antenna Television Systems, Federal-State or Local Relationships, 35 Fed. Reg. 11044, 11045 (1970).

[174] Id.

[175] Cf. 47 U.S.C. §§ 307–12.

[176] See 47 U.S.C. § 151 (1964).

[177] Community Antenna Television Systems, Technical Standards, 35 Fed. Reg. 11036, 11037 (1970). The FCC proposes adopting a requirement of either 20 or 40 channels.

[178] Id.

[179] Id.

[180] L. JOHNSON, supra note 10, at 63–65.

The Commission has long focused its attention upon this area and has taken steps to cope with the problems involved.[181] Among the options open to it to meet future needs arising from cable-broadcast competition, the FCC might choose, for example, under its authority to provide for the public interest in the best possible media system, and with a view toward eventual elemination of broadcast television, to condition a grant of a cable license on an understanding that the cable operator go into markets that, for demographic reasons, might otherwise be unprofitable, such as rural or ghetto areas.[182]

3. Policy-Oriented Regulations. Finally, the FCC can use its power of economic regulation over the CATV operator to insure that the CATV industry effectively serves the public interest. The Commission has already accepted in principle the idea that cable systems should allocate their channels so as to provide without charge a local government channel, a public access channel, and instruction channels.[183] Naturally, the Commission would retain power in the proposed system to pursue these general public interest goals through its regulation of the cable systems.[184]

C. Regulation of the CATV program originators

In addition to its licensing function, the FCC under the proposed system would have the authority to promulgate certain rules governing the operation of the channel lessees. Such rules would, of course, have to be narrowly drawn to avoid any first amendment challenge to their scope or enforcement procedure.[185]

In view of the need for procedural safeguards, it would be appropriate to limit the options of the Commission, in the event of alleged violations of its regulations, to either the issuance of a cease and desist order,[186] enforceable only by judicial action, or the recommendation of criminal proceedings[187] where appropriate. The salient feature of this system is that the FCC would be compelled to use the judicial process to enforce its content-regulating rules.

Furthermore, since the channel user would not, under the new system, be licensed by the FCC, he would have less to lose by incurring the wrath of the Commission. Thus, rather than being constrained by excessive timidity in the exercise of first amendment rights, the originator would be able to test any FCC rules he felt to be restrictive of his rights by pushing at the boundaries of protected speech. In doing this, the user would risk only enjoinment from continuance of the specific practice (not deprivation of the use of the medium) or subjection to criminal sanctions, as is the case with other media. He could no more be deprived of any right to future lease of channel space than could someone convicted under a pornography statute be enjoined from further access to a printing press.

---

[181] E.g., Experimental Auxiliary, and Special Broadcast and Other Distributional Systems, 35 Fed. Reg. 10903 (1970) (rules relating to cross ownership of broadcast stations and CATV systems). See generally Proposed Rulemaking and Notice of Inquiry; CATV Systems, 33 Fed. Reg. 19028 (1968): CATV—Second Report and Order, (Jurisdiction over CATV), 31 Fed. Reg. 4540 (1966).

[182] See generally Posner, Natural Monopoly and its Regulation, 21 STAN. L. REV. 548 (1969).

[183] Proposed Rule Making—Community Antenna Television Systems, 30 Fed. Reg. 11045, 11048 (1970). See, for example, the system proposed in the MAYOR'S TASK FORCE REPORT, where the task force, dealing with a proposed 18 channel system, suggests:

"(a) Eleven should be used to carry the signals of the city's eleven television channels.

"(b) Three should be reserved for the exclusive use of the city government, at no cast to the city government.

"(c) The remaining four channels should be used for program origination. Each authorized cable television company should be permitted to hold two channels as a general broadcaster—one for the presentation of public service programs, the other for the presentation of whatever programming it may wish to offer. To ensure that a cable television company does not control access to all channels, however, it would hold the other two channels only as a carrier. These channels would be available for lease by outside users who wish to present original programs." Letter accompanying the MAYOR'S TASK FORCE REPORT, supra note 3, at 4.

[184] There is a danger that the FCC might use its channel allocation power to prevent expression of unpopular views. This could be done by expanding the requirements for government channels, with the result that space for public common carrier channels would be eliminated. This would, in effect, create a system of prior restraints, as the government would then be in a position to allocate the available air time to those programmers of whom it approved. To avoid this possibility, it may be advisable to establish a statutory requirement of a minimum number of public common carrier channels for the benefit and use of all private parties willing to pay a reasonable fee.

[185] Specific rules are developed below. See section VI infra.

[186] Cf. 47 U.S.C. § 312(b) (1964).

[187] Cf. 18 U.S.C. §§ 1304 & 1464 (1964).

VI. CONSTITUTIONALLY PERMISSIBLE CONTENT REGULATION RULES FOR CATV

The FCC's power to make rules directly regulating CATV program content will, of course, be limited by first amendment guarantees. For a particular rule to be acceptable, it would have to be based on one of the three constitutional justifications thought to be applicable to CTAV: either on the accessability[188] or imposition[189] arguments, which justify certain limited negative restraints, or on the impact[190] theory which, arguably, justifies some affirmative restraints. To the extent that the specific problems posed by these theories cannot adequately be satisfied by other measures, direct restraints on CATV programming would be justifiable.

A. Negative restraints

These restraints are, by definition, restraints on freedom of speech and can be used only if narrowly drawn to cure specific evils that are considered greater than the loss of free speech involved.[191] There are, of course, recognized limitations on first amendment rights that apply to all media. For example, negative restraints have been approved in circumstances involving a clear and present danger of dangerous conduct,[192] obscenity,[193] or "fighting words."[194] These exceptions will, of course, apply to speech on CATV. But it is not with these that we are presently concerned. Rather, it is with any other more restrictive restraints that may constitutionally be applied to CATV. As suggested in section III above, there are only two justifications for applying stricter negative restraints upon cablecast television than may be imposed on other non-broadcast media: the accessability and the imposition rationales.

1. Possible Accessability-Based Restraints. Television, cable as well as broadcast, is readily accessible to children; and it is usually conceded that the state has a legitimate interest in protecting children from nonparentally approved exposure to non-obscene, yet highly salacious materials.[195] At the same time, though it is clear that the state must be careful not to restrict unduly the adult population's rights to see such marginally non-obscene matter.[196] Accommodation of both these conflicting interests might best be served, given the nature of cable television, by an FCC requirement that all cable attachments to individual television receivers be equipped with a simple mechanical device that will enable a parent to "lock-off" certain channels.

During the period of broadcast-cable coexistence, the parent could, if he so chose, shelter his child by "locking-off" all channels except those relaying broadcast signals directly subject to FCC content regulation. If broadcast television were to become extinct, it is reasonable to assume that many, if not most, permanent lessees would, as a matter both of goodwill and of audience interest, not transmit material that would be offensive to minors, especially at hours during which children are likely to be in the audience. Undoubtedly, certain channels might become "electronic smut shops,"[197] but guaranteeing the parent's ability to "lock-off" such channels seems quite adequate for the protection of the child.

It might be argued that such a system would work only if the parent exercises good judgment and that there is a state obligation to protect the child even though the parent is unconcerned. The best view, however, seems to be that the state can legitimately seek only to aid those parents who wish to provide an environment for their children in which there is no exposure or only limited exposure to certain types of materials. In other words, the state is limited to ensuring that the child may be denied access to such material when the parent is not present.[198]

---

[188] See text accompanying notes 116–122 supra.

[189] See text accompanying notes 109–115 supra.

[190] See text accompanying notes 101–108 supra.

[191] Cf. Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51 (1965).

[192] Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919).

[193] Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957).

[194] Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942).

[195] E.g., Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629 (1968).

[196] See text accompanying notes 116–122 supra.

[197] Cf. the fears of the National Association of Broadcasters that CATV can also transmit borderline pornography, deceptive and irresponsible advertising, subversive propaganda, the outpourings of the lunatic fringe, and the appeals of countless others whose appearances have thus far been minimized by the broadcasters' responsibility to program within the public interest standards of the Communications Act and the NAB's Code of Good Practices. NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF BROADCASTERS, REPLY COMMENTS ON PART V, GENERAL AREAS OF INQUIRY, quoted in L. JOHNSON, supra note 10, at 57.

In any case, it is clear that, in protecting children, the state cannot "reduce the adult population . . . to [watching] only what is fit for children." [199] And this "lock-off" device would seem to be a constitutional as well as a practical method for control of near-obscene programming, which does not restrict the viewing options of the adult. In addition, this method seems especially desirable as it eliminates the need for the FCC to exercise any supervision or control over the communicators themselves.

2. Imposition Based Restraints. To a certain extent the television viewer is a more passive receiver of communications than the newspaper reader in that once the television is turned on, the viewer may unavoidably be exposed to material he would have preferred not to see. As pointed out above, the individual's right to privacy is not to be completely sacrificed to the first amendment rights of a "speaker"; indeed, the Supreme Court has indicated its willingness to protect the public from having offensive material thrust upon them.[200]

Since turning on the television is as much an affirmative act as is picking up a newspaper, rules based on this theory should be confined to situations in which the element of surprise is clearly present. Thus, for example, the FCC might legitimately require that warnings be given before programs of possibly objectionable material are broadcast. Similarly, the Commission might develop rules regarding extraneous material, such as advertising, that comes within the confines of one program and which might be highly offensive to the audience, which has no choice but to listen, leave the room, or turn off the television for the length of the commercial.[201] The degree of content control such regulations may vest in the FCC would seem justified by the fact that the viewer must perform an affirmative act to avoid offensive material.[202] Furthermore, commercial advertising may not have the benefit of first amendment protection.[203]

B. Possible affirmative restraints

Preventing the viewer's subjection to unwanted material satisfies only a portion of the FCC's commitment to encourage the development of an adequate television system. In the context of a cable system, however, most of the FCC's affirmative goals, notably diversity, localism, and balance, can best be achieved by regulation at the system's operational level, rather than at its program level, as presently done.[204]

Thus, diversity of content might be achieved by an FCC requirement that the system operator make available a certain number of channels for use by programmers with different financial bases, for example, several channels set aside for advertiser based programming (producing mostly general appeal programming); a number open for public common carrier service (producing programming based on the originator's rather than the viewer's desires); and a number for a pay-per-program format (producing programs with a limited but intense appeal).[205]

As for the requirement that the media not unduly distort public debate,[206] this too can best be met, in large measure, by regulation at the system level. The first amendment is based upon the view that the truth will emerge through free discussion of all ideas. To that end the amendment permits, arguably requires,[207] that this discussion not be unduly distorted by the "unnatural" influence of a particular medium of communication.[208] Otherwise, if a few communicators who dominate the enormously powerful television medium because the limitations of the electromagnetic spectrum restrict access vigorously promote one point of view, their position is likely to gain wide acceptance, not because of its merit, but because of its "unnaturally" prominent position in the public forum. This possibility is the reason for the fairness doctrine.[209]

---

[198] Henkin, supra note 120, at 413 n.68. See Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629, 639 (1968).

[199] Butler v. Michigan, 352 U.S. 380, 383 (1957).

[200] See Redrup v. New York, 386 U.S. 767 (1967) (per curiam). See generally text accompanying notes 109–21 supra.

[201] Advertising was the context of the Banzhaf decision. 405 F.2d 1082 (D.C. Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 842 (1969).

[202] See text accompanying notes 109–21 supra.

[203] See Valentin v. Chrestensen, 316 U.S. 52 (1942) (Municipal ordinance forbidding the distribution in the streets of commercial handbills was upheld). Because some advertising, e.g., that which would be better characterized as political or social propaganda is constitutionally protected, the possibility that commercial advertising is not protected does not moot the question of the permissibility of this regulation. See Developments in the Law—Deceptive Advertising, 80 HARV. L. REV. 1005, 1027–36 (1967).

[204] See note 183 supra and accompanying text.

[205] Barnett & Greenberg, supra note 8, at 13–15.

[206] See text accompanying notes 101–08 supra.

[207] See generally Barron, supra note 70.

In the case of a CATV channel, however, there is no "unnatural" reason that would give it undue influence in public debate. CATV is not a limited access medium as is broadcast television. If each community is serviced by a great number of cable channels, no single CATV originator will have a captive audience. That is, he would not be able to thrust his ideas upon viewers who had no choice but to watch his channel or one or two others with very similar interests. Every cable originator would be free to espouse any position he wished, and advocates with different opinions would be able to present their arguments on other channels. Indeed, such a system would seem to serve the first amendment with even greater effectiveness than could any direct regulation, such as we have at present, for it bases itself on the rather sound proposition that vigorous debate is most likely to develop when each participant is free to advocate what he wishes without being concerned about attempting to present a balanced viewpoint. Thus, there seems to be no reason to treat CATV channels any differently from newspapers. Just as many newspapers adopt political biases with each reader free to choose among them, the television viewer would be free to choose among the various CATV channels and originators.

Of course, such a system would not serve the public debate function of the first amendment if any ideas were denied all access to television, a medium of great potential influence. For, without question, in order that a debate be truly free, all points of view must have access to the avenues of communication.[210]

Here again, however, this goal would seem to be best assured by regulation at the cable systems level requiring the designation of certain channels as "public common carriers." With the CATV systems operator providing the studios and expertise and time on these channels sold in small segments and at regulated rates to anyone wishing to be heard, public debate would be fostered naturally by the conviction of the advocates, rather than by an artificial criterion of "balanced presentation."

As a final point, it should be noted that during the period in which broadcast television coexists with CATV, the broadcaster would, of course, still be subject to all the rules, including those presently governing FCC licensees. However, a problem might be presented if broadcasting became an extinct mode of transmission with the present broadcasters becoming major channel lessees. Because of their present dominance of the industry, it is not unreasonable to assume that even when the networks switch their mode of transmission to cable, they will continue to attract a major portion of the television audience. To some extent this holdover phenomenon might be attributed to the "unnatural" effect of frequency scarcity that has kept the networks free from major competition for many years. During the period of broadcast television, they were able to develop their huge attraction not because of program content alone, but because of the lack of competition. In such circumstances, then, it would seem that the fairness doctrine might legitimately be applied to these ex-broadcasters for some certain, though limited, period of time after their conversion to the cable so as to prevent them from exploiting the enormous influence that was created by the "unnatural" factors inherent in broadcast television.

Conclusion

The fact that there is no limit to the number of cable television channels potentially available in any one area indicates that channel scarcity is no longer available as a constitutional justification for television content regulation. Most other possible theories for affording CATV less first amendment protection than other media were examined and rejected as either spurious or inapplicable. However, the easy accessability of television to children and the possibility of an unwilling viewer encountering objectionable material do justify some narrowly drawn negative restraints to remedy these specific problems. In addition, television's tremendous capacity to influence arguably justifies certain affirmative restraints to eliminate distortions in public debate caused by "unnatural" factors. But except perhaps during a brief transition period, CATV channels do not pose the threat of "unnatural" distortion in the way that broadcast channels do; it seems that adequate public debate can best be guaranteed by requiring the setting aside of "public common carrier" channels at the systems level, and not by regulating the programming directly.

---

[208] See generally text accompanying notes 101–08 supra. As used here, the term "unnatural" refers to an unusually large influence that an idea gains, not through any inherent attraction of the idea itself, but rather as a result of some extraneous factor that should not be controlling in the public forum.

[209] See Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 14 Fed. Reg. 3055, 3059 (1949). For the sake of brevity, this Note refers only to the fairness doctrine, but the same arguments are, of course, valid when applied to the equal time requirement.

[210] Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 14 Fed. Reg. 3055, 3056 (1949). Barron, supra note 70, applies this argument to newspapers as well as television. Barron is rebutted in EMERSON, supra note 81, at 666–71.

Adequate first amendment protection can be realized for CATV only through a major overhaul of the regulatory process consistent with the prior restraint doctrine. "Ideally the transmission function should be separated from program origination with the FCC having licensing power only over the transmitter, or the cable systems operator. For only if the originator is totally free from administrative licensing will he be able to enjoy the uninhibited freedom of speech guaranteed by the first amendment." And only if the first amendment is given its full application in the television industry will CATV, released from regulatory restraints, be free to realize its potentially revolutionary impact on modern telecommunications.

/From 5 Harv. Civ. R.-Civ. L. Rev. 89 (1970)/

FROM THE FCC'S FAIRNESS DOCTRINE TO RED LION'S FIDUCIARY PRINCIPLE

Probably no issue in the history of American broadcasting has evoked as much public discussion, criticism and agony as who should exercise effective control over the quality and content of television and radio programming. Central to the problem is concern about the influence enjoyed by private broadcasters over the political intelligence of the country; not only news broadcasts, but all programs in some way affect the public's perceptions, impressions, opinions and understandings of contemporary life.[1] Thus, as many commentators have noted with increasing emphasis,[2] what is at stake in this debate is not only the future of broadcasting's multibillion dollar private investment,[3] but also the generations of minds that the media will influence.

Traditionally, the FCC has eschewed direct regulation of programming in favor of controls over station location, ownership limitations and employment requirements that have only an indirect and problematical influence over programming content.[4] Straightforward regulation has been avoided for three primary reasons. First, in terms of resource capacity, the Commission has been understaffed from its inception and restricted in its ability to supervise programming practices by individual licensees.[5] Second, it has failed to develop meaningful and workable standards of programming service.[6] But most importantly, the Commission has evinced a high degree of concern over whether direct regulation of programming oversteps the constitutional bounds of the First Amendment. Embodied in the Communications Act of 1934 is the specific admonition that "no regulation or condition shall be promulgated or fixed by the Commission which shall interfere with the rights of free speech by means of radio communication."[7] However compelling the Commission's purpose might be in improving the quality of programming, that purpose cannot be served by unnecessarily broad or burdensome restrictions on the freedom of FCC licensees.[8] It seems that, as a result, a majority of the seven FCC Commissioners "do not regard it as the Commission's proper role to give serious scrutiny to the performance of applicants before granting their requests for renewal."[9]

---

[1] This point was vividly illustrated with respect to one major contemporary problem, race relations, by the Kerner Commission:

> The absence of Negro faces and activities from the media has an effect on white audiences as well as black. If what the white American reads in his newspapers or sees on television conditions his expectation of what is ordinary and normal in the larger society, he will neither understand nor accept the black American. By failing to portray the Negro as a matter of routine and in the context of the total society, the news media have, we believe, contributed to the black-white schism in this country.

REPORT OF THE NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMISSION ON CIVIL DISORDERS 383 (Bantam Book ed. 1968).

[2] E.g., S. Donner, THE FUTURE OF COMMERCIAL TELEVISION, Report of the Stanford University Seminar on Television (1965); EQUAL TIME, THE PRIVATE BROADCASTER AND THE PUBLIC INTEREST (L. Laurent ed. 1964); R. MacNeil, THE PEOPLE MACHINE (1968); B. Rubin, POLITICAL TELEVISION (1967); Address by Vice-President Spiro T. Agnew, in Des Moines, Iowa, reported in N.Y.Times, Nov. 14, 1969, at 24, col. 1-8.

[3] See, TELEVISION FACTBOOK passim (1966).

[4] The example of employment illustrates the Commission's approach. In a pending rule making proceeding "to require broadcast licensees to show non-discrimination in their employment practices," 33 Fed. Reg. 9960 (1968), it was observed by the American Civil Liberties Union that the hiring of racial minority group members such as Negroes and American Indians "could very well help to balance the present preponderance of white interests and white points of view on the air." Letter from the American Civil Liberties Union to the F.C.C., Oct. 4, 1968, at 2, on file with F.C.C., Docket No. 18244. The proposed rule making proceeding was announced shortly after the Commission renewed the license of a southern station accused of presenting racially biased programming. The renewal was reversed in United Church of Christ v. FCC, 38 U.S.L.W. 2002 (D.C. Cir. June 20, 1969).

A dramatic turning point may have been signaled, however, by the Supreme Court's decision in two cases consolidated for hearing in the last term of court. In Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C. and United States v. Radio Television News Directors Association,[10] the court faced squarely and for the first time the question whether the FCC, relying on its "fairness doctrine," could constitutionally compel a licensee to adhere to certain minimal programming requisites. In holding, 7 to 0, "that the specific application of the fairness doctrine in Red Lion, and . . . in RTNDA, are both authorized by Congress and enhance rather than abridge the freedoms of speech and press,"[11] the Court may have significantly mitigated the constitutional obstacle to more effective and direct program regulation.[12]

---

[5] The FCC staff numbers approximately 1500 employees and operates on an annual budget of about $20 million. Interview with Mr. Robert Thorpe, Assistant to FCC Commissioner Nicholas Johnson, November 13, 1969; see also, MacNeil, supra note 2, at 259. The volume of correspondence regarding broadcasting programming may be illustrated by an inter-office memorandum circulated to the Commissioners in July, 1968. The memo reported that in the previous month 4,807 letters had been received of which 1,948 were treated as complaints about some aspect of programming. Of this number, 258 related to the problem of violence on television, presumably in reaction to the death of Senator Robert Kennedy. MEMORANDUM OF THE BROADCAST BUREAU, Item No. 3, July 23, 1968.

[6] Jaffe, WHDH: The FCC and Broadcasting License Renewals, 82 HARV. L. REV. 1693, 1694-1697 (1969).

[7] 47 U.S.C. § 326 (1964). See generally Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine in the Handling of Controversial Issues of Public Importance, 29 Fed. Reg. 10415 (1964) [hereafter cited as Fairness Primer]. For a lively discussion among the Commissioners during the hearing into renewal of a station license where the licensee allowed, inter alia, a lengthy panel discussion of homosexuality and the reading of literature thought to be offensive, see Pacifica Foundation, 36 F.C.C. 147 (1964).

[8] United States v. Robel, 389 U.S. 258 (1967); Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 (1965). See also Note, Less Drastic Means and the First Amendment, 78 YALE L.J. 464 (1969).

[9] Broadcasting in America and the FCC's License Renewal Process: An Oklahoma Case Study, 14 FCC 2d 1, 12 (1969) (separate statement of Commissioners Cox and Johnson) [hereinafter cited as Oklahoma Case Study].

[10] 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

I

As it has evolved through FCC administrative decisions, policy reports and, since 1965, codified regulations,[13] the fairness doctrine imposes on all broadcast licensees the obligation "to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance."[14] Red Lion and RTNDA involved two particular aspects of the doctrine: the rules governing licensee editorializing and "personal attacks" during the discussion of public issues.[15] In both instances, licensees who have broadcast expressions of the kind embraced by the rules are required to preserve evidence of the nature of the remarks and to offer free reply time to groups or individuals with contrasting viewpoints.[16]

The fairness obligation was thought by many to have been compelled by the language of the Federal Radio Act of 1927.[17] Although primarily concerned with the novel engineering problems involved in finding an optimum employment of the spectrum space, Congress also focused its attention on the difficult question of who should have access to the air waves.[18] Reflecting the anxiety of some that "big city" interests would monopolize radio,[19] the Act instructed the Federal Radio Commission to regulate its use "as public convenience, interest, or necessity requires. . . ."[20] From the outset, the Commission interpreted this statutory command to compel a critical view of stations which presented only one side of controversial questions.[21] It has been widely supposed that when Congress incorporated substantially the same "public interest" standard in the successor Act of 1934,[22] "the basic policy of the 'standard of fairness' which is imposed on broadcasters . . ." was reaffirmed.[23] In 1959, moreover, after several decades of Commission experience with the fairness principle, Congress ratified it in major part by amending the Act to exempt certain kinds of broadcasts from its coverage.[24]

---

[11] Id. at 375.

[12] The Court may also have indicated how staff inadequacies and the dilemma of an absence of standards may be mitigated. See p. 101 infra.

[13] John J. Dempsey, 6 P & F Radio Reg. 615 (1950); United Broadcasting Co., 10 F.C.C. 515 (1945); Mayflower Broadcasting Corp., 8 F.C.C. 333 (1941); Young People's Association for the Propagation of the Gospel, 6 F.C.C. 178 (1938). Report on Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 F.C.C. 1246 (1949), see also Fairness Primer, supra note 7. 47 C.F.R. §§ 73.123, 73.300, 73.598, 73.679 (1969) (all identical).

[14] 47 U.S.C.§ 315 (1964).

[15] The personal attack rule provides that an attack "made upon the honesty, character integrity or like personal qualities of an identified person or group" during the discussion of a controversial issue obligates a licensee to notify the subject of the attack within a week after it is made. 47 C.F.R. §§ 73.123, 73.300, 73.598, 73.679 (1969) (all identical). The editorializing rules establish a similar obligation on licensees who endorse or oppose candidates for public office, except that the notification periods are shorter. Id.

[16] These codified rules are not exhaustive of the fairness doctrine. Thus, a licensee editorial not related to a candidate for public office but clearly adopting a controversial viewpoint raises similar obligations to offer responsive reply time. See generally Fairness Primer, supra note 7.

[17] Ch. 169, § 4, 44 Stat. 1162.

[18] Prior to 1927, the frequencies for radio were generally left on a first come, first serve basis. E. Barnouw, A TOWER IN BABEL, 211 et seq. (1966).

[19] Then as now, New York City appears to have represented evil incarnate. Compare Address by Vice-President Spiro Agnew, supra note 2 (New York is "the most unrepresentative community in the entire United States") with the remarks of one Southwestern Congressman debating with Rep. Cellers of New York in 1928: "I am

The history of enforcement by the FCC has not quieted disagreement over the scope of the fairness obligation and the extent to which the Commission may constitutionally go in enforcing it. It was this disagreement, in fact, which the Court sought to resolve in the Red Lion-RTNDA litigation.

Red Lion arose late in 1964 when a Pennsylvania radio station broadcast a 15-minute "Christian Crusade" program featuring Reverend Billy James Hargis. In the course of the program, Hargis discussed a book written by Fred J. Cook, entitled, "Goldwater Extremist on the Right" and made several allegations about the author's ethics as a journalist and his previous political affiliations. The Commission, citing Times-Mirror Broadcasting Co.,[25] concluded that Hargis's remarks constituted a personal attack and ordered the station to provide Cook with an opportunity to respond free of charge.[26] The RTNDA litigation was commenced by a petition seeking to set aside the FCC's newly adopted codification of its not satisfied to sit there and listen to your city without you listening to mine." 69 Cong. Rec. 4489 (remarks of Rep. McKeown). Initially, Congress attempted to create a buffer against domination of the nation by any single geographical area by creating five zones which were to have had roughly comparable transmission and reception services. Act of March 28, 1928, ch. 263 § 5, 45 Stat. 373, repealed, ch. 511, 49 Stat. 1475 (1936).

---

[20] § 4, 44 Stat. 1162 (1927).

[21] When the Federal Radio Commission was established, many active radio stations previously licensed under the 1912 legislation were found to be owned and operated in the interests of specific groups, such as labor unions, churches, newspapers, etc. Barnouw, supra note 18. The FRC refused to license such stations almost immediately. See Great Lakes Broadcasting Co., 3 F.R.C. Ann. Rep. 32 (1929), rev'd on the other grounds, 59 App. D.C. 197, 37 F.2d 993, cert. denied, 281 U.S. 706 (1930); Chicago Federation of Labor v. FRC, 3 F.R.C. Ann. Rep. 36 (1929), aff'd, 41 F.2d 422 (D.C. Cir. 1930).

[22] 47 U.S.C. § 303 (1964).

[23] H.R. Rep. No. 1069, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. 5 (1958).

[24] Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C., 395 U.S. 367, 380-2 (1969), construing 47 U.S.C. § 315 (1964).

[25] 24 P & F Radio Reg. 404 (1962).

[26] The Red Lion Broadcasting Co. at first refused on the ground that Cook had not shown to the station that he was unable to pay for his reply time or that a commercial sponsor for it could not be found. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. F.C.C., 381 F.2d 908, 911 (D.C. Cir. 1967).

licensee editorializing rules. In a lengthy opinion issued in September, 1968, the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals granted the petition on the grounds that the Commission's enforcement procedure compelling broadcasters to provide free reply time "will impose unconstitutional burdens on the freedom of the press protected by the First Amendment."[27]

The broadcasters attacked the doctrine on two broad grounds. (1) First, it was suggested that the doctrine works an unconstitutional restraint on the broadcasters' freedoms of speech and press. (2) Second, it was argued that the Commission's chosen means for enforcement of the doctrine would encourage station owners to censor their own programming, thus abridging the public's right to an uninhibited forum for ideas.[28]

(1) The doctrine as an abridgment of the broadcasters' rights. The broadcasters in Red Lion-RTNDA saw their own freedom of expression threatened by the severity of the sanctions for noncompliance, the vagueness of the fairness obligation and the potential the doctrine creates for administrative abuse of discretion. Because licenses to broadcast conceivably can be revoked or not renewed by the FCC on the basis of a single fairness violation, it was argued, the doctrine reposes in the government the ultimate censorial power to silence permanently a broadcaster for a solitary pecadillo.[29] The chilling effect of this prospect is compounded by the lack of clear standards by which station owners may gauge whether the FCC will consider a given expression "controversial" or of "public importance."[30] Confronted with close questions, for example while preparing documentaries or station editorials, broadcasters will feel constrained to avoid the heavy penalty of license denial by favoring the least controversial expression. Finally, it was argued, the potential for governmental abuse is clear. By selective enforcement of the doctrine, the FCC can protect certain expressions from the balancing requirement while burdening others. Thus, licensees with a proclivity to express views at odds with the prevailing governmental opinion run a substantially higher risk of suffering the Commission's sanctions than licensees who program controversial utterances that coincide with the Commission's own judgment.[31]

---

[27] Radio-Television News Directors Association v. United States, 400 F.2d 1002, 1010 (7th Cir. 1968).

[28] The Seventh Circuit adopted the ingenious position that while the fairness doctrine could be part of the reasons for a denial of a license renewal, the rules requiring responsive reply time imposed burdens too onerous and immediate to withstand constitutional attack. Id. at 1013.

[29] Revocation of licenses is provided for in 47 U.S.C. § 312(a) (1964).

[30] It is not clear, for example, whether the doctrine requires responsive reply time for personal attacks uttered apart from a discussion respecting a controversial issue. See Note, The Supreme Court, 1968 Term, 83 HARV. L. REV. 7, 144 (1969). The editorializing rules, however, are less susceptible to this objection since they tend to operate somewhat more mechanically. But see McCarthy v. F.C.C. 390 F.2d 471 (D.C. Cir. 1968) (whether equal opportunity should be afforded Senator McCarthy following address by Pres. Lyndon Johnson in December, 1967).

[31] Cf. Pacifica Foundation, 36 F.C.C. 147 (1964).

The Court quickly disposed of these objections. First, it pointed out, the Commission has available a range of sanctions less drastic than license denial. The responsive reply time rules, in themselves, represent a sanction developed by the FCC to mitigate the effects of biased programming without permanently excluding a broadcaster from the air waves. Other sanctions may range from a mild rebuke to a monetary forfeiture.[32] Second, the Court dismissed the vagueness argument as spurious, pointing out that the Commission has developed a line of administrative precedents which establish clear and reasonable bounds for the doctrine.[33] For example, the FCC has repeatedly expressed its intention to deal reasonably with inadvertant violations;[34] and recently, the Commission affirmed that nothing in the fairness rules requires broadcasters to alert either the Commission or the public in advance of a controversial broadcast or a personal attack.[35]

Turning to the third objection, the Court did not deny that the doctrine imposes burdens on licensees who otherwise would be free to broadcast only the views they found desirable.[36] But this limitation, the Court indicated, does not necessarily implicate the government in censorial activity. A broadcaster may still exercise absolute freedom to air his own views; the rules limit only his monopolization of the air waves to exclude contrary expressions. In justifying the burdens attached to the exercise of free expression, the Court relied heavily on the special nature of the broadcasting medium. Since the spectrum space available for private use is limited, it reasoned, the Government has a special warrant to regulate access in order to insure that optimum use of the frequency is achieved.[37] In pursuit of that objective, it has conferred on some a monopoly power over the resource. But there is no absolute right to enjoyment of this power over the channels of communication. Because it springs from the governmental licensing process, it must be conditioned upon what the Court termed a "proxy or fiduciary" duty to give adequate coverage to all competing views without distinction as to content or ideology.[38]

Yet frequency limitations of the spectrum, which the Court described at considerable length, are only some among the many impediments to greater public access to the broadcasting media. In fact, given the present availability of frequency space in many radio and television markets, they are not the major obstacles.[39] Two others loom large as well: the high cost of access to ownership[40] and the FCC's own licensing policies, which have not consistently encouraged diversity of ownership.[41] But there can be little doubt that broadcasting is a severely restricted medium, whatever the causes. The award of a license by the government to a private broadcaster elevates him to a potentially preferred position in the public forum. Conditioning retention of that position upon observance of a fiduciary duty to program responsive replies to editorials or personal attacks does not seem unreasonable when the interest served is an increase in the volume of ideas and controversial expressions available to the public.[42]

---

[32] 47 U.S.C. § 503 (1964).

[33] 395 U.S. at 395.

[34] E.g., Report on Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, supra note 13, at par. 10. 10.

[35] Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, Pacific Southwest Regional Office v. FCC, 403 F.2d 169 (D.C. Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 394 U.S. 930 (1969).

[36] 395 U.S. at 386.

[37] "Where there are substantially more individuals who want to broadcast than there are frequencies to allocate, it is idle to posit an unabridgeable First Amendment right to broadcast comparable to the right of every individual to speak, write, or publish." Id. at 388.

[38] Id. at 389.

In redressing the imbalance between licensees and those excluded from ownership, the Court in Red Lion–RTNDA adopted what one commentator has termed a "positive" dimension to First Amendment theory.[43] This approach emphasizes not the individual right of the speaker but the more fundamental interest in "the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral and other ideas and experiences. . . ."[44] As a result, it restores to prominence the cardinal purpose of the First Amendment: the assurance of a multiplicity of ideas and experiences.

(2) The doctrine as an abridgment of the rights of the public. The broadcasters further asserted that the rules would actually work to inhibit public discourse. Invoking a variation of Gresham's Law, they argued that licensees anxious to avoid the burdens of compliance or the penalties of noncompliance will meticulously purge their programs of any matter likely to provoke a demand for free reply time. At the same time, conscientious

---

[39] 47 C.F.R. § 73.606 (1968) contains a table of assignments of television channels. Despite the apparent availability of VHF and UHF frequencies, however, the Court correctly noted that there is no assurance that all demands on the spectrum space can be served. Demand for frequencies grows apace with the population and increasingly sophisticated land-mobile, industrial and medical uses. 395 U.S. at 396.

[40] See, e.g., Television Factbook 10C-21C (1966).

[41] Cf., Jaffe, supra note 6, at 1697-98; Johnson, The Media Barons and the Public Interest, ATLANTIC, June, 1968, at 43. In 1968, less than ten percent of VHF television stations were owned by entities that did not have interests in other media. Id. at 48. Such concentration poses a danger that viewers in the local community will be deprived of the opportunity to hear conflicting views on important issues. Existing regulations on multiple ownership are lenient, but several recent cases suggest a shift in FCC attitude. E.g., Chronicle Broadcasting Co., 17 F.C.C.2d 245, 15 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 993 (1969); WHDH, Inc., 16 F.C.C.2d 1, 15 P & F Radio Reg.2d 411 (1969).

One proposed rule would limit further applicants to one AM, FM or television station per market. 33 Fed. Reg. 5315, April 3, 1968. Applied prospectively, such a rule would take many years to achieve a significant reduction in concentration of ownership of the media. Johnson, supra at 51. The Justice Department Antitrust Division has suggested the FCC consider divestiture of existing concentrations and extension of the rule to include newspapers. N.Y. Times, Aug. 2, 1968, at 67, col. 3.

[42] See Note, The Supreme Court, 1968 Term, supra note 30, at 143-47.

[43] Barron, An Emerging First Amendment Right of Access to the Media?, 37 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 487, 498 (1969).

[44] 395 U.S. at 390.

station owners will be put to the Sisyphean task of counterbalancing every expression even remotely controversial. The resultant programming blandness of the former and economic and artistic burdens suffered by the latter will achieve a result directly the reverse of the Court's intention.[45]

The Supreme Court found this argument "speculative":

> [I]f experience with the administration of these doctrines indicates that they have the net effect of reducing rather than enhancing the volume and quality of coverage, there will be time enough to reconsider the constitutional implications. The fairness doctrine in the past has had no such overall effect.[46]

The Court's summary treatment of this argument seems unconvincing. Occasions when individual stations as well as networks have chosen to be silent rather than speak out on controversial issues are not unknown. In some instances, the decision to say nothing has clearly been based on the impracticality of affording responsive reply time.[47] In others, however, ideological aversion to seeing a viewpoint given access to the air waves has played a major role in the decision.[48] But the Court may be correct in suggesting that generally the doctrine is not the principle cause for licensee timorousness. Data drawn from two recent studies indicate that on the contrary, broadcasters often fail to air controversial issues for reasons unrelated to the effect of the balancing requirement. A Senate subcommittee polling over 5,000 licensees found that approximately 9 per cent felt the doctrine inhibited them from engaging in public interest programming.[49] Another survey conducted by the National Association of Broadcasters in 1967 revealed that nearly 30 per cent of all licensees sampled had experienced at least one threat from an advertiser after broadcasting a political editorial.[50] The two surveys strongly suggest that commercial considerations rather than the fairness obligation account for much of the dearth of tendentious programming among commercial broadcasters.[51]

---

[45] The Seventh Circuit was impressed with this argument taking note of the "substantial economic and practical burdens which attend the mandatory requirements of notification, the provision of a tape, and the arrangement for a reply." 400 F.2d at 1012.

[46] 395 U.S. at 393.

[47] The dilemma may be particularly acute where there is a proliferation of minor candidates for public office. See, Use of Broadcast Facilities by Candidates for Public Office, 31 Fed. Reg. 6660, 6667-69 (1966); Barrow, The Equal Opportunities and the Fairness Doctrines in Broadcasting: Pillars in the Forum of Democracy, 37 U. CINCINNATI L. REV. 447, 480-81 (1968). Further complications can arise in a different context when a candidate for office is in addition an on-the-air personality. Recently, the FCC awarded 22 hours of free time on a Panama City, Florida station to a candidate for tax collector because his opponent had been a local newscaster and variety show emcee. The windfall was used, in part, to air amateur music shows and other entertainment, featuring the non-station employee as "host." Apparently, however, the "Public response was so bad he . . . dropped the entertainment." The candidate was quoted by the Associated Press as remarking optimistically, "As we get nearer election date, I'll use the 50 minutes a day I'm entitled to. If I've got a good band we'll have the band on." See generally New York Times, Oct. 2, 1968, at 78.

[48] A striking illustration is reported in A. Kendrick, Prime Time, 49-60 (1969): During the production of Edward R. Murrow's notable See It Now attack on Senator Joseph McCarthy, several network newsmen expressed the fear that programming the attack would only increase McCarthy's popularity in the end, due both to his exposure on See It Now and his subsequent reply program. However, Murrow eventually decided to go ahead with the program, heeding the advice of Chairman Frank Stanton to offer McCarthy equal time. Murrow, in fact, opened the broadcast with that offer. Interestingly, McCarthy attempted to have his equal appearance filled by columnist William F. Buckley, but the network insisted that McCarthy make his reply personally.

But the Supreme Court went beyond finding that the broadcasters' gloomy predictions of blandness were speculative. In a single passage likely to have a nearly revolutionary impact on the industry, it stated:

> [I]f present licensees should suddenly prove timorous, the Commission is not powerless to insist that they give adequate and fair attention to public issues. . . . To condition the granting or renewal of licenses on a willingness to present representative community views on controversial issues is consistent with the ends and purposes of those constitutional provisions forbidding the abridgment of freedom of speech and freedom of the press.[52]

The Commission power which the Court apparently had in mind is the FCC's general requirement "that every licensee devote a reasonable portion of broadcast time to the discussion and consideration of controversial issues of public importance."[53] Clearly, this affirmative duty goes beyond the obligation to present a contrasting viewpoint once a controversial expression has been broadcast. In effect, it would seem to require all licensees to engage purposely in programming likely to trigger the reply time rules. Such an extension of the fiduciary principle would probably mitigate the discriminatory effects the fairness rules otherwise would have on conscientious licensees. But it remains to be seen whether this obligation is pragmatically or constitutionally enforceable.

---

[49] Staff of Senate Comm. on Interstate Commerce, 90th Cong. 2d Sess., Report on Communications 81 (Comm. Print 1968).

[50] Broadcasters and Editorializing, A Study of Management Attitudes and Stations Practices by the Research Department of the National Association of Broadcasters (1967), quoted in MacNeil, supra note 2, at 236.

[51] The generally higher standard of public service broadcasting among educational outlets would seem to support this conclusion. However, recently 25 primarily southern educational outlets refused to clear the first program of NET's Public Broadcast Laboratory apparently because of its controversial nature. The program included a short drama of a small racist town acted entirely by a Negro company in "white face." Kendrick, supra note 48, at 18.

[52] 395 U.S. at 393-94 (dictum).

[53] 47 U.S.C. § 315 (1964).

II

The obligation to devote a reasonable amount of programming to public interest questions has languished throughout most of the Commission's history, although the FCC has frequently referred to it as a necessary concomitant of the reply time rules or as a component of the fairness doctrine itself.[54] Apart from the constitutional entanglements, the Commission has been unsuccessful in arriving at an enforcement procedure that would be both meaningful and even-handed.

Two polar approaches have received the Commission's most serious attention. One approach would require all licensees to commit a minimum percentage of their air time to certain programming types, such as local news shows, documentaries, panel discussions, station editorials and public service announcements.[55] Congressman Reuss introduced a bill to this effect in 1960, which would have required broadcasters to devote at least twenty percent of their programming, including one hour a night of prime time, to public service programs.[56] Such a proposal could create a vast increase in the diversity of programming, since it would alleviate commercial pressures on broadcasters to limit their efforts to bland, inoffensive programming with mass appeal.[57] Imposing a minimum public affairs programming standard on broadcasters seems appropriate, too, since they may be insulated from competitive challenges to their licenses, as proposed by the "Pastore bill."[58] The proposal has the advantage of being relatively easy to administer, since any station falling below the required minimum levels could be readily detected at renewal time. Licensees are already familiar with programming breakdowns similar to the kind that would accompany industry-wide minimums.[59] Furthermore, concrete standards for a station's obligations afford licensees a high degree of security for their investments.[60] [54] Report on Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, supra note 13, at par. 6.

---

On the average, less than ten percent of programming is devoted to news and public affairs. Stavins, Public Interest Old and New, in Institute of Policy Studies, TELEVISION TODAY: THE END OF COMMUNICATION AND THE DEATH OF COMMUNITY 72-73 (1969); see Oklahoma Case Study, supra note 9, at 12-13, 18.

[55] Jaffe, supra note 6, at 1701.

[56] H.R. 9549, 86th Cong., 2d Sess. (1960). "Public service programming" would be defined by a special committee in the Office of Education.

[57] "The serious side of life, controversial issues, racial problems, the information necessary to cope with the exigencies of the period are deemed too 'downbeat' (sad and gloomy) to attract viewers and leave them with a happy, bright image of the sponsor and his product." Barrow, Private Interest, in FREEDOM AND RESPONSIBILITY IN BROADCASTING 54 (J. Coons ed. 1961). One advertiser turned down a talented writer's script on the grounds he wanted "happy shows for happy people with happy problems." In the Matter of the Study of Radio and Television Broadcasting, FCC Docket No. 12782, Hearings, at 5558.

[58] S. 2004, 91st Cong., 1st Sess. (1969).

[59] Similar categories of "program types" are included in license renewal application forms. FCC Form 303, Section IV-A, p. 2.

But the industry-wide approach is not entirely rational or fair. Although a station may meet the minimum time standards, short of an exhaustive investigation into daily programming practices, there is no way for determining whether a broadcaster's treatment of public issues is robust or what the late A. J. Leibling disdained as "on-the-one-hand-this-on-the-other-hand-that" journalism.[61] Moreover, industry-wide time minima may fall most heavily on stations in rural areas, since often it is these licensees who have neither the artistic nor the pecuniary resources to support a high level of public service programming.[62]

An alternative approach would have the Commission consider in detail the programming practices of each licensee before granting renewal of his license.[63] Although this approach might avoid the problems of discrimination against poorer stations and self-serving but bland coverage of important issues, it suffers from the defects suggested earlier; viz, the lack of standards, staffing inadequacies and the censorial dangers inherent in full-blown government inspection of the content of speech by broadcasting.[64]

More by default than design, a third alternative to these polar approaches has recently been advanced. In United Church of Christ v.

---

[60] The economic dislocations resulting from unpredictable "lurches" in FCC decision-making are explored in Jaffe, supra note 6 passim.

[61] Leibling, THE PRESS (paper edition) at 226-39 (1961). Another solution that has been suggested to solve this problem is that members of the public have direct access to the media. Barron, Access to the Press–A New First Amendment Right, 80 HARV. L. REV. 1641 (1967); Barron, An Emerging First Amendment Right of Access to the Media?, 37 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 487 (1969). This view may be based on the doubt whether, even under the fidicuiary doctrine of Red Lion, the public should be entirely dependent on the judgment of broadcasters to determine whose voices are representative of the community. The fundamental right to speak to the public on matters of public concern should not be restricted to those advocates wealthy enough to purchase broadcasting time. Broadcasters could be required to offer a few hours a week free to members of the public, with speakers chosen by some nondiscretionary method such as a lottery.

[62] The problem has been thought to be particularly acute for marginally operated UHF stations. However, L. William White, general manager of a Boston station, observed that the burdens for reply time in both radio and television are nominal. According to White, a single part-time employee is placed in charge of handling the notification requirements on the frequent occasions when his stations editorialize. One letter is sent immediately after the broadcast, and another follow-up letter one week later. White also observed that public service programming apart from editorializing is expensive, however, involving as it does the expense of obtaining qualified news and program personnel and various technical equipment such as mobile cameras, etc. Interview with L. William White, November 20, 1969.

[63] The suggestion is advanced in Oklahoma Case Study, supra note 9, at 13-25.

[64] See pp. 89-90 supra.

F.C.C.,[65] the District of Columbia Circuit Court held that the Commission is compelled by its statutory authorization to require renewal candidates to shoulder the burden of proving that a renewal license is in the public interest. The decision reverses the traditionally insecure position of public interest representatives who oppose the interests of broadcasters. Noting that such representatives should not be treated as "interlopers" in a private sanctum, the Court declared:

> Rather, if analogues can be useful, a "Public Intervenor" who is seeking no license or private right is, in this context, more nearly like a complaining witness who presents evidence to police or a prosecutor whose duty it is to conduct an affirmative and objective investigation of all the facts and to pursue his prosecutorial or regulatory function if there is probable cause to believe a violation has occurred.[66]

Reliance on the complaints of the public may well provide a solution to the problem of how to detect a failure in affirmative performance of the fiduciary duty: the Commission may simply wait for alleged transgressions to be called to its attention. But this path also has its difficulties. However conscientious, no licensee is capable of satisfying every conceivable programming interest in his audience.[67] Some interests may be entirely idiosyncratic or insubstantial. In larger and more diverse metropolitan areas, licensees may as a practical matter be forced to choose among a variety of equally substantial programming interests. To revoke a license or deny renewal because a licensee wrongly guessed which interests he should consider paramount might lead to an undesirable instability of investment.

However, the Red Lion-RTNDA Court's promotion of the community proxy concept may offer an escape from this dilemma. The Court's declaration that broadcasters have a fiduciary duty "to present those views and voices which are representative" of their communities[68] is reminiscent of one of the most fundamental policies of the FCC: the encouragement of local program service. It was anticipated that by favoring a nation-wide system of low powered stations as opposed to a few super power facilities the industry would be made more responsive to the desires of each station's respective audience.[69] Localized minority viewpoints which might be overlooked in a regional audience would be more apparent to a broadcaster covering a smaller geographic area. The vision failed for a number of reasons, including the growth of national networks and the ascendance of advertisers as a major influence on programming decisions.[70] At bottom, however, the local service concept was allowed to falter on confusion over the identity or definition of the audience to be served by a given licensee. Thus, as Alexander Kendrick has recently observed, many stations have become beholden to commercial and political forces which bear no relationship to the station audience and which "may not be representative of the community as a whole, or consonant with its best interests."[71]

---

[65] 38 U.S.L.W. 2002 (D.C. Cir. June 20, 1969) (Burger, J.).

[66] Id.

[67] The United Church of Christ case involved easily identifiable racial and political programming interests. But other interests, especially those with limited influence, may be more difficult to identify. Cf. "The Limits of Technology," Address by former FCC Commissioner Lee Loevinger before the New Jersey Broadcasters Association Convention, Atlantic City, N.J., October 10, 1966 (it is unrealistic to expect technological advances to serve every programming desire.)

[68] 395 U.S. at 389.

[69] See, e.g., Courier-Post Publishing Co. v. F.C.C., 104 F.2d 213 (D.C. Cir. 1939).

The fiduciary principle of Red Lion–RTNDA suggests that the task before the FCC is not to divine what kinds of programming are consonant with those interests, but to develop administrative procedures which will allow those interests to assert themselves without at the same time threatening the stability of the industry.

III

The Commission already possesses what may prove to be the foundation for such a procedure. Applicants for a construction permit to commence broadcasting are now required to submit to the FCC evidence that they have undertaken to survey the needs of their local communities.[72] It is a rudimentary system at best, however, compromised principally by the haphazard nature of most surveys.[73]

But the scheme does suggest an appropriate line for further development. It might be refined to require from every applicant for a license: (1) a catalogue of the component programming interests he perceives in his community; (2) a declaration outlining which of these he proposes to serve as his programming "constituency"; (3) a reasonably specific description of what steps he will take to serve this constituency; and (4) an explanation why other interests were excluded. In this manner, the definitional problem involved in reducing multifarious communities to their component parts is left in the first instance to the broadcasters. If the definition is accepted by the FCC, the licensee can rely on the subsequent renewal of his license so long as the interests he has identified are adequately served.

Of course, inequities may arise from imperfectly conceived community surveys. The Commission recognizes this problem now, and has on occasion expressed a preference for one survey technique over another.[74] One important deterrent to poor surveys springs from the fact that many communities are served by more than one licensee. In these areas, marked differences in survey descriptions of community interests may warrant further inquiries. An additional check is available through the liberalized standing rules for public interest representatives.[75] Citizens who believe their interests are improperly excluded from a licensee constituency could seek inclusion through the hearing procedure. The effects of a decision that the constituency should be amended to include a new interest, moreover, presumably would be less shattering to a licensee than the loss of his license for failure to serve those interests in the past.

---

[70] See Advertising on Standard, FM, and Television Broadcast Stations, 36 F.C.C. 45 (1964); Television Factbook 55A (1966).

[71] Supra note 48, at 16.

[72] Policy Statement on Comparative Broadcast Hearings 1 F.C.C. 2d 393, 397 (1965).

[73] One station manager has reported that he "surveys" his community by "talking to" approximately 15 people a month to "see what they think." Interview with L. William White, supra note 59. See also City of Camden, 16 P & F Radio Reg. 2d 555 (1969).

The advantages of a system such as this one are several. It resolves the troublesome question of the "community" to which a broadcaster stands as a proxy;[76] it provides a measure of stability to ownership while at the same time increasing public influence over program content; it relieves much of the bureaucratic burden of the Commission by providing it with measureable standards for judging past performance records; and it maintains a desireable flexibility "geared to the situation in each community."[77]

Perhaps most important, the procedure would seem to mitigate the threat of government censorship. Rather than having to define the bounds of "good" programming in each given instance, the Commission is confronted only with the primary task of identifying the community interests to be served, a judgment more amenable to cognizable standards of proof and procedure.[78]

It should be noted, finally, that a practice similar to the one envisioned has been informally executed by the Commission in two recent renewal proceedings. In Texarkana, Texas, and Rochester, New York, television stations applying for renewal have appeared before the Commission with formal agreements hammered out between the station owners and members of their audiences. The policy agreements cover a surprisingly wide range of matters including, inter alia, the number of color cameras located in adjunctive studios, the use of the station to publicize the legal rights of the poor, the provision of toll-free telephones in some nearby cities to facilitate audience inquiries, the pledge to program regular local "live" programs involving participants from the service area and monthly meetings between the station management and representatives of the several constituent groups.[79] It remains to be seen whether these modest beginnings will lead to an institutionalized procedure for assuring that broadcasters discharge their fiduciary duties.[80] It remains to be seen whether the FCC will correct the present inequities in media access. But it is clear from the Red Lion decision that should the Commission neglect its duty, the courts will enforce it themselves, and in perhaps a more vigorous manner than the broadcasting industry would like.

---

[74] City of Camden, 16 P & F Radio Reg.2d 555 (1969); Viking Television 15 P & F Radio Reg.2d 954 (1969).

[75] Office of Communication of the United Church of Christ v. FCC, 359 F.2d 994 (D.C. Cir. 1966), after remand, United Church of Christ v. FCC, 38 U.S.L.W. 2002 (D.C. Cir. June 20, 1969).

[76] See, BROADCASTING, May 5, 1969, at 42 et seq.

[77] Jaffe, supra note 6 at 1701.

[78] Moreover, it might be noted that the Courts would thus be provided with a more rational basis for review. Inevitably, surveys seeking to ferret out all community programming interests will at least in part tend toward empirical research. Broadcast advertisers have already developed sophisticated means for plumbing the interests of television viewers in every market in the country, and it might be anticipated that the learning gained from these techniques could be applied to program, as opposed to product, interests with a minimum of difficulties. See, e.g., The American Research Bureau "Explanation of Survey Method and Sources" on the back page of any ARB Market Report.

—John C. Barrett

—Mary Louise Frampton

---

[79] Statement of Policy of Station KTAL-TV, Texarkana, Texas, Adopted as an Agreement with 12 Community Organizations of Texarkana and Filed at the FCC on June 9, 1969.

[80] We may be on the verge of a technological solution to the constitutional problem of television regulation. It is possible that such developments as community antenna television, satellite-to-home broadcasting, or "wired-city" TV will eliminate the scarce-frequency problem and so reduce the cost of transmission that the public can be assured of a wide variety of programming and of reasonable access by the citizen. See generally Note, The Federal Communications Commission and the Regulation of CATV, 43 N.Y.U. L. REV. 117 (1968); For a discussion of satellite technology generally see Johnson, New Technology and Its Effect on Use and Management of the Radio Spectrum, 1967 WASH. U.L.Q. 521 (1967); Barnett and Greenberg, A Proposal for Wired City Television, 1968 WASH. U.L.Q. 1 (1968). Analysis of these alternatives is beyond the scope of this comment. But there is disagreement over the number of channels such innovations might provide and the degree to which they can reduce costs. Some commentators suggest that even with a large number of channels there will continue to be a need for the "fairness doctrine" in its various aspects. E.g., Barrow, The Equal Opportunities and Fairness Doctrines of Broadcasting: Pillars in the Forum of Democracy, 37 U. CINCINNATI L. REV. 447, 490-93 (1968).

/Reprinted by permission. 26 The Public Interest 57
Winter 1972/

Is television news biased?

PAUL H. WEAVER

Is television news biased? That anyone alive today should debate this question, or even ask it, is at least paradoxical. The spirit of our age is the spirit of relativism—of the belief in the subjectivity of human consciousness, the parochialism of cultures and values, "doing your own thing," etc. In such an age, the proposition that TV news is biased should be about as controversial as the law of gravity. Yet the situation is otherwise, to put it mildly. The question is not only asked and debated; it has generated an intense controversy that now includes, in addition to the extremes of left and right, a small army of journalists and network executives, politicians across the spectrum, ethnic and interest groups, presidential commissions, and just about everyone else with political interest or ambition.

But in fact there is no contradiction in this. The very scale of the controversy, taken together with the triviality of the question, indicates that the issue has surely been misdefined. The real question is not: Are the media biased? They are, by definition and of necessity. The question is rather: How are the media biased, and what is the consequent effect on our interests and values? Of course, the matter is never put in these terms; the genius of American politics seems determined that we should frame it the other way, as if a perfectly unbiased or neutral mode of discourse were within the realm of human possibility. The result has been a hopeless muddling of the intellectual issue, and a needless intensification of the authentic political conflict which lies beneath it.

The question of legitimacy

It is not just an American innocence which has transformed a serious debate into the quixotic pursuit of a phantom called "unbiased news." There has been another, more specific cause. For the debate is not only a discussion of whether the media have power and how they use it; it is equally a dispute over the legitimacy of that power. Americans have no trouble believing that an individual may and should do everything within his power (and the law) to affect public discussion and shape public policy; that is his right as a citizen, as a participant in sovereignty, and thus as a source of legitimacy. But the mass media are not citizens or sovereigns. They are corporate entities, creatures of the state; they are elected by no one and are answerable only to themselves. Yet they possess far more power over our public life than does any individual. Then by what right do they exercise this power?

For the media, the question has long been a troubling one; in the context of the current controversy, which they see as a concerted partisan attack, it is downright embarrassing. Their temptation, in the circumstances, is to claim that they exercise no political power and therefore have no need to justify such power. But this line of argument is not very satisfactory, and they rarely use it—at least not for long. For one thing, to deny that they have power over public opinion is to deny that advertisers have any good reason to buy time or space from them. Moreover, as long as American journalists' self-proclaimed mission is to improve public opinion, they cannot very well claim that they have and seek no influence. Besides, any such claim would be met with utter disbelief. Hard as it has been for social science to measure the full range of media effects, the fact remains that the media, at least as selectors of information, possess a subtle but massive power to define the terms, issues, and especially the priorities of public discussion. Indeed, it is their possession and unavoidable use of this power, in the context of our growing national disagreement over the goals and priorities of public policy, which is the underlying reason for the existence of the entire controversy in the first place.

Sensibly enough, most journalists acknowledge the existence of their power and seek instead to defend its legitimacy on the ground of their "professional" and above all "fair" use of it to tell the news. By this they mean that their intention—and, in general, their achievement—is to give equal time, equal space, and equally considerate attention to all popular candidates and all popular views on all popular issues. The media recognize that this strategy will not protect them from the wrath of the political extremes, whose views and candidates they systematically ignore. But they do hope it will prevent them from offending the great majority, who presumably will see in the formula of "fairness" at least a rough approximation to "objectivity."

Yet the fact remains that even if the media were always "fair" by their own definition, they would not necessarily be unbiased in the larger sense. "Fairness" involves adhering to an accepted, professional mode of behavior; bias is a way of describing the effect of any activity ("fair" or not) on some value. The distinction is familiar enough in other connections. Judges and district attorneys may be "fair" in scrupulously following traditional rules; but the cumulative impact of their activities may be biased—against poor people, for instance. The media are capable of making this distinction about other institutions; but they do not acknowledge that this distinction applies to themselves. They defend their legitimacy by using "fairness" as a synonym for lack of bias. In consequence they perpetuate and—let us be candid about this—profit from a serious confusion of the real issue. Meanwhile, wrapped in the mantle of "fairness," the media indignantly rebuke their critics as "biased," "extremist," "self-seeking," "manipulative," or possessed of an irrational desire to punish the innocent messenger who bears a distasteful truth.

For the most part, the critics have been quick to accept this stealthy equation of "fairness" with lack of bias. For without the premise that an unbiased account is both possible and desirable, they have no very persuasive ground for complaint. To object to news coverage by thundering that it is "biased"—that is, clearly and intentionally misleading—is to use a powerful rhetoric; to say that it proceeds in such a way as to produce a misleading impression is rather less compelling. So the critics have been no less delighted than the media to confuse the issue. Neither have they been notably shy about finding dishonorable motives at work in any example of objectionable reportage or making broad charges on the basis of anecdotal or fragmentary evidence. Needless to say, the entire controversy has not been the most enlightening or admirable episode in the history of American public discussion, and the subject by now is long overdue for some serious study.

"TNT"

One could have hoped, therefore, that Edith Efron's The News Twisters (Nash, $7.95), published this fall, would have been recognized for what it is—a serious independent effort to measure what she takes to be the "fairness" of network television news, and thereby to shed the light of quantitative evidence on one important aspect of the debate. Alas, it generally has been recognized as no such thing, and both its supporters and detractors have quickly assimilated it to their own polemical purposes. This is a pity, for the book deserves more thoughtful attention than it has generally received so far—not so much because it is brilliant, or scholarly, or especially penetrating (it is none of these), but rather because it presents for the first time an extensive and tolerably reliable body of evidence on the content of television coverage of the presidential campaign in 1968. Properly interpreted, this evidence reveals a great deal about how television news is biased and thus about the direction of its influence on public opinion. Any book that illumines such matters deserves better than TNT (to use the publisher's provocative acronym) has received.

Miss Efron's procedure was indeed brilliant in its simplicity. She made a transcript of the three national networks' evening news programs during the final seven weeks of the 1968 campaign. She then went through these transcripts identifying and recording every sentence containing positive or negative opinion concerning the three presidential candidates and a list of issues she selected. (Within the news stories on the campaign, most sentences contained no such opinion and therefore were not recorded.) When this procedure was finished—the actual identification and classification of opinion required the formulation and systematic application of specific rules to cover problematic cases—she simply totalled the number of words of positive and negative opinion concerning each candidate and issue and entered these totals on graphs.

Concerning the candidates, the results were as follows: Humphrey received essentially "fair" coverage by all three networks (ABC had 4,200 words for him, 3,600 against; CBS, 2,400 for and 2,100 against; NBC, 1,900 for and 2,700 against). Wallace received tolerably "fair" coverage from two of the networks (CBS, 1,100 words for and 1,300 against; NBC, 1,000 for and 1,800 against) and pretty clearly "unfair" coverage from one network (ABC: 1,400 words for, 3,400 against). But the coverage of Nixon was something else altogether; on all three networks the pattern was one of extreme "unfairness," so much so that negative opinion on Nixon exceeded positive opinion by a factor of 10. (ABC, 900 words for and 7,500 words against; CBS, 300 words for, 5,300 words against; NBC, 400 words for, 4,200 against.) Miss Efron's study produced other findings—on coverage of the selected issues[1] and on the structure and rhetoric of "biased" news stories—but only those on the coverage of candidates merit the reader's close attention.

If it is true that the networks' coverage of Nixon was extraordinarily "unfair," and especially if this "unfairness" was deliberate or politically motivated, then Miss Efron has documented an authentic national scandal. Television, after all, is the primary source of news for a majority of Americans; the three network programs are almost the only source of national and international news on American television; and the networks possess their tight oligopoly over such news as a direct result of federal policy, federal regulation, and federal protection. If the networks are indeed seriously abusing their special powers—and Miss Efron's findings, if true, suggest an abuse of some magnitude—then there would seem to be a strong case for using the same public authority that now sustains the networks' oligopoly either to regulate their news programs more stringently, or else to destroy their oligopoly over national news altogether. One can imagine still other courses of action—but that is beside the point. What is to the point is that, by measuring the extent to which the networks, by their own standards, are performing "unfairly," and therefore illegitimately, Miss Efron's statistics inevitably raise a serious question of public policy, and with it the specter of government intervention.

---

[1] Although Miss Efron holds that her analysis of issue coverage reveals a pattern of leftward "bias," her findings are in fact inconclusive. With only one clear exception, the "issues" she chose to study are not issues in any ordinary sense of the term. Some were not discussed at all during the campaign; others were discussed, but all candidates took essentially the same position on them. In any case, most of her "issues" are not issues but political groups—liberals, conservatives, the white middle class, black militants, the left, demonstrators, and violent radicals. One problem here is that the groups as defined are not mutually exclusive. A more serious problem is that insofar as these groups were topics of discussion, they were not issues but symbols. People either find a symbol persuasive and take it seriously, or else they ignore it out of a preference for some different symbol. To measure the fairness of coverage of symbols, one would have to identify the different symbols of left, center, right, etc., and then measure their relative incidence. Miss Efron's procedure does not do this.

Method and magnitude

So it is hardly a surprise to discover that the book has aroused intense reactions along political lines, with conservatives strongly approving and liberals harshly negative. Aside from the fact that CBS, prior to the official publication date, issued a long memorandum "refuting" Miss Efron's content analysis, using two dozen examples (which are too few to be statistically capable of confirming or falsifying the study), what is interesting about this critical reception is not its direction or intensity but rather its focus. For it is the validity or invalidity of Miss Efron's numbers which has preoccupied the reviewers, both favorable and hostile. Nearly everyone has been prepared to believe that if the numbers are correct, then her conclusion—"that network coverage tends to be strongly biased in favor of the Democratic-liberal-left axis of opinion, and strongly biased against the Republican-conservative-right axis of opinion"—follows automatically. In fact, the only conclusion that follows automatically from her statistics (we are excluding the "non-findings" on issues) is that, whereas the amounts of negative and positive opinion on Humphrey and Wallace were roughly equal, negative opinion on Nixon vastly exceeded positive opinion. Now it is true that one way to describe and explain this pattern is to say that it reveals "bias for" Democrats and liberals and "bias against" Republicans and conservatives. But there are other—and, as we shall see, better—ways to account for the pattern. The point is that what statistics show and mean—even the relatively simple statistics in TNT—is always a complicated and elusive question of interpretation. Miss Efron's hostile reviewers have resolutely ignored this fact. Captivated by the notion that "fairness" is the same thing as lack of bias, and that any bias must automatically flow from "unfairness" on the part of individual journalists, they have busied themselves almost exclusively with her data and methods, as if it were on their validity alone that her conclusions stand or fall.

Of course, her method does deserve careful scrutiny—the data are no more reliable than the way they were gathered. What it has received so far is only inconclusive calumny. Some critics have objected to Miss Efron's decision to exclude from her analysis all pictures, most speeches by candidates, all stories about the results of public opinion polls and the question of whether there would be a Humphrey-Wallace-Nixon debate, and all non-narrative audio material (applause, shouts, random words or phrases from crowds, etc.). Now, although there are good reasons for excluding such material (it is, in various technical ways, especially hard to measure or categorize as pro or con), it is true that the exclusion may have affected the relative amounts of pro and con opinion on each candidate; but until it is shown that the exclusion did have such effects, there can be no decisive objection to this aspect of Miss Efron's procedure—especially since it seems more reasonable to suppose, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the excluded content (especially pictures) was pro and con in something like the same proportion as the analyzed content.

A more serious objection has been raised against Miss Efron's notion of what constitutes negative and positive opinion, especially concerning Nixon. (Most examples of questionable categorization adduced by critics concern the "issues"—but again, that part of her study is ill-conceived and should simply be ignored.) And here, it is true, Miss Efron appears to have some farfetched ideas. But there are three points to be made about this problem. First, my own inspection of two different samples of Miss Efron's file of anti-Nixon opinion convinces me that, by any reasonable standard, the large majority of such items are in fact quite clearly anti-Nixon opinion; no more than 20 or 30 per cent of the anti-Nixon items might be questioned. Nobody has shown that the proportion of questionable items is larger; indeed, so far critics have merely adduced a few extreme examples, as if these were enough to invalidate the entire study. And this brings me to the second point. What is significant about Miss Efron's findings is not the absolute numbers of words pro and con; it is the relative size of the two bodies of opinion. In order to invalidate the finding of a huge disparity between pro-Nixon and anti-Nixon opinion, it is not enough to show that some anti-Nixon opinion has been incorrectly classified—one must show that most of it has been incorrectly classified. Even if one were to find that she had overestimated the amount of anti-Nixon opinion by 100 per cent and underestimated the amount of pro-Nixon opinion by 50 per cent, there would still be 2.5 times more anti-Nixon opinion than pro-Nixon opinion, a clearly "unfair" pattern. Needless to say, nobody has yet established errors of this magnitude, and it seems unlikely that anyone will.

And this brings us to a final point. By ignoring the whole question of the magnitude of Miss Efron's errors, the critics seem to be arguing that any method which is in part uncertain is wholly invalid. This objection applies not only to Miss Efron's study but to every similar content analysis. For content analysis of this sort—consisting as it does in identifying opinion and classifying it as positive or negative—is inherently problematic because any definition of opin ion is problematic. Such content analysis is not invalidated when one discovers that some material that one personally considers neutral has been classified as pro or con opinion, or vice versa. It is invalidated only when procedures for identifying and classifying opinion are not followed systematically or when the procedures embody a wildly and uniformly unreasonable notion of opinion. Neither appears to be the case with Miss Efron's study. Of course, one is perfectly free to decide that any method that is so inherently arbitrary and uncertain should be abandoned altogether and its findings simply disregarded; some academic content analysts have done as much. But anyone who takes this view is also rejecting the entire notion of "fairness" in journalism. "Fairness" presupposes that opinion can be identified and categorized with reasonable accuracy and consistency; after all, what is a reporter who adheres to the formulae of "fairness" in writing a story doing but making an on-the-spot content analysis? Some critics' arguments have come dangerously close to denying not only the validity of Miss Efron's study but also the possibility of a "fair" (and therefore, by its own standards, legitimate) journalism. This latter, one feels sure, is not exactly what they have in mind.

Ultimately, the validity of the Efron study will not be definitively confirmed or falsified until someone undertakes a complete reanalysis of her transcripts. One can be fairly certain that when that happens, all her specific numbers will be revised, some of them substantially, but that the general pattern—at least concerning Nixon—will be confirmed. For quite apart from Miss Efron's book, there is ample evidence for believing that the networks' coverage of Nixon during the 1968 campaign was indeed substantially "unfair" in the sense that it presented much more negative than positive material about him, and that their coverage of Humphrey (and possibly also Wallace) was significantly less so. The question to be asked, then, is not whether this happened—very probably it did. The really interesting question is how and why it happened, and what it means.

Is a campaign an issue?

The intuitive reaction to Miss Efron's work is to conclude, as Miss Efron herself does, that the networks' coverage was clearly, even overwhelmingly, biased against Nixon. From there it seems but a short and logical step to the further conclusion that the cause of this slanted coverage must have been the personal political opinions of the network newsmen. As a group, after all, they are mostly liberals, and as liberals they have not only an innate dislike for Republicans and conservatives in general, but also the American liberal's special historical animus against Nixon in particular. So, on the face of the matter, it seems plausible to conclude that what Miss Efron has found is biased reporting by biased reporters animated solely by their bias—not a pretty picture in a democracy, implying as it does the systematic manipulation of public opinion by a powerful few for their own favored political ends.

But in this case, as in so many others, what seems intuitively obvious turns out, on closer inspection, to rest on assumptions that are not obviously true at all. For in describing the coverage of Nixon as "unfair"—and therefore "biased"—merely on the evidence of the relative amount of pro and con opinion, Miss Efron tacitly assumes that a national election is essentially an "issue" and that each candidate and his campaign represent a "side" of that issue. If this were the case, then "fair" campaign reporting would indeed consist, as Miss Efron supposes, in an equally lengthy and forceful description of each side's position in a way that advantages no side. But the principle of fairness she uses here is only one of two different "fairness" principles that journalists apply.

When they perceive the subject of one of their stories as an "issue"—something on which one "takes sides"—journalists do indeed apply this "equal treatment" test: They try to guarantee equality of textual results, so that their reportage confers no differential advantage or disadvantage upon any party to the dispute. On the other hand, the subject of a story may not be perceived as an issue or dispute at all. For instance, if a public official is caught with his hand in the till and subsequently is convicted for it, this event is not an "issue," even though the official may insist on his innocence. The journalistic report will necessarily contain a preponderance of negative opinion concerning the official. In this context, journalistic "fairness" would not demand that a reporter balance his story with some favorable item about the official, so that a reader's total impression would be of equal amounts of good and bad. The story would be unfair only if disadvantage were conferred through an arbitrary or deliberately inconsistent application of the established rules and routines of news reporting or through some falsification of the facts.

In short, where the story's subject is perceived not as an issue but as an event or action, the "equal treatment" criterion simply does not apply; under these circumstances, one is not justified in inferring "unfairness" from the presence of a preponderance of disadvantaging or advantaging content. "Unfairness" in these circumstances exists only where too much or too little disadvantage (or advantage) is conferred as a result of unsystematic or partial use of the conventional concepts and rules of news. Needless to say, it is next to impossible to demonstrate "unfairness" of this kind.

So the critical question for Miss Efron's conclusions is this: Did the television networks perceive the 1968 campaign as an issue? If they did, then both Miss Efron's data and her interpretation are conclusive; the networks stand condemned by their own standard of fairness, and one can only assume that the unfairness of their coverage reflects the newsmen's personal animus against Nixon. But if in fact the networks saw the campaign as something other than an issue, her findings are not so conclusive after all—at least not by the established traditions of American journalism and the FCC's Fairness Doctrine. Of course, one may still conclude from her data that Nixon (or for that matter Humphrey or Wallace) was treated unjustly or inadequately. But in this case the standard of justice or adequacy will be one's own, not the official or traditional journalistic one; the standard will have to be defended; and the explanation of the injustice or inadequacy of coverage will probably be found not in the reporters' personal opinions (which is how any deviation from professional news standards usually is explained), but rather in the established routines and concepts of gathering, selecting, and writing news (since it is almost certain that one's own standards will be different from those of the craft of journalism).

For several reasons, Miss Efron's interpretation—that the campaign was an issue, that the networks saw it as such, and that their actual coverage therefore was deliberately biased—seems unsatisfactory. First, anyone who watched the networks' coverage in 1968 could not help but notice their massive and almost single-minded concentration on those aspects of the campaign with only a most distant relation to the "issue" of who ought to be president—the physical events, human dramas, crowds, happenings, rallies, speeches, motorcades, balloons, etc., etc. Insofar as they saw the campaign in these terms, the "equal treatment" standard did not apply. In the second place, the networks were meticulously fair about giving the two major candidates almost exactly equal amounts of coverage. Thus, insofar as they did perceive the campaign as an issue—as a choice between two men—they did indeed adhere to an "equal treatment" standard of fairness. And this suggests in turn that where the networks' coverage did not meet the equal treatment test, the reason was simply that they saw the campaign not as an issue but as a series of events, actions, people, etc.; that they reported those events in accordance with the established definitions and formulae of "news"; and that any advantage or disadvantage thereby conferred on the candidates was the direct result of those definitions and formulae themselves. If so, then what Miss Efron's numbers measure is not bias against Nixon himself because of his personality, party, or opinions, but rather bias against someone like Nixon for reasons of his journalistically-defined situation and identity; and the cause of this bias is not the personal political sentiments of reporters—not their will to unfairness—but rather the nature of the television news form itself. In other words, what Nixon encountered in 1968 was not an essentially political bias, it was an essentially journalistic bias.

The television news form

To see how this is so, one must begin by appreciating the television news story as a form, which is most readily grasped by contrasting it to the form of the newspaper news story. In newspapers, the subject and focus of every story is an event, which is described in the headline and lead paragraph. The rest of the story, which elaborates upon the event according to an established routine of description (who, what, where, when, how, and why), is discursive almost to the point of formlessness; it ends simply by trailing off or, more often, by being arbitrarily cut off by an editor. The story is narrated in a highly impersonal manner; the reporter never directly reveals himself; and all statements are presented as impersonal statements of fact.

By contrast, a television news story cannot assume this discursive structure. Its principal need is for a clear, continuous narrative line sustained throughout the story—something with a beginning, a middle, and an end that will create, maintain, and if possible increase the viewer's interest (otherwise, he might switch to another channel). Because of this need, a television story cannot focus simply on an event and go on to describe serially its component parts; it needs instead a theme which can be sustained throughout the story. This focus on theme rather than event is symbolized by the role which the reporter assumes in television—no longer a self-effacing and impersonal figure, as in newspapers, but a highly visible and distinctive one whose personality and sustained presence are an additional device lending unity and intelligibility to the story. The focus on theme also determines the role of facts and simple events in the story: They no longer constitute the story's major interest, as in newspapers; they become instead the materials with which the chosen theme is illustrated.

These three elements and needs of the form—a suitable theme, a short and simple but continuous narrative, and the use of events as illustrative materials—powerfully affect the content of television news in various ways. For one thing, they endow television news with a strong preference for personifying and dramatizing, for representing institutions, situations, general developments, and the like, by means of the actions, predicaments, moods, or statements of individual people. And more generally, the form guarantees that the typical television news story will be far more interpretive than a newspaper news story. In a campaign, for example, whereas a newspaper will focus primarily on the events of a campaign—a rally here, a major address there—television coverage focuses not on events but on the general trends, situations, and dynamics of the campaign, which it illustrates with materials gathered at the events. Thus, the tendency of TV campaign reporting is to disregard the surface of events in preference for explaining what's really going on underneath. And this leads to a further consequence of the form: It tends to make TV campaign reporting much more repetitious and uniform, substantively, than newspaper reporting. For newspapers, a campaign story is different every day because it focuses on a different particular event, but television news stories change only as fast as the underlying campaign situation changes—if it changes at all. In 1968 it changed very little, as a result of which the themes of television news coverage were almost changeless and thus almost timeless. Only the illustrative materials changed, and on any given day not even these could be relied on to be uniformly up-to-the-minute.

So the content, and therefore the bias of television campaign coverage depend crucially on the nature of the recurrent story themes, and these in turn depend on how the network newsmen interpret what's "really" going on beneath the surface of events. Obviously, a very important factor in the newsman's interpretation is the actual situation and dynamics of the campaign itself and the personalities, histories, idiosyncrasies, etc., of the candidates. Yet there is in principle no end to the number of different ways one could define the situation, personalities, and so on, which means that newsmen must have some basis for selecting among the possibilities. They find that basis in the intellectual traditions and operational standards of the craft of journalism; these include as one of their central elements a narrow and distinctively journalistic model or theory of politics, one which defines not only politics in general but also the spirit and terms in which to describe political situations. This model is the second crucial factor shaping the themes of campaign stories, and its pervasive influence largely accounts for the networks' different treatment of the three candidates in 1968.

According to this model, which has been at the heart of American journalism for something approaching a century and a half, politics is essentially a game played by individual politicians for personal advancement, gain, or power. The game is a competitive one, and the players' principal activities are those of calculating and pursuing strategies designed to defeat competitors and to achieve their goals (usually election to public office). Of course, the game takes place against a backdrop of governmental institutions, public problems, policy debates, and the like, but these are noteworthy only insofar as they affect, or are used by, players in pursuit of the game's rewards. The game is played before an audience—the electorate—which controls most of the prizes, and players therefore constantly attempt to make a favorable impression. In consequence, there is an endemic tendency for players to exaggerate their good qualities and to minimize their bad ones, to be deceitful, to engage in hypocrisies, to manipulate appearances; though inevitable, these tendencies are bad tendencies according to the model and should be exposed. They reduce the electorate's ability to make its own discriminating choices, and they may hide players' infractions of the game's rules, such as those against corruption and lying.

Seen in terms of this model, then, every campaign has two faces. In one sense, it is a lively competition for public favor and office, and to this extent it is an exciting drama of men in pursuit of their goals—a spectacle that engages the empathy and emotions of the onlooker. But in a second sense, a campaign also is a drama of men trying to deceive and manipulate their audience and thus arouses in the onlooker feelings of contempt, indignation, or fear.

This traditional and distinctively journalistic model determined in almost every respect the way newsmen defined the situations and dynamics of the 1968 campaign, the way they defined the few simple recurrent themes which gave structure and focus to most campaign news stories, and therefore also the types and amounts of opinion contained in their reportage.

Themes of campaign coverage

The networks defined Humphrey's situation in the campaign as that of the underdog, and virtually all their news stories about him centered around the theme of "underdog." On this theme there were a number of variations. Particularly in the early weeks of the campaign, the theme was defined in terms of the sources of his underdog status—the disarray of the party after the Chicago convention, the disorganization and poverty of Humphrey's campaign, the candidate's close association with the person and policies of Lyndon Johnson, the candidate's garrulous and unconvincing effort to appear optimistic in the face of almost certain defeat, and, in general, the confusion and inefficacy of his entire campaign effort. A second variation, which began to develop toward the mid-point of the campaign, was that of the underdog confronting and beginning to overcome the causes of his underdog status. Here the focus was particularly on Humphrey's own efforts and achievements: the apparent break with Johnson symbolized by the Salt Lake City speech, the foray into the South ("Wallace country"), the frontal attack on both Wallace and Nixon ("Richard the Chicken-Hearted"), and the dramatic renewal of the candidate's confidence, enthusiasm, and charm. The third variation was that of the underdog gaining momentum and making dramatic progress toward a possible upset victory, as reflected in the reversal of the Wallace tide, the unification of the Democratic party around its candidate (yielding many endorsements, which of course counted as "pro" opinion in Miss Efron's study), the increase in campaign contributions, the candidate's steady progress in the public opinion polls, and, finally, the candidate's growing conviction that he would win.

This theme in its three variations was the cognitive underpinning of most network news stories on Humphrey and determined the selection and presentation of events, facts, etc. Especially because of the early opposition to Humphrey from the left, campaign reportage contained roughly equal amounts of favorable and unfavorable opinion; but the overall image of the underdog enthusiastically battling to overcome his predicament against great odds and coming within an inch of triumph was the central story—and an immensely appealing personal drama of rags-to-near-riches it was.

The networks defined Nixon's situation as that of the front runner—a big lead in the polls, an experienced campaigner with a well-organized campaign effort, large amounts of money, a unified party, in short, a player who needed only to hold onto his lead in order to win the game. On this theme there were three major variations. One emphasized the consequences of the candidate's position as front runner—the reasonable and statesmanlike role he could take, his ability to avoid political gut-fighting, his opportunity to make thoughtful speeches on subjects like the American spirit, East-West trade, and other such recondite matters, his reluctance to attack Humphrey and Wallace directly or at length, and the like. But if this variation of the front runner theme often proved favorable to Nixon, the other two variations did not. One of these, which found its way into a great many stories on Nixon, fixed attention on the characteristic problems of the front runner: how to maintain his lead and how to do it most effectively. This variation on the front runner theme, of course, focuses directly on the campaign as an exercise in the calculated, organized, well-funded manipulation of appearances and public opinion; and stories built around this theme emphasized the deliberateness, the lack of spontaneity, and the deceptiveness of all campaign events—the fact that behind every enthusiastic rally there are advance men at work creating and directing an audience; that in every public statement on some issue there lurks a tactical intelligence calculating what position will gain the most votes or lose the fewest, and so on. This theme accounted for much of the negative opinion on Nixon identified by Miss Efron's study.

Nixon was disproportionately the subject of this theme not only because of his front runner status but also because of the personal drama surrounding him in the last several weeks of the campaign. This constituted the third variation on the front runner theme: the psychological drama of the front runner facing the spectacle of his commanding lead dwindling day by day as Humphrey's fortunes rose. The stories built around this variation pictured Nixon, in contrast to the outgoing and enthusiastic "happy warrior" Humphrey, as an introspective man, calculating whether victory was again going to slip through his fingers and trying to avoid doing anything hasty or impetuous to invite that fate.[2] Here, too, the effect was to present an unfavorable image of the candidate.

In sum, while it is true that some of the anti-Nixon opinion in network coverage derived from Humphrey's and other Democrats' attacks on Nixon, a very large amount of it derived from the front runner theme, especially in its second and third variations. At least in the American democracy, to describe a man and his campaign in a way that calls attention to their manipulative intention is not exactly to flatter him.

---

[2] ABC provided the most extreme example of this kind of story while reporting a Nixon rally in Syracuse, New York. After an introduction, the reporter said: "You can almost feel him struggling with himself. 'Hold on, Richard. You've come so far and you're almost there. Don't blow it now.' . . . Well, that's difficult, especially when his natural instinct is to smash the enemy with a club or go after it with a meat axe. . . . Richard Nixon's most interesting and vital struggle is not with Hubert Humphrey or with George Wallace, but with himself." (ABC, 10/30/68)

The theme of most Wallace stories was that he not only reflected but also created division and violence wherever he went. As a result of the emphasis on division and conflict, these stories contained roughly equal amounts of pro-Wallace and anti-Wallace opinion; but the overall theme, it need hardly be pointed out, was scarcely neutral as to the essence of the Wallace phenomenon. Here too the theme was supplied by the journalistic model of politics, which discounts ideology and issues and prefers to focus attention on (among other things) a player's impact on the electorate—especially when that impact leads to incidents (e.g., a riot) that are eminently "televisable."

Humphrey the underdog, Nixon the front runner, and Wallace the sower of discord and violence—these were the central themes which the networks repeated day after day as they looked beneath the surface of events to plumb what really was happening in the campaign. The themes derive directly from an established and distinctively journalistic way of understanding politics, and the extraordinary power they exercised over the content of network coverage was a direct consequence of the peculiarities of the form of the television news story. The resulting pattern of coverage was far from neutral in its depiction of the various candidates; but although the effect of this non-neutrality was, or may have been, political, its cause appears to have been almost completely journalistic in nature. And so, at least in a narrow sense, the networks' indignant rejection of those who have charged them with "political bias" in reporting the 1968 campaign has some justification. It would appear that they were indeed merely reporting what they saw as the news fairly and impartially, and that if the news conferred advantage or disadvantage on any candidate, it did so primarily because of the inherent biases of television news as a distinctive form of discourse.

On the margins, it is true, the personal political opinions of the newsmen almost certainly influenced the content of television campaign coverage. The extremely favorable reporting on Muskie seems perhaps the clearest example of such influence, and the extraordinary frequency with which the manipulative aspect of the Nixon campaign was mentioned may well be another. Even beyond these examples, it is doubtless true that network newsmen could often take pleasure in their news stories' depiction of the various candidates, for the effects of these depictions were often in harmony with their liberal political sympathies. But influence on the margins is by no means the same thing as the power to control and shape. Granting this marginal influence to the reporters' sympathies takes nothing away from the overwhelming importance of the news form itself in determining the content—and biases—of the news.

The problem of news itself

To say that in the main the networks were indeed doing a professional and "fair" job of reporting the news of the 1968 campaign may lay to rest the charge of "political bias" as it has generally been formulated, but it does not at all resolve the larger issue of the news media: not whether they are biased, but rather how they are biased. Indeed, it only sharpens that issue. If a professional job of reporting often reinforced the entire thrust of the Humphrey campaign, often presented the Nixon effort in an extremely unflattering light, and saw in the Wallace phenomenon nothing but the seeds of violence, perhaps we should begin to worry about the adequacy of the professionals' notion of news itself. Obviously news itself, as conventionally defined by the journalistic profession, has its own structural biases. This means that insofar as we rely on news in forming our mental picture of what is going on in the world, what we are receiving is not a neutral body of information, but rather information gathered and presented to illustrate certain ways of seeing the world, based on certain values and favorable to certain courses of action. If so, one issue which arises immediately is that of legitimacy: By what right do the news media propagate their own distinctive vision, which is not entirely neutral as between different sorts of candidates, or different sorts of opinions? But that, I fear, is an insoluble question. Any body of knowledge possesses its biases. The only way to insure that every citizen truly is the master of his own opinions is to ban all media (not to speak of other opinion-forming institutions). But such an imposition of ignorance would exercise its own tyranny.

A more useful question to pose is: Which biases are we content to let journalism possess, and which do we insist that it avoid? This is a formulation which gives us some real choice. For it is by no means clear that television news in its current form represents an optimal combination of all the available and feasible biases. As an example, consider the model of politics as a game played for personal advantage, which informs and shapes nearly every story about political campaigning. To be sure, there is much to be said for reporting this facet of electioneering. It does exist, there is deceit and worse, and people should be aware of its excesses. But it is wildly misleading to look at a campaign and see nothing but this. A campaign to some extent always is an issue, and candidates usually do present some authentic choices about the style and direction of public policy and national leadership. To ignore or minimize the serious issues implicit (and sometimes explicit) in a campaign is to deny citizens the information and analysis they need in order to make a rational decision about how to exercise their suffrage in the manner most likely to promote their own vision of how our public life should be ordered.

Nor is that the only cost of the news form as it exists today. For in its denial of the "issue" aspect of campaigning and in its cynical preoccupation with the deceptive and manipulative aspects of politics, it subtly but powerfully suggests to citizens a posture of detachment (at best) or cynical rejection (at worst) toward the political institutions of the nation. In the long run this can only weaken their capacity to perform the services which that very detachment or rejection posits as desirable.

However reassuring it may be to know that the biases of television news more often than not have their origin in the news form rather than in reporters' personal opinions, it is disconcerting in the extreme to discover, when one examines that form, how frivolous, mean-spirited, and intellectually impoverished a form it is. It clearly would be desirable for reporters to see more themes, developments, and phenomena in the campaigns and other events they cover. Thus, what is needed is a pluralizing of the themes of "stories," and an expansion and improvement of the "vocabulary" of the television reporter and editor. Perhaps the current controversy will convince the networks of the utility, and possibly even the merit, of this kind of self-reform. In any case, this is not the sort of reform which Congress or the FCC can undertake, or even stimulate; government intervention would be almost certain to make things worse. For what is required is not some new law; it is instead an enlargement of the journalistic imagination and an expansion of the journalists' vision. This is not to say that newsmen should try to become social scientists or political theorists—if they tried they would probably fail, and besides, there is much of value to be learned from a uniquely journalistic view of the world. Only journalists can decide what this view is to be; but to do so intelligently they must face up to the fact that no form is without bias, and that the biases of the current news form clearly are less than optimal.

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
CONGRESSIONAL RESEARCH SERVICE
Washington, D.C.

SELECTED BIBLIOGRAPHY OF WORKS RELEVANT TO A CONSIDERATION OF FIRST AMENDMENT ISSUES RAISED BY GOVERNMENT REGULATION OF COMMUNICATIONS MEDIA CONTENT WITH SPECIAL EMPHASIS ON THE BROADCAST MEDIA

Note: Because of the changing judicial interpretation of First Amendment requirements in the area under consideration, the material is arranged chronologically by year so that the works referred to can be considered in the context of the changing judicial climate. Also, the emphasis is on works published in the last decade although some references to earlier works are included for background information.

There are some subtopics to which few references, if any, are made although they may be relevant to a discussion of the effect of the First Amendment on the communications media. Examples of subtopics not included are works which discuss the conflict between the government seeking to force a reporter to reveal the source of his information and the reporter attempting to keep the sources secret and, to give another example, the conflict which may arise in attempts by the press to keep the public informed about a court trial and the efforts of the government to insure that the trial will not be unfairly prejudiced by publicity.

Also not included are references to Congressional material such as hearings, reports, etc.

1927:

The Radio Act of 1927 (Davis), 13 Va. L. Rev. 611 (1927).

1931:

Indirect Censorship of Radio Programs, 40 Yale L. J. 967 (1931).

1936:

Communication Act—§315—Censorship—Equal Facilities for Political Candidates, 7 Air. L. Rev. 313 (1936).

1943:

(Books):

Robinson, T., Radio Networks and the Federal Government (1943).

1946:

(Books):

Ernst, M. The First Freedom (1946).

1947:

Mill, J., On Liberty (R. McCallum ed 1947)
Chafee, Z., Government and Mass Communications (1947).

1951:

Governmental Regulation of Program Content of Television Broadcasting, 19 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 312 (1951).

1953:

Liability of Station Owners for Defamatory Statements Made by Political Candidates, 39 Va. L. Rev. 303 (1953).

1952:

Campaign Speeches on Radio and TV; Impartiality via the Communications Act, 61 Yale L. J. 87 (1952).

1956:

(Books)

Siebert, Fred S., Theodore Peterson, and Wilbur Schramm. Four Theories of the Press, (Urbana: U. of Ill. Press, 1956).

1957:

(Books):

Schramm, Wilbur (ed.). Responsibility in Mass Communication (New York: Harper and Brothers, 1957).

1958:

Television, Politics and Public Policy (Thomson), 8 Public Policy 368 (1958).
(Articles Other Than Law Review Articles):
Newspaper "Gatekeepers" and the Source of News, (Carter) Public Opinion Quarterly, 22 (1958): 133–144.
Political Campaigns and the Broadcaster (Salant), 8 Public Policy 337 (1958)

1959:

Censorship of Defamation in Political Broadcasts: The Port Huron Doctrine, 34 N.Y.U.L. Rev. 127 (1959).
The Federal Communications Commission (Coase), 1959 J. Law and Economics 1.
The Impact of Federal Regulation of Political Broadcasting: Sec. 315 of the Communications Act, (Friendenthal & Medalie), 72 Harv. L. Rev. 445 (1959).

(Books):

Carter, Douglas. The Fourth Branch of Government (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co., 1959).

1960:

Equal Time for Candidates: Fairness or Frustration? (Erbst), 34 So. Cal. L. Rev. 190 (1960–1).
Radio and Television Appearances of Candidates for Office, 69 Yale L. J. 805 (1960).
(Articles Other Than Law Review Articles):
Wiggins, J.R. The Power and Responsibility of the Press, Journalism Quarterly, 37 (1960): 29–34.
Wright, Charles R. Functional Analysis of Mass Communication, Public Opinion Quarterly, 24 (1960): 605–620.

(Books)

Klapper, Joseph T. The Effects of Mass Communication (Glencoe, Ill: Free Press of Glencoe, 1960).

1961:

The Federal Communications Commission's Fairness Doctrine: An Evaluation. (Barron), 30 Geo. Wash. L. R. (1961).

(Books):

Coons, J. (ed.). Freedom and Responsibility in Broadcasting (1961).
Emery, W. Broadcasting and Government: Responsibilities and Regulations (Michigan State U. Press 1961).
Lacy, D., Freedom and Communications (1961).

1962:

The Federal Communications Commission and Program Regulation—Violation of the First Amendment, 41 Neb. L. Rev. 826 (1962).
(Articles Other Than Law Review Articles):
Has Television Reshaped Politics (Campbell) Columbia J. Rev. Vol. 1, Fall 1962 pp. 1013.

1963

Federal Occupation of Political Defamation (Harum), 49 ABAJ 1096 (November 1963).

(Books):

Cohen, Bernard C. The Press and Foreign Policy (Princeton U. Press, 1963).
Gerald, J. Edward. The Social Responsibility of the Press (Minneapolis: U. of Minn. Press, 1963).

1964:

Editorials and Controversy: The Broadcaster's Dilemma (Sullivan), 32 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 719.
Equality, Fairness and 315: The Frustration of Democratic Politics (Blaine), 24 Md. L. Rev. 166 (1964).
Regulation of Program Content by FCC, 77 Harv. L. Rev. 701 (1964).
(Articles Other Than Law Review Articles):
Political Party Use of Radio and Television for the 1960 Campaigns (Dreyer), Journal of Broadcasting Vol. 8 Summer 1964, pp. 211–28.
The Political Use of Television (Kraus), Journal of Broadcasting Vol. 8, Summer 1964, pp. 211–28.

(Books):

Dexter, Lewis A., and David M. White (eds.). People, Society and Mass Communications (New York: Free Press of Glencoe, 1964).

1965:

(Articles Other Than Law Review Articles)
Brucker, Herbert, Mass Man and Mass Media, Saturday Review, May 29, 1965 pp. 14–16, 44.

(Books):

Brant, Irving, The Bill of Rights (Bobbs-Merrill Co., Inc. 1965).

1966:

The Attainment of Balanced Program Service in Television (Barrow), 52 Va. L. Rev. 633 (1966).
Church of Christ: Standing and the Evidenciary Hearings, (Singer), 55 Geo. L. J. 264 (1966).
Political Broadcasting: The Communications Act of 1934 Reviewed, (Dean) 20 Fed. Comm. B. J. 16 (1966).
Section 315: Analysis and Proposal (Derby), 3 Harv. L. Legis. 257 (1966).

(Books):

Ferry, W. H. and Harry S. Ashmore. Mass Communications. (Santa Barbara, Calif., Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions 1966).
Gross, Gerald (ed). The Responsibility of the Press (New York: Fleet Publ Corp., 1966).
Lord Windlesham, Communication and Political Power, (Johanathan Cape, London, 1966).

1967:

Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right (Barron), 80 Harv. L. Rev. 1641 (1967).
Administrative Law—FCC Fairness Doctrine—Applicability to Advertising, 53 Ia., L. Rev. 480 (1967).
Broadcast Defamation: A Reformation of the Common Law Concepts (Harum), 21 Fed. Com. B. J. 73 (1967).
Broadcasting, Public Policy and the First Amendment (Kalvern), 10 J. of Law and Economics 15 (Oct. 1967).
Constitutional Balance Between Fair Trials and Free Press (Rawlings), 17 Drake L. Rev. 1 (1967).
Do We Really Need a Federal Department of Telecommunications? (Doyle), 21 Fed. Com. B. J. 3 (1967).
"Fairness" and the FCC (Cahill), 21 Fed. Com. B. J. 17 (1967).
The FCC and Equal Time: Never-Neverland Revisited (Singer), 27 Md. L. Rev. 221 (1967).
FCC Fairness Doctrine—Applicability to Advertising, 53 Iowa L. Rev. 480 (1967).
The FCC and the First Amendment: Observations on 40 Years of Radio and Television Regulation (Robinson), 52 Minn. L. Rev. 67 (1967).
Federal State, and Local Regulation of CATV—After You (Alphonse) 29 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 109 (1967).
Free Speech for Mustangs and Mavericks (Pollitt) 46 NCL Rev. 39 (1967).

Press, Privacy and "Public" Figures—A Symposium. Introduction. (Dowd); The New York Times Rule: Judicial Overkill (Green); Newsmen and the Times Doctrine (Nelson); The Right to Know: Fair Comment—Twentieth Century (Hanson), 12 Vill. L. Rev. 725 (1967).

Right to A Forum (Gorlick), 71 Dick. L. Rev. 273 (1967).

(Articles Other Than Law Review Articles):

Bagdikian, Ben H. The American Newspaper is Neither Record, Mirror, Journal, Ledger, Bulletin, Telegram, Examiner, Register, Chronicle, Gazette, Observer, Monitor, Transcript Nor Herald of the Day's Events, Esquire, March 1967: 124–30, 138–46.

(Books):

Medina, Judge Harold R. Chairman, Special Committee on Radio, Television, and the Administration of Justice of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, Freedom of the Press and Fair Trial (New York: Columbia U. Press, 1967).

Rubin, Bernard, Political Television (Belmont, Calif. Wadsworth Publ Co. 1967).

Westin, Alan F. Privacy and Freedom (New York: Anthenum, 1967).

Wood, W., Electronic Journalism (1967).

1968:

Antitrust and Monopoly Policy in the Communications Industries: A Symposium. Antitrust and Monopoly Policy in the Communications Industries (Rowe); The Role of Antitrust Policy in the Communications Industries (Rowe); The Role of Antitrust Policy in the Communications Industry (Turner); Harnessing Revolution: The Role Of Regulation and Competition for the Communications Industries of Tomorrow (Johnson); Monopoly and Competition Issues Facing the Communications Industries (Moulton); The Role of Competition and Monopoly in the Communications Industries (Hyde); Competition in and Among the Broadcasting CATV and Pay-TV Industries (Cox); Mergers and Diversification in the Newspaper, Broadcasting and Information Industries (Mahaffie); The Role of Spectrum Allocation in Monopoly or Competition in Communications (Dingell); Competition and Monopoly Policies in Domestic Satellite Communications (Geller); Competition Problems in International Communications (Acheson); The Congressional Perspective of Competition in the Communications Industries (Hart); The Limits of a Regulated Monopoly-Telephone Attachments Interconnection, and Use of Circuits (Kestenbaum); Competition and Monopoly in the Computer and Data Transmission Industries (Strassburg), 13 Antitrust Bull. 871 (Fall 1968).

Candidate Broadcast Time: A Proposal For Section 315 of the Communications Act (Scott), 56 Geo. L. J. 1037 (1968).

Caution: Cigarette Commercials May Be Hazardous to Your License—The New Aspect of Fairness (Leventhal), 22 Fed. Co. B. J. 55 (1968).

Constitutional Law—Freedom of Speech—Federal Communications Commission's Fairness Doctrine Is Constitutional, 13 Vill. L. Rev. 393 (1968).

In Defense of "Fairness": A First Amendment Rationale for Broadcasting's "Fairness Doctrine," (Barron) 37 U. Colo. L. Rev. 447 (1968).

Equal Opportunities and Fairness Doctrines in Broadcasting: Pillars in the Forum of Democracy (Barrow), 37 U. Cinn. L. Rev. 447 (1968).

Equal Time for Political Candidates. 23 NYU Intra. L. Rev. 266 (1968).

Fairness Doctrine, Equal Time, Reply to Personal Attacks and the Local Service Obligation: Implications of Technological Change (Jaffe), 37 U. Cinn. L. Rev. 550 (1968).

Fairness Doctrine: Personal Attacks and Public Controversies: Red Lion B/cing v. FCC, 381 F. 2d 908, 56 Geo. L.R. 547 (1968).

Freedom of the Press. The Rights of the Individual—A Continuing Controversy, (Oglesby), 47 Ore. L. Rev. 132 (1968).

Historical Rationale of the Speech-and-Press Clause of the First Amendment (Richards). 21 U. Fla. L. Rev. 203 (1968).

How Millions Learned About the New Laws on Radio and Television (Martin) 56 Ill. B. J. 372 (1968).

Media Injuries to Personality: An Essay on Legal Regulation of Public Communication (Shapo), 46 Tex. L. Rev. 650 (1968).

Palace of Humbug—A Study of FCC Policies Relating to Group Ownership of Television Stations (Trask), 22 Fed. Com. B. J. 185 (1968).
Red Lion Case (381 F. 2d 908): An Opportunity for First Amendment Reappraisal, 29 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 691 (1968).
Television And Advertising (Blalock) 28 Fed. B. J. 341 (Autumn 1968).
Television Service and the FCC, 46 Tex. L. Rev. 1100 (1968).
TPU Incident and Local Newspaper Coverage (Gillespie) 6 Houston L. Rev. 376 (1968).
"Uninhibited, Robust, and Wide-Open"—A Note on Free Speech and the Warren Court (Kalven), 67 Mich. L. Rev. 289 (1968).
Warren Court and the Press (MacKenzie), 67 Mich. L. Rev. 303 (1968).
(Articles Other Than Law Review Articles):
The Impact of Mass Communications (Clark) The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, July 1968, pp. 68–74.
Politics and People: The Tenors of Television (In Presidential Campaigning) (Otten) Wall St. J. Feb. 15, 1968, p. 16.

(Books):

Grey, David L. The Supreme Court and the News Media (Northwestern U. Press 1968).
Lang, Kurt and Gladys, Politics And Television (Chicago, Quadrangle Books, 1968).
MacNed, Robert, The People Machine: The Influence of Television on American Politics (N.Y. Harper & Row 1968).
Perry, James Moorhead. The New Politics: The Expounding Technology of Political Manipulation (Clarkson N. Patter, Inc. 1968).
Wyckoff, Gene, The Image Candidates: American Politics In the Age of Television, (N.Y. Macmillan 1968).
(Other Material):
Jaffe, Louis, The Fairness Doctrine, Equal Time, Reply to Personal Attacks, and the Local Service Obligation; Implications of Technological Change. Printed for Special Subcommittee on Investigations of House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce (1968).
National Association of Broadcasters. Legal Dept. Political Broadcast Catechism and the Fairness Doctrine. 6th Ed. Wash., 1968.

1969:

Annotated Bibliography of Articles on Broadcasting Law and Regulation In Law Periodicals, 1920–1955 (Cooney), 23 Fed. Com. B.J. 83 1969 (Pt. 2).
A Bibliography of Articles About Broadcasting in Law Periodicals, 1956–1968 (Gompertz), 23 Fed. Com. B.J. 83, 85 Table I (No. 3, pt. 2) 1969.
Calculated Misstatements of Fact Not Protected by First Amendment Guarantees of Free Speech and Press, 1969 Utah L. Rev. 118 (Jan. 1969).
Communications and Politics: The Media and the Message (Alexander), 34 Law & Contemp. Prob. 255 (1969).
Communications: A Symposium. Foreword (Havighurst); Communications Technology—A Forecast of Change (Barrow & Manelli); On the Impact of the New Communications Media Upon Social Values (Baran); Communications and Politics: The Media and the Message (Alexander); Free Speech, Fairness and Fiduciary Duty in Broadcasting (Loevinger); Common Carrier Regulation—The Silent Crisis (Trebing); Econometrics and Applied Economic Analysis in Regulatory Decisions (Nelson); The Early Competitive Era in Telephone Communication (1893–1920) (Gabel); Computers and Communications: The Economics of Interdependence (Irwin); Policy Issues Presented by the Interdependence of Computer and Communications Services (Dunn); International Telecommunications: Dynamics of Regulation of a Rapidly Expanding Service (Ende); International Communications: What Shape to Come? (Ashley); 34 Law & Contemp. Prob. 204 (1969).
Conflicts of Interest in News Broadcasting, 69 Colum. L. Rev. 881 (1969).
Congress, The Court and the Commissioners: A Legacy of Fortnightly (88 Sup. Ct. 2084) (Lipper), 44 NYU L. Rev. 521 (1969).
Constitutional Law—Fairness Doctrine—FCC's Formal Rules Concerning Personal Attacks and Political Editorials Contravene the First Amendment, 44 Notre Dame Law 447 (1969).

Diversification in Communication: The FCC and Its Failing Standards, 1969 Utah L. Rev. 494 (1969).

Duty of Newspapers to Accept Political Advertising—An Attack on Tradition, 44 Ind. L. J. 222 (Winter 1969).

Federal Communications Commission and Cigarette Advertising. 19 Catholic 255 (1969).

The FCC's Fairness Regulations: A First Step Towards Creation of a Right to Access to the Mass Media, 54 Cornell L. Rev. 294 (1969).

The FCC's Role in Television Programming Regulation—A Symposium. Introduction (Frankino); The FCC Role in Television Programming Regulation (Cox); Program Control and the FCC (A Limited Role) (Fisher); The FCC's Role In TV Programming Regulation (Barker); The FCC's Role In Television Programming Regulation—Panel Discussion. 14 Vill. L. Rev. 581 (1969).

Fifty Years of "Clear and Present Danger" from Schenck to Bradenburg—And Beyond (Strong), 1969 Sup. Ct. Rev. 41 (1969).

First Amendment Right to a Public Forum (Horning), 1969 Duke L. J. 931 (1969).

Free Speech, Fairness and Fiduciary Duty in Broadcasting (Loevinger) 34 Law & Contemp. Prob. 278 (1969).

Is the Right to Lie Protected by the First Amendment? (Cohen), 3 J. Beverly Hills BA 10 (January 1969).

Memorandum on the First Amendment Issues Involved in Red Lion B/cing Co. v. FCC (381 F. 2d 908) and News Directors Ass. v. FCC (400 F. 2d 1082), 43 Conn. B.J. 517 (S. 1969).

Program Control (Jaffe), 14 Vill. L. Rev. 619 (1969).

Radio Spectrum Regulation: The Administrative Process and the Problems of Institutional Reform (Robinson), 53 Minn. L. Rev. 1179 (1969).

Red Lion v. FCC and the Fairness Doctrine: Regulation of Broadcasting "In the Public Interest," 11 Ariz. L. Rev. 807 (1969).

Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC: Fairness and the Emperor's New Clothes (Blake), 23 Fed. Com. B. J. 75 (1969).

Resolving the Free Speech-Free Press Dichotomy: Access to the Press Through Advertising, 22 U. Fla. L. Rev. 293 (1969).

Talk Shows About World Peace (Whipple), 55 ABA J 1060 (1969).

Toward A Workable Definition of Free Speech: A Symposium on the Nature and Scope of the Constitutional Guarantee of Freedom of Expression; Prospectus to Free Speech; Its Role in Modern Society; Freedom of Speech and the Communist Conspiracy: A Search for First Amendment Standards; Black Militancy: A Clear and Present Danger?; The Dissenter and Government Employment; Obscenity: A Matter of Individual Conscience. 47 J. Urban L. 395 (1969–1970).

WHDH: The FCC and Broadcasting License Renewals (Jaffe), 82 Harv. L. Rev. 1693 (1969).

(Articles Other Than Law Review Articles)

Are the Media Ready for the Seventies? 8 Columbia J. Rev. 7 (1969–70).

American Institute for Political Communication, Evolution of Public Attitudes Toward the Mass Media During An Election Year; A Report Based on In-Depth Study of Voter Behavior Carried Out Over a Nine Month Period in 1968 in the Milwaukee Area (Washington, 1969).

U.S. Federal Communications Commission Survey of Political Broadcasting: Primary and General Election Campaigns of 1968 (Washington, 1969).

(Books):

Blumler, G. & McQuail, Television In Politics (U. Chicago Press, 1969).

Chester, E. Radio, Television and American Politics, (New York, Sheed and Ward, 1969).

Emerson, Thomas I. The System of Freedom of Expression (New York: Random House, 1969).

Gillmor, Donald M. Mass Communications Law: Cases and Comment (1969).

Hanson, Arthur B. Libel and Related Torts (New York: The American Newspaper Publishers Ass. Foundation, Inc. 1969), 2 vols. [see especially vol. 1].

McGinnis, Joe. The Selling of the President 1968, (NY Trident Press, 1969).

Whale, John. The Half-Shut Eye: Television and Politics in Britain and America (N.Y. St. Martin's Press, 1969).

1970:

Access—The Only Choice for the Media? (Barron); Right of Access to Mass Media—Government Obligation to Enforce First Amendment? (Daniel), 48 Tex. L. Rev. 766 (1970).

Administrative Law—The FCC's Fairness Doctrine and the First Amendment, 19 J. Pub. L. 129 (1970).

Broadcasting and Censorship: First Amendment Theory after Red Lion (Marks), 38 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 974 (1970).

"Clear and Present Danger" Reexamined: Dissonance On the Brandenburg Concerto 22 Stanford L. Rev. 1163 (June 1970).

Communications—Fairness Doctrine Does Not Require Regular Presentation of Antipollution Announcements 24 Vand. L. Rev. 131 (1970).

Competition, Diversity, and the Television Group Ownership Rule (Levin), 70 Colum. L. Rev. 79 (May 1970).

Constitutional Law: The Right of Access to the Press, 50 Neb. L. Rev. 120 (Duchek) (Fall, 1970).

Fairness Doctrine: Television as a Marketplace of Ideas, 45 NYU L. Rev. 1222 (1970).

Federal Regulations of Cable Television: The Visible Hand (Chasen & Ross) 83 Harv. L. Rev. 1820 (1970).

FCC and the Fairness Doctrine (Zack) 19 Clev. St. L. R. 579 (Sept. 1970).

FCC's Requirement of Reply to Personal Attack: The Bite in Red Lion, 37 Tenn. L. Rev. 383 (1970).

Free Speech on Private Property (Silver), 19 Clev. St. L. Rev. 372 (1970).

Freedom of the Press and the Alien and Sedition Laws: A Reappraisal (Berns), 1970 Sup. Ct. Rev. 109 (1970).

From the FCC's Fairness Doctrine to Red Lion's Fiduciary Principle, 5 Harv. Civil Rights L. Rev. 89 (January 1970).

Frontiers of Fairness in Broadcasting 22 S.C.L. Rev. 208 (1970).

Implications of the Extension of the Fairness Doctrine to Editorial Expressions Implied in Commercial Advertising. 34 Albany L. Rev. 452 (Winter 1970).

The Listeners Right to Hear in Broadcasting, 22 Stan. L. Rev. 863 (1970).

Maine's Educational Television Network: Legal Difficulties, 22 Maine L. Rev. 239 (1970).

Media Concentration: Some Observations on the United States' Experience (Johnson and Hoak), 56 La. L. Rev. 267 (Dec. 1970).

Judicial Review of FCC Decisions, 1969–1970, (Swift), 24 Fed. Com. B. J. 86 (1970–71).

Law and the Free Society Lectures (Barron), 48 Tex. L. Rev. 766 (1970).

Medium, The Message and the First Amendment (Kaufman) 45 NYUL Rev. 761 (October 1970).

Monopoly Newspapers: Troubles in Paradise, 7 San Diego L. Rev. 268 (May 1970).

Offensive Speech and the FCC, 79 Yale L.J. 1343 (1970).

Opening Up the Media (Barron), 6 Trial 37 (Ap/May 1970).

Press and First Amendment Rights (Douglas), 7 Idaho L. Rev. 1 (Spring 1970).

"Public Interest." "Fairness" and the First Amendment: A Broadcasters Dilemma, 4 Suffolk U. L. Rev. 509 (Winter 1970).

Public Domain and the Right of Access: Effect Upon the Broadcast Media, 3 Loyola U. L. Rev. (LA) 451 (April 1970).

Public Participation in License Renewals and the Public Interest Standard of the FCC, 1970 Utah L. Rev. 461 (June 1970).

Radio and Television—Fairness Doctrine—Automobile and Gasoline Commercials Do Not Raise an Issue of Public Importance to Require Equal Time for Rebuttal Under the Fairness Doctrine, 39 U. Cinn. L. Rev. 766 (Fall 1970).

Red Lion B/cing Co. Inc. v. FCC Extension of the Fairness Doctrine to Include Right to Access to the Press, 15 S.D.L. Rev. 172 (Winter 1970).

Symposium: New Problems of the Mass Media. Introduction (Zuckman); Regulation of Broadcast Networks (Bryant); The Avoidance of Offense: Observations on the Matter of Broadcast Censorship (Toohey); The President, the Fairness Doctrine, and Political Access to the Broadcast Media (Drabelle & Taylor); The Federal Communications Commission's License Renewal Policies—A Turn of Events, Some Unanswered Questions, and a Proposal (Tish); The KWJ Case: A History and Analysis; Movie Censorship: A Public and Private Concern; The Newsman's Privelege: Protection of Confidential Sources of Information Against Government Subpoenas, 15 St. Louis U. Law J. 1 (Fall 1970).

Television: The Public Interest in License Renewals, 20 Catholic U. L. Rev. 238 (Winter 1970).

Television Formats—The Search for Protection. 58 Calif. L. Rev. 1169 (October 1970).

Texarkana Agreement as a Model Strategy For Citizen Participation in FCC License Renewals. 7 Harv. J. Legis. 627 (May 1970).

Wasteland Revisited: A Modest Attack Upon the FCC's Category System, 17 UCLA L. Rev. 868 (March 1970).

We Pick 'Em, You Watch 'Em: First Amendment Rights of Television Viewers, 43 So. Calif. L. Rev. 826 (1970).

(Articles Other Than Law Review Articles):

Amateur Hour? Barrons v. 50, Sept. 7, 1970: 11, 13, 15.

Big Money, Talent and Effort Devoted to Politicking on Television, National Journal, v. 2, Oct. 3, 1970: 2135–2144.

Communicating With the Communicators, Public Management, v. 52, December 1970: 2–19.

Dean Birch Watches Television (Drew), Washington Monthly, v. 2 May, 1970: 69–80.

Demand Forecasting Models of International Telecommunications and Their Policy Implications (Lago), J. of Industrial Economics, v. 24, Nov. 1970: 6–21.

Electronic Politics: The Image Game, Time, v. 96. Sept. 21, 1970: 43–44, 47–48.

Institutions for Allocating the Radio-TV Spectrum and the Vested Interests. J. of Economic Issues (French) v. 4, December 1970: 23–37.

Is "Right of Access" Coming? (Cranberg), Saturday Review, Aug. 8, 1970: 48–49, 57.

Preference Among News Media For Coverage of Public Affairs (Clarke), 47 Journalism Quarterly 464 (Autumn 1970).

The Radio and Television Codes and the Public Interest (Helffrich), Journal of Broadcasting, v. 14, Summer 1970: 267–274.

A Selected Bibliography of Works on the Federal Communications Commission. 1967–1969 Supplement. (Sperry) Journal of Broadcasting v. 14, Summer 1970: 37–389.

The Wasteland Revisited (Johnson), Playboy, v. 17, Dec. 1970: 229, 266.

(Books)

Mendelsohn & Crespi, Polls, Television and the New Politics, (Chandler Pub. Co., Scranton Pa. 1970).

1971:

American Constitutional Law and Restrictions on the Content of Private International Broadcasting (Ruddy), 5 Int. Law 102 (January 1971).

American Right of Dissent—and the Responsibility That Goes With It. (Kirven) 16 S.D.L. Rev. 77 (Winter 1971).

Broadcaster and the Public Interest, A Proposal to Replace an Unfaithful Servant (Pember), 4 Loyola U. L. Rev. (LA) 83 (February 1971).

Diversity in Television Program Content: A Proposal for Sustaining Programming, 7 Columb. L. J. & Soc. Prob. 319 (Spring 1971).

Environmental Law—Applicability of Fairness Doctrine to Television Gas and Automobile Advertisements, 16 How. L. J. 380 (Winter 1971).

A Fair Break For Controversial Speakers: Limitations Of the Fairness Doctrine and the Need for Individual Access, 39 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 532 (March 1971).

Fairness Doctrine and Broadcast License Renewals: Brandywine-Maine Line Radio Inc. (24 FCC 2d 18), 71 Colum. L. Rev. 452 (March 1971).

FCC Fairness Doctrine and Informed Social Choice 8 Harv. J. Legis. 333 (June 1971).

Federal Communications Commission and the License Renewal Process (Fenton), 5 Suffolk U. L. Rev. 389 (Winter 1971).

FCC's Fairness Doctrine in Operation (Kruse) 20 Buffalo L. Rev. 633 (Spring 1971).

First Amendment and Consumer Protection: Commercial Advertising As Protected Speech, 50 Oreg. L. Rev. 177 (Winter 1971).

First Amendment in the Marketplace: Commercial Speech and the Values of Free Expression (Redish), 39 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 429 (March 1971).

Freedom to Hear: A Political Justification of the First Amendment 46 Wash. L. Rev. 311 (1971).

Free Speech and the Mass Media, 57 Va. L. Rev. 636 (May 1971).

How Texas Legislators View News Coverage of Their Work (Merwin), 48 Journalism Quarterly. 269 (Summer 1971).

Media Concentration and the FCC: Focusing With A Section Seven Lens (Bennett), 66 Nw. L. U. Rev. 159 (May-June 1971).

Morality and the Broadcast Media: A Constitutional Analysis of FCC Regulatory Standards, 84 Harv. L. Rev. 664 (1971).

Political Broadcasts—A Few Short Steps Forward (Geller), 20 Catholic U. L. Rev. 449 (Spring 1971).

Presidential Politics and Political Prerequisites: The Application of Section 315 and the FCC's Fairness Doctrine to the Appearances of Incumbents in Their Official Capacities, 39 Fordham L. Rev. 481 (March 1971).

Radio, Television and the Community (Anawalt), 11 Santa Clara Law 229 (Spring 1971).

Television Presidential Addresses and the FCC's Fairness Doctrine, 7 Colum. J. L. & Soc. Prob. 75 (Winter 1971).

A Twentieth-Century Soapbox: The Right to Purchase Radio and Television Time (Johnson & Westen), 52 Va. L. Rev. 574 (May 1971).

Violence on Television, 6 Colum. J. L & Soc. Prob. 303 (May 1971).

(Articles Other Than Law Review Articles):

Broadcasting's Pre-Emptive Court, Broadcasting Vol. 81 (August 30, 1971: 17–19, 22–23).

Broadcast License: CBS Has Forfeited Access to the Nation's Airwaves, Barron's, March 29, 1971, pp. 1, 10, 12.

Broadcast Spending: No Election Guarantee, Congressional Quarterly, Weekly Report Vol. 29, July 30, 1971: 1621–1629.

The Cassett Hi-Fi TV FM And Other Marvels of the Foreseeable and Foreaudible Future (Kloss), Christian Science Monitor, September 25, 1971, p. 7.

Is Objectivity Possible (McDonald), 4 Center Magazine 29 (October 1971).

More Trees In Campaign Forest, Broadcasting, v. 80, June 14, 1971: 54–57.

Platforms & Windows: Broadcasting's Role in Election Campaigns (Katz), 48 Journalism Quarterly 304 (Summer 1971).

Political Programs on National Television Networks: 1968 (Topping & Lighty), 15 J. of Broadcasting 161 (1971).

Radio-TV No Sure Way to Get Elected, 81 Broadcasting 34 (July 5, 1971).

Signs of Changing Times in Renewals, Broadcasting, v. 80, May 17, 1971: 34–35.

Television: Gatekeeper of Society (Adam) 21 Optima 59 (June 1971).

What's Ahead for Television, Newsweek v. 77, May 31, 1971: 72–79.

Whitehead Calls for a New Deal, 81 Broadcasting 14 (October 11, 1971).

(Other Material):

Broadcast News and the Fairness Doctrine (Dunham), Address Before the Practicing Law Institute's Seminar on Business and Legal Problems of Television and Radio by Corydon B. Dunham, Vice President and General Counsel, NBC (February 27, 1971).

Aronson, James, Packaging the News: A Critical Survey of Press, Radio, TV (New York: International Publishers, 1971).

Efron, E., The News Twisters (1971).

Roper, An Extended View of Public Attitudes Toward Television and Other Mass Media 1959–1971 (1971).

Television: The Only Truly Mass Medium Remaining Today (Miller), Department of Communications Arts, New York State College of Agriculture & Life Sciences (1971).

ELIZABETH YADLOSKY
Legislative Attorney.

The Investigation of Newsman Daniel Schorr

November 12, 1971.

Hon. Richard M. Nixon
The President,
The White House.

Dear Mr. President: As you know, the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights has been conducting hearings on the state of freedom of the press in our country. We are giving special attention to the relationship between government and the press and the impact of this relationship upon First Amendment freedoms.

In personal letters inviting several high-level officials of your Administration to present testimony to the Subcommittee, I have expressed my concern over the increasing suspicion of many Americans that government appears anxious to use its power to control the press for its own purposes. Recent newspaper reports of an alleged investigation of Mr. Daniel Schorr, correspondent for Columbia Broadcasting System, by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, have clearly exacerbated this suspicion. One report suggests that this investigation was undertaken under the guise of considering Mr. Schorr for a top position in the Federal government. Apparently neither Mr. Schorr nor various White House officials with general responsibility in the area of recruiting were aware of any such appointment under consideration.

I am deeply concerned over the fears, even unwarranted fears, which may arise from the public reports concerning the alleged investigation of Mr. Schorr. First Amendment freedoms can be stilled by intimidation and suggestion from those who have official power just as surely as they can by direct curtailment.

I should like to urge that you make inquiry into this matter and that you provide me with any information developed therefrom. I also intend to invite Mr. Schorr, Mr. Malek, Mr. Colson and other persons involved in this incident to appear before the Subcommittee when it resumes hearings on freedom of the press early in January. In addition, may I express again the desire of the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights to have Mr. Klein or some other official of comparable responsibility from the White House also testify.

With kindest wishes,

Sincerely yours,

Sam J. Ervin, Jr.,
Chairman.

The White House,
Washington, D.C.

Hon. Sam J. Ervin, Jr.,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

Dear Senator Ervin: This is in response to your letters of December 3, 1971 to the President, Mr. Frederick V. Malek and Mr. Charles W. Colson concerning the investigation of Mr. Daniel Schorr.

You have indicated in your letter to the President that your inquiry is prompted by concerns and suspicions which have risen in connection with this matter and the need to put them to rest. We fully agree that any concerns and suspicions which have arisen must be eliminated and we have moved to do just that by publicly stating the precise reason the investigation of Mr. Schorr was conducted. Also, upon reviewing this matter, the President has made it the policy of this Administration that such preliminary job clearance investigations will not be initiated without prior notification to the person being investigated.

Despite some inaccurate conjecture to the contrary, the facts in this situation are quite simple. Mr. Schorr was being considered for a post that is presently filled and a routine job investigation was commenced without notifying Mr. Schorr. Mr. Malek's office was performing in its general area of talent searching in this matter. Mr. Colson's office was not involved in the matter at all. Given these facts, there is nothing more we believe can be added to clarify the situation.

With respect to your request for the appearance of Mr. Malek and Mr. Colson before your Subcommittee, it has been a matter of long-established principle and precedent that members of the President's immediate staff do not appear before Congressional committees to testify in regard to the performance of their duties as members of the President's staff. This practice is, indeed, fundamental to the operation of our system of government.

Therefore, I wish to advise you that Mr. Malek and Mr. Colson respectfully decline the invitation to testify.

Sincerely,

JOHN W. DEAN, III.
Counsel to the President.

JANUARY 24, 1972.

HON. J. EDGAR HOOVER,
Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. HOOVER: As you may know the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights is studying the state of freedom of the press in America. In this connection the Subcommittee conducted a series of hearings in the fall of 1971 and will resume them on February 1, 1972.

One of the primary concerns of the Subcommittee's study is the relationship between government and the press. Many Americans, rightly or wrongly, have become suspicious about government's commitment to First Amendment principles. Several developments of the past few years have exacerbated these suspicions. One recent incident, involving Mr. Daniel Schorr of the Columbia Broadcasting System, has raised expecially widespread and serious concern.

Mr. Schorr publicly reported that the Federal Bureau of Investigation conducted an investigation of him last year at a time when Mr. Schorr was reporting on the Administration's economic policies. Administration spokesmen subsequently stated that this investigation of Mr. Schorr was authorized and conducted pursuant to the Administration's consideration of Mr. Schorr for a government appointment. Mr. Schorr, in turn, responded that he had had no knowledge of such consideration. Although President Nixon has said that in the future no such investigation will be initiated without informing the person involved, there are serious questions concerning this matter which remained unanswered.

The Subcommittee has invited Mr. Schorr and certain White House officials reportedly involved with this incident to appear before the Subcommittee. Mr. Schorr has agreed to testify, but we have as yet not heard from the White House officials.

The Subcommittee would appreciate any information which the FBI has concerning this incident. Specifically, we would like to know under what and whose authority the FBI conducted its investigation. We would like to know when the investigation was begun, who in the White House ordered it, and when the investigation was terminated. We would like to know approximately how many persons were questioned about Mr. Schorr, the kind of information the FBI was asked to gather, and the general nature of the investigation. Finally, we are interested in knowing what has happened to any records, files, or other materials collected in the course of the investigation.

The Subcommittee will be grateful to this and other information the FBI can supply concerning this matter. I am sure that you know of my continuing high regard for the outstanding work of the FBI and of my personal admiration for your leadership over the years.

With kindest wishes,

Sincerely yours,

SAM J. ERVIN, JR.,
Chairman.

JANUARY 27, 1972.

HON. SAM J. ERVIN, JR.,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Reference is made to your letter dated January 24, 1972, regarding the investigation of Mr. Daniel Louis Schorr.

Investigation of Mr. Schorr was requested on August 19, 1971, by a member of the White House staff, authorized to request federal personnel background investigations. The investigation was referred to our field offices, but no inquiries were conducted until the morning of August 20, 1971. Mr. Schorr was contacted at approximately 8:30 a.m. on August 20, 1971, to obtain appropriate background data. He was informed of the investigation and later that morning made background data available to us. At approximately 3:00 p.m. on the same day, we learned from officials of the Columbia Broadcasting System that Mr. Schorr desired the investigation to be discontinued. The investigation was discontinued at approximately that hour pursuant to instructions from the White House. Prior to the discontinuance of our investigation, twenty-five persons were interviewed concerning Mr. Schorr.

This Bureau was not specifically requested by the White House to obtain any particular type of information during the investigation. The investigation was requested as a routine background investigation for possible federal appointment in which we make inquiries regarding a person's character, loyalty, general standing, and ability.

The incomplete investigation of Mr. Schorr was entirely favorable concerning him and the results were furnished to the White House.

Sincerely yours,

J. EDGAR HOOVER,
Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D.C., February 3, 1972.

HON. J. EDGAR HOOVER,
Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. HOOVER: On yesterday, I was astounded at what was reported to be a news article in the Washington Post which stated that on the previous day I stated during the course of an investigation into the Daniel Schorr matter that I intended to propose some legislation to limit the activities of the FBI. On yesterday morning, the Subcommittee resumed the hearings, and I made a statement on this subject, a copy of which I enclose.

The entire article seemed to be based on inferences drawn from a mere remark on my part that I did not think that any person in the Executive Branch of the service should ask the FBI to make an investigation of the qualifications of any man for appointment to a public office unless such official first ascertained from such individual that he would accept such office if offered, and advise the official that an investigation was being made in connection with the prospective appointment.

The FBI certainly did not do anything except its legal duty in initiating the investigation of Mr. Schorr at the instance of some official in the White House.

With all kind wishes, I am

Sincerely yours,

SAM J. ERVIN, JR.

OPENING REMARKS BY SENATOR SAM J. ERVIN, JR.

Yesterday during the hearings I made certain oral statements. There is always a hazard in making oral statements which is two-fold. The person who makes an oral statement may not express himself correctly or he may not be correctly understood by some of his audience.

I refer to certain statements attributed to me, and if I made any remarks justifying these statements, they certainly were inadvertently made. I did not blame the FBI in any way for its investigation of CBS commentator Daniel Schorr. I don't think Mr. Schorr criticized the FBI in any way in respect to that investigation.

Under the laws and the Executive Office, the FBI is an agency of the executive branch of the Federal Government and it is required to make an investigation whenever ordered to do so either by the President as the head of the executive branch of the Government or any person whom it believes is authorized to speak for the President, and likewise when requested by the Department of Justice.

The FBI merely performed its duty in this case. I accept at face value the statement of Mr. J. Edgar Hoover that the FBI was requested by a properly authorized person in the White House to make the investigation of Mr. Schorr with a view to determining his fitness from the standpoint of character and loyalty to fill some Federal office which was not designated to the FBI or to anybody else.

I do agree with Mr. Schorr's observations that before any official, who is authorized by the executive department to request the FBI to make an investigation to determine fitness for the appointment to Federal office, acts, that official should inform the person being investigated of the investigation, of the objective of the investigation, and the office for which he is being considered.

With due respect to everybody concerned, I think there is a certain amount of stupidity demonstrated by investigating a man's fitness for appointment to Federal office without first consulting that individual and ascertaining whether he would accept the office if it is offered to him, but the FBI was not responsible in any way for that stupidity.

The FBI performs a most important function in our country. In the first place, it is necessary for those having appointive powers in the Federal Government to ascertain the loyalty and fitness of an American being considered for an appointment to a public office. Therefore, the FBI has that duty when requested to do so by a proper official.

Furthermore, the FBI is authorized to make investigations at the request of the Department of Justice. The Department of Justice is justified in making those requests whenever they have information which seems to indicate to them that some individual or some group has violated the law or is about to violate the law.

Now, if you had a law that said that the FBI or any other law enforcement agency of the government, Federal or State, couldn't investigate a person or group to ascertain whether circumstances reasonably indicated they were about to violate the law or had violated the law, unless that violation was first established, then in effect, you couldn't have any investigations at all. If the FBI, or any other agency of government that has law enforcement powers, undertakes to investigate a charge that perhaps I have violated the law or am about to violate the law, they may wind up with a finding after an investigation that I hadn't violated the law and wasn't about to violate the law.

So I just wanted to make these remarks to clarify this situation and to defuse any emotions which might have resulted from anything I inadvertently said or inadvertently was suspected of having said.

ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY,
Washington, D.C., March 1, 1972.

HON. SAM J. ERVIN, JR.,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR ERVIN: This is in reply to your letter of January 25, 1972, regarding the hearings on the state of freedom of the press in America and the controversy surrounding Mr. Daniel Schorr, news correspondent for the Columbia Broadcasting System.

To my knowledge Mr. Schorr has not been considered for any position in the Environmental Protection Agency, nor is he under consideration for any position in the Agency at this time. The list of top-level positions which the Agency filled around August 1, 1971, or was actively recruiting for through executive assignment procedures is enclosed as requested.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM D. RUCKELSHAUS, Administrator.

TOP LEVEL POSITIONS IN EPA AVAILABLE ON OR ABOUT AUGUST 1, 1971

Deputy Assistant Administrator for Solid Waste Management	GS-17
Deputy Director, Office of Public Affairs	GS-16
Regional Administrator—Region I	GS-17
Regional Administrator—Region III	GS-17
Regional Administrator—Region IV	GS-17
Regional Administrator—Region VI	GS-17
Regional Administrator—Region VIII	GS-17
Regional Administrator—Region X	GS-17
Deputy Regional Administrator—Region III	GS-16
Deputy Regional Administrator—Region IV	GS-16
Deputy Regional Administrator—Region V	GS-16
Deputy Regional Administrator—Region VIII	GS-16

U.S. CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., Feb 4, 1972.

HON. SAM J. ERVIN, JR.,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, Committee on the Judiciary,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR ERVIN: As background for my responses to the questions in your letter of January 24, 1972, I am attaching a copy of Federal Personnel Manual Chapter 736, Investigations. Your Subcommittee staff may find it helpful to review this material, which contains detailed information on investigative policies, practices and procedures.

While it is not within our purview to issue instructions concerning investigations requested at the White House level, the requests generally are channeled as follows:

Cases on Presidential appointments requiring consent of the Senate go to the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Cases on Presidential appointments not requiring Senate consent go to the Federal Bureau of Investigation if the request for investigation comes from the White House.

If the request for investigation emanates from the employing agency, the submission requirements outlined in the attachment are followed. These cases come to the Civil Service Commission for investigation unless the employing agency has been authorized to conduct its own investigations by agreement with the Commission. We have such agreements with the Department of Army, Navy, Air Force, State, Treasury, and FBI for Justice. The Central Intelligence Agency also conducts its own investigations.

The Civil Service Commission has not conducted any investigation of Mr. Daniel Schorr. We did receive a notice for our files that on August 19, 1971, the Federal Bureau of Investigation had initiated a personnel investigation on Mr. Schorr at the request of the White House.

The following comments in response to your questions relate to personnel investigations that are within the Commission's purview below the White House level.

When a full field "background" investigation is required because of the nature and sensitivity of the position, the prospective appointee is asked to fill out a Security Investigations Data Form giving information on a variety of essential items including employments, residence, education. Standard Form 86, used by the Commission for this purpose, clearly indicates by its title and content that it is for use in conducting the investigation. Anyone completing the form cannot help but be fully aware that he is to be investigated.

Upon receipt of the data form and a fingerprint chart, the Commission schedules the full field investigation, including a national agency check, as defined on pages 736-3 and 736-4 of the attachment. The investigations are conducted by experienced investigators, trained in the techniques of fair, objective, impartial investigating and reporting. They are under strict instructions to scrupulously safeguard the rights of individuals and to avoid unwarranted invasions of privacy while maintaining a prudent regard for the national interest.

When the investigation is completed, the reports are furnished to the employing agency. This is done because of the provisions of Executive Order 10450 which vest the responsibility for security determinations in the head of the employing agency. Transmittal of the full field reports of investigation from the Commission to the agency is strictly controlled. They are delivered only to officials properly designated and approved to receive them.

The instructions on page 736-13 of the attachment concerning custody of reports of investigation are based on the provisions of Executive Order 10450. The reports remain the property of the investigative agency that made the investigation but generally are retained by the employing agency while the employee is still on its rolls. The reports are required to be maintained in confidence and must be returned to the investigative agency when they have served their purpose—e.g., when a decision is made not to appoint or when the employee is separated for any reason. The files thus returned are maintained in secure areas and thereafter may be released only upon a showing of legitimate need for employment or security purposes. Their availability for these strictly controlled bona fide purposes avoids the considerable investigative cost that otherwise would be incurred if the same person is later considered for employment. This often occurs and the resulting savings are very substantial.

The Commission is not in a position to provide a list of the senior positions open or contemplated in the field of environmental protection as of last fall. We suggest that officials of the Environmental Protection Agency or the White House may be better able to supply such a list.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT E. HAMPTON,
Chairman.

[From The Washington Post, November 11, 1971]

FBI PROBES NEWSMAN CRITICAL OF PRESIDENT

(BY KEN W. CLAWSON)

Acting on orders from the White House, the FBI has been investigating veteran CBS correspondent Daniel Schorr.

The investigation started Aug. 20 in the midst of one of Schorr's frequent clashes with White House aides over the quality and accuracy of his reporting.

FBI agents called on Richard Salant, president of CBS; Bill Small, CBS Washington bureau chief; Fred Friendly, former president of CBS, and even neighbors of Schorr, who lives in Georgetown, and those of his brother, Alvin, who lives in New York.

In each instance, agents said that Schorr was being considered for a "position of trust and confidence" in the government. An agent told Salant, who was suspicious of the reason for the probe, that Schorr had been proposed for a "very important job" and the White House had asked the FBI to expedite the investigation.

Most of the interviews took place during the weekend of Aug. 20.

No job offer was ever made to Schorr, but a White House official said last night that Schorr "was under consideration, among others, for a high position in the environmental area. The consideration was terminated, not for any reason that turned up in the FBI investigation, but for other reasons with respect to him and the position for which he was being considered."

The official refused to identify the environmental post.

"I now believe there was never a job to be offered," Schorr said yesterday. "Out of curiosity mostly, I have checked every source who might know without the slightest indication that I was ever considered for any post."

It was learned that the White House indeed sought from the FBI a field investigation on Schorr and, as is usual in these cases, indicated it was because Schorr was under consideration for employment in a substantial government post.

The investigation started three days after President Nixon made a speech to the Knights of Columbus in New York in which he indicated he strongly supported financial aid to parochial schools despite political and constitutional barriers. On the night of the speech, Schorr reported the President caught Catholic educators and even some HEW officials by surprise because they didn't know of any programs or initiatives in progress that could accomplish the President's apparent goal.

The following day, Aug. 18, Schorr was called by Al Snyder, an aide to White House communications director Herbert G. Klein, and asked to a meeting "to get all the facts" on White House initiatives on parochial schools.

Present were presidential speechwriter Pat Buchanan, Terry Bell, then an assistant commissioner of education, and Henry Cashen, an aide to Charles Colson, special counsel to the President.

Schorr said the quartet reeled off information so rapidly that he could not absorb it. He asked them for a simple statement of the facts, and promised he would try to air their position after checking it with his original sources.

Although his sources dismissed much of the subsequent statement as "pie in the sky," Schorr said he went on the CBS Evening News with Walter Cronkite Friday, Aug. 20, with a story giving the White House position as well as a partial knockdown by his own sources.

The FBI investigation was started earlier the same day. Schorr's bureau chief, Bill Small, refused to turn over the correspondent's personnel file to the FBI agent in view of the fact that he could not learn what job might be in the offing.

But Schorr himself answered several routine questions about his background and then ended the interview. He said he told the agent: "This is funny. If a job is going to be offered, shouldn't I know bout it?"

In addition to a background check by the FBI, standard procedure prior to a high government appointment is an investigation of the prospect's back tax records. It was learned that no such check was made on Schorr.

Schorr became more and more curious as the days went by, as friends and associates called him to report contacts with the FBI. Marjorie Hunter, a New York Times reporter and Schorr's neighbor, was queried.

Irving R. Levine, an NBC correspondent, was asked by agents about Schorr's behavior when he was CBS' Moscow correspondent from 1955 through 1957. Schorr's nephew, Ken, 18, said neighbors in New York were being asked about Schorr.

The White House official said last night that the FBI probe was initiated routinely by the office of Frederic V. Malek, chief White House recruiter.

Coincidentally, Malek and Schorr attended a dinner party together after the FBI investigation was begun. The correspondent asked Malek at the dinner if he really was under consideration for a job. Malek's reaction, Schorr said yesterday, was one of surprise. Malek told Schorr he would look into the matter and call him. Malek didn't call.

Schorr and the White House, and especially Colson, the President's special counsel, have been on the outs over Schorr's coverage of the wage-price freeze and Phase II of the government's economic plans.

Last Wednesday, after Schorr reported that the Pay Board was about to explode because of labor members' reaction to proposed guidelines, Colson called Frank Stanton, vice chairman of CBS, and complained that the report was inaccurate.

One version of the call is that Colson charged that Schorr had personally fed the story to The Washington Post and the New York Times, thereby compounding the inaccuracy. This version further alleges that when AFL-CIO President George Meany heard the Schorr television report he became so angry that he boycotted the Thursday session of the Pay Board.

Labor sources said yesterday Meany did miss the morning session, but it was because he had a doctor's appointment. The Washington Post story, written by Frank C. Porter, did not come from Schorr, according to Porter.

Stanton himself said he didn't recall enough of the conversation with Colson to be precise about it. But he said that he didn't think it would be fair to say that Colson complained vigorously about Schorr's report.

Following the coverage of the acceptance of mainland China into the United Nations, however, Colson complained to a Washington CBS official that the network had failed to show the jubilation of pro-Chinese nations after the crucial vote.

Sargent Carlton, director of governmental relations for CBS, said Colson's complaint was relayed to Salant in New York. Earlier that day, the White House had denounced as "shocking" the "demonstration of undisguised glee shown by some" U.N. delegates.

All that was clear last night was that Schorr was secure in his job at CBS, and that his chances, if he ever had any, for a high position of "trust and confidence" in the government, were dead.

[From the Washington Post, November 12, 1971]

WHITE HOUSE DEFENDS PROBE OF TV NEWSMAN

(By Ken W. Clawson)

The White House said yesterday the FBI investigation ordered on CBS correspondent Daniel Schorr was not intended to intimidate the newsman, who has often clashed with the administration over the fairness and accuracy of his reports.

Presidential press secretary Ronald L. Ziegler said Schorr was being considered for a position in the administration, which he described vaguely as in the "environmental area."

This is why, Ziegler said, White House talent scout Frederic V. Malek or one of his subordinates ordered an FBI investigation into Schorr's background last August.

Ziegler stressed that during the three years of the Nixon administration there has not been a single example of government intimidation of a newsman.

On the House floor, however, Rep. James H. Scheuer (D-N.Y.) called for a congressional investigation of what he called the "administration's attempt to control the news." Sen. John Tunney (D-Calif.) made a similar plea for an investigation, alleging that Schorr appeared to be the victim of "harassment and intimidation."

Chairman Emmanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) of the House Judiciary Committee was reported to have asked Attorney General John N. Mitchell for an explanation of the FBI investigation.

Ziegler's extended defense of the propriety of investigating Schorr before he was notified he was a candidate for a government post, appeared to harden Schorr's conviction that he was the victim of "something."

"I remain more convinced than ever that there never was a job" for which he was being considered, Schorr said.

But he said CBS policy prevented him from discussing the issue on television. He added that he was not going to allow himself "to be pushed into a crusade to make it possible for the administration to establish the bias they already accuse me of anyway."

Although Ziegler said the FBI probe came through Malek's office, he refused to disclose the number of White House aides who have the authority to ask for an FBI investigation of individuals.

He did say that neither he nor Charles Colson, special counsel to the President who has complained to CBS about some of Schorr's reports, has the authority to request such a probe.

[From the Washington Post, January 31, 1972]

WHITE HOUSE WEIGHED JOB FOR SCHORR

(By Carroll Kilpatrick)

A White House official said yesterday that CBS correspondent Daniel Schorr was under consideration last year to be assistant to the chairman of the Council on Environmental Quality.

The official told The Washington Post that Schorr's name was considered for the position by Frederic V. Malek, chief White House recruiter, and that his discussion of Schorr's name with aides triggered the FBI investigation of the correspondent.

Schorr is scheduled to testify today at the opening of hearings called by Sen. Sam J. Ervin (D-N.C.) on press freedoms. Ervin is chairman of a Senate constitutional rights subcommittee.

Ervin charged last night that the White House has refused to permit any of its officials to testify at the hearings.

He said he had requested Malek, Special Counsel Charles Colson and Communications Director Herbert G. Klein to testify to set the record straight, but all declined.

Ervin said the only response was a letter from John W. Dean III, counsel to the President, who wrote, "This matter has been fully and carefully reviewed. There are no indications of any intent on the part of anyone in the White House to harass or intimidate Mr. Schorr by initiating an investigation into his background."

Ervin also released a letter from FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover supporting the White House explanation that Schorr was considered for an administration job.

"My mind is open on whether there was a job," Schorr said yesterday when informed of the White House official's comment.

"That is not the issue. The issue is whether the administration should have the FBI investigate anyone not accused of a crime without his consent."

Schorr said he had heard nothing about a job offer or the nature of the job from the time the FBI first began investigating him last August to the present.

After the news broke that the correspondent was under investigation his name was dropped from consideration. Since then other well known TV newsmen have been interviewed in connection with the job, the official said. He declined to give their names, but he said the job had not been filled.

There are plans to undertake the project, whether under the direction of someone brought in from the outside or by someone already in the government, the official said.

The FBI investigation of Schorr brought accusations that the administration was seeking to intimidate Schorr, who had been critical of administration policy on a number of occasions.

Schorr had never been told he was under consideration for a job and had not sought one. He said in November, when news of the investigation broke, that he did not believe there was a job to be offered.

"Out of curiosity, mostly, I have checked every source who might know without the slightest indication that I was ever considered for any post," he said in November.

White House press secretary Ronald L. Ziegler said at the time that the administration definitely had a job in mind for Schorr, but he declined to say what it was on the grounds it would make it more difficult to fill the post.

Ziegler did say that it was in the environmental area, and he promised to disclose the nature of the job later.

The official who gave The Post the information yesterday said Schorr had been considered because of his prominence and experience as a TV newsman and because he had done important work in the environmental area. Schorr's broadcasts have included reports on environment issues.

Malek knew that Schorr had been critical of the administration on occasion, the official said. But Malek was under instructions from President Nixon to find ways to encourage individuals to do more to help clean up the environment.

Malek and Russell E. Train, director of the Council on Environmental Quality, agreed that the best way to enlist public support for individual initiative in the environmental field was with a series of television programs, the official explained.

The President was not told that Schorr was being considered. When criticism developed over the FBI investigation, the President, according to Ziegler, directed that in the future no FBI investigations be started on a person being considered for a job without his knowledge.

[From The Washington Post, Friday, November 12, 1971]

THE "ROUTINE" INVESTIGATION OF DANIEL SCHORR

(An Editorial)

"I now believe there was never a job to be offered"—the remark was made by CBS correspondent Daniel Schorr apropos of the strange goings on between the White House, the FBI and Mr. Schorr's friends, neighbors, relatives and employers who were interrogated about him recently by federal agents claiming he was under consideration for a high level government job. In response to Ken Clawson's story about all this in The Washington Post yesterday, the President's spokesman, Mr. Ziegler, has asserted (1) that Mr. Schorr was being investigated as a candidate for a position in government, (2) that the administration is not at liberty to say what that position was and (3) that no attempt at intimidation of Mr. Schorr—whose television reportage and commentary have been a source of some displeasure in the White House—was even remotely contemplated.

The known facts of the matter, the bare bones of what has been ascertained could sustain either version of the story. They are simply that Mr. Schorr has incurred the wrath and occasional complaints of Nixon administration officials—most recently of Charles Colson in the White House; that more or less simultaneously with one of these episodes in August an FBI investigation of Mr. Schorr was undertaken at the initiative of Frederic Malek's office in the White House; that the investigators were informed that Mr. Schorr was being checked out by way of clearance for a high level job; that neither Mr. Schorr nor his employers could ever find out what that job might be or whether it even existed.

We are perfectly prepared to believe—or at least to have it demonstrated—that Mr. Schorr was in fact being considered for a post in the Nixon administration. For all we know, Tom Wicker may be in line to replace Attorney General Mitchell and Sander Vanocur may be headed for our embassy in Saigon—after all, everything is possible. The point is that the administration would not have to be cutting through such a heavy fog of suspicion on what it insists was a "routine" check, if some of the White House staff principals involved were rather more famous for their scruples and if administration behavior in general did not make it so easy to believe that government might well be abusing its powers in this fashion. Consider Messrs. Colson and Malek, who are best known in certain political and administrative circles around town for the skill of their blunt instrument work. The scurrilous, last minute ads of the 1970 congressional campaign, the summary kicking out of Secretary Hickel's staff, the dangerous and backfiring attack on George Meany at the time of the President's announcement of his new economic policy—these are among the juicier espisodes with which these aides have been associated. We say "associated" because such things have a way of never becoming entirely open or clear. Mr. Colson in particular seems to have come to public attention chiefly through an unending series of denials and clarifications of episodes the administration would rather not discuss.

More important than the fact that these two men were said to have been involved—one with the initiation of the investigation, the other in pressing complaints with CBS—is the fact that the administration has given vent at such high levels to the idea that the media, or certain parts of it, are peopled by men and women who have neither the country's nor the government's best interests at heart. The campaign to discredit both the motives and the product of much of the press, taken together with the administration's propensity for confusing criticism with conspiracy and worse, is essential background to understanding the fuss. In past administrations, investigations have been undertaken of press leaks, as they have been in this one. The present affair is something quite different. As a measure of how far this administration has let its bad temper with the media take it, you could try a simple question on yourself: Which would surprise you more: to learn that the administration had named a well-known and highly respected critic, such as Daniel Schorr, to one of its top jobs or to learn that it had been hounding and harassing such a critic?

PROPOSED CONGRESSIONAL LEGISLATION

[S. 1311, 92d Cong., First Sess.]

Mr. PEARSON introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

A BILL To provide certain privileges against disclosure of confidential information and the sources of information obtained by newsmen

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Newsmen's Privilege Act".

NONDISCLOSURE OF CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION

SEC. 2. Except as provided in section 4, no person shall be required by any court, grand jury, agency, department, or commission of the United States or by either House of or any committee of Congress to disclose any confidential information received or obtained by him in his capacity as a reporter, editor, commentator, journalist, writer, correspondent, announcer, or other person directly engaged in the gathering or presentation of news for any newspaper, periodical, press association, newspaper syndicate, wire service, or radio or television station.

NONDISCLOSURE OF SOURCE

SEC. 3. Except as provided in section 4, no person shall be required by any court, grand jury, agency, department, or commission of the United States or by either House of or any committee of Congress to disclose the source of any information received or obtained by him in his capacity as a reporter, editor, commentator, journalist, writer, correspondent, announcer, or other person directly engaged in the gathering or presentation of news for any newspaper, periodical, press association, newspaper syndicate, wire service, or radio or television station.

QUALIFICATIONS

SEC. 4. (a) The privilege conferred by section 2 shall not apply to any information which has at any time been published, broadcast, or otherwise made public by the person claiming the privilege.

(b) The privilege conferred by section 3 shall not apply—

(1) to the source of any allegedly defamatory information in any case where the defendant, in a civil action for defamation, asserts a defense based on the source of such information; or

(2) to the source of any information concerning the details of any grand jury or other proceeding which was required to be secret under the laws of the United States.

(c) In any case where a person claims a privilege conferred by section 2 or 3, the person seeking the information may apply to the United States district court for an order divesting the privilege. Such application shall be made to the district court in the district wherein the hearings, action, or other proceeding in which the information is sought is pending. The order shall be granted if the court, after hearing the parties, determines that there is substantial evidence that disclosure of the information is required to prevent a threat to human life, espionage, or foreign aggression.

[S. 3786, 92d Cong., Second Sess.]

Mr. CRANSTON introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

A BILL To protect confidential sources of the news media

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a person connected with or employed by the news media or press cannot be required by a court, the legislature, or any administrative body, to disclose before the Congress or any other Federal court or agency, any information or the source of any information procured for publication or broadcast.

MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT OF PROPOSED "NEWSMAN'S PRIVILEGE ACT"

NATIONAL BROADCASTING CO.

This memorandum is submitted in support of the annexed "Newsmen's Privilege Act."

In recent years, numerous subpoenas have been served upon the press requiring testimony before various governmental bodies. It has consequently become far more difficult for the press to perform the already difficult task of providing to the public significant information relating to matters of public concern and public interest. The difficulties thus far encountered may well be accentuated unless suitable legislation is adopted.

Seventeen states currently offer some forms of protection for confidential communications made to journalists. These protections, such as they are, differ from state to state. Some are broader than S.1311, some are more narrowly defined and some generally parallel the lines of that bill. Judicial protection of the critical First Amendment rights threatened by the issuance of the subpoenas has thus far been inconsistent and often insufficient. The instant bill seeks to insure that the confidences required to enable the press adequately to inform the public will not be lost.

S.1311 has already been introduced in the Senate and is itself a significant improvement over the present patchwork of state and federal laws and rulings. The proposed bill, in several significant respects, varies from S.1311.

1. S.1311 would not by its terms prevent subpoenas from being served directly upon news media and could thus allow direct access by investigatory bodies to confidential files containing news material never published or broadcast.* The proposed draft eliminates this danger by including news media and their employees in its coverage.

2. S.1311, because of its lack of definitions, could invite substantial litigation as to its intended coverage. The proposed bill, by including definitional matter, seeks to overcome this weakness.

3. S.1311 has two significant qualifications. It does not extend its protection to the source of allegedly defamatory information in any case in which the defendant in an action for defamation asserts a defense based on such source; nor does it extend such protection to the source of information concerning grand jury or other secret proceedings.

The proposed bill eliminates these qualifications. With respect to actions based on claims of defamation, we believe claims for civil damages do not reach the stature required to override First Amendment rights of the public. Thus, in the amicus curiae brief of NBC in United States v. Caldwell, three minimal tests were set forth which must be met before a reporter could be required to testify: Probable cause to believe that the reporter possesses information specifically relevant to a specific probable violation of law; a showing by the investigatory body that the information sought cannot be obtained by alternative means; and a compelling and overriding interest in the information. Even if a suit for civil damages met the first two tests outlined above, it could not, in our opinion, meet the third test and therefore should not be afforded a position limiting the effective utilization of First Amendment rights.

As for the second qualification, we believe that sources concerned with grand jury or other secret proceedings are of no less value to the press than any other source. The possibility of illegal action by such sources is no more significant in this instance than in any other instance. Indeed, many of the sources of information concerning governmental function could be deemed to be in breach of some contractual or legal restriction on divulgence of information.

4. S.1311 provides a procedure wherein the privilege purportedly conferred by it may, under some circumstances, be divested by a United States district court. The New York statute, however, contains no such exceptions. We believe that the New York view is the better one and that the decision as to whether to reveal either sources or information should be left to the judgment of the person to whom the privilege is afforded.

A BILL To provide a privilege against disclosure of confidential information and the sources of information obtained by newsmen and news media

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Newsmen's Privilege Act."

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. As used in this Act, the following definitions shall apply:

(1) "News" shall mean written, oral or pictorial information or communication concerning local, national or worldwide events or other matters of public concern or public interest or affecting the public welfare.

(2) "Newspaper" shall mean a paper that is printed and distributed periodically that contains news.

(3) "Magazine" shall mean a publication containing news which is published and distributed periodically.

(4) "Radio or television station" shall mean a station, network, group or affiliation of stations, equipped to engage in the transmission by radio or television signals of writings, signs, signals, pictures, and sounds of all kinds, including all instrumentalities, facilities, apparatus and services (among other things, the receipt, forwarding and delivering of communications) incidental to

---

* Of the one hundred and twenty-three (123) subpoenas served upon NBC and CBS and their wholly-owned stations between 1969 and July 1971 (attached as Appendix A to NBC's amicus curiae brief in United States v. Caldwell) over seventy were addressed to either the station generally or to station custodians or librarians.

such transmission, intended to be received by the public, directly or by the intermediary of relay stations.

(5) "News medium" shall mean a newspaper, magazine, radio station and television station.

(6) "Journalist" shall mean one who is engaged in gathering, preparing, editing, analyzing, commenting on, writing or broadcasting news for a newspaper, magazine, radio station or television station.

(7) "Confidential information" shall mean any information, received or obtained by any journalist, news media employee or agent, in such capacity, not published or broadcast, which information said journalist, news media employee or agent deems to be of a secret nature.

(8) "Source" shall mean any person, document, record or animate or inanimate supplier of information.

NONDISCLOSURE OF CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION

SEC. 3. No news medium or journalist or employee or agent thereof, shall be required by any court, grand jury, agency, department or commission of the United States or by either House of or any committee of Congress to disclose any confidential information received, or obtained in the capacity of news medium or journalist, or employee or agent thereof.

NONDISCLOSURE OF SOURCES

SEC. 4. No news medium or journalist or employee or agent thereof, shall be required by any court, grand jury, agency, department or commission of the United States or by either House of or any committee of Congress to disclose the source of any information received, or obtained in the capacity of news medium or journalist or employee or agent thereof.

JUDICIAL DECISIONS, ADMINISTRATIVE OPINIONS

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

(Nos. 1873 and 1885—October Term, 1970)

NEW YORK TIMES COMPANY, PETITIONER, v. UNITED STATES

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit

---

UNITED STATES, PETITIONER, (1885) v. THE WASHINGTON POST COMPANY ET AL.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit

[June 30, 1971]

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, with whom MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS joins, concurring.

I adhere to the view that the Government's case against the Washhington Post should have been dismissed and that the injunction against the New York Times should have been vacated without oral argument when the cases were first presented to this Court. I believe that every moment's continuance of the injunctions against these newspapers amounts to a flagrant, indefensible, and continuing violation of the First Amendment. Furthermore, after oral arguments, I agree completely that we must affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia and reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit for the reasons stated by my Brothers DOUGLAS and BRENNAN. In my view it is unfortunate that some of my Brethren are apparently willing to hold that the publication of news may sometimes be enjoined. Such a holding would make a shambles of the First Amendment.

Our Government was launched in 1789 with the adoption of the Constitution. The Bill of Rights, including the First Amendment, followed in 1791. Now, for the first time in the 182 years since the founding of the Republic, the federal courts are asked to hold that the First Amendment does not mean what it says, but rather means that the Government can halt the publication of current news of vital importance to the people of this country.

In seeking injunctions against these newspapers and in its presentation to the Court, the Executive Branch seems to have forgotten the essential purpose and history of the First Amendment. When the Constitution was adopted, many people strongly opposed it because the document contained no Bill of Rights to safeguard certain basic freedoms.[1] They especially feared that the new powers granted to a central government might be interpreted to permit the government to curtail freedom of religion, press, assembly, and speech. In response to an overwhelming public clamor, James Madison offered a series of amendments to satisfy citizens that these great liberties would remain safe and beyond the power of government to abridge. Madison proposed what later became the First Amendment in three parts, two of which are set out below, and one of which proclaimed: "The people shall not be deprived or abridged of their right to speak, to write, or to publish their sentiments; and the freedom of the press, as one of the great bulwarks of liberty, shall be inviolable."[2] The amendments were offered to curtail and restrict the general powers granted to the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Branches two years before in the original Constitution. The Bill of Rights changed the original Constitution into a new charter under which no branch of government could abridge the people's freedoms of press, speech, religion, and assembly. Yet the Solicitor General argues and some members of the Court appear to agree that the general powers of the Government adopted in the original Constitution should be interpreted to limit and restrict the specific and emphatic guarantees of the Bill of Rights adopted later. I can imagine no greater perversion of history. Madison and the other Framers of the First Amednment, able men that they were, wrote in language they earnestly believed could never be misunderstood: "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of the press. . . ." Both the history and language of the First Amendment support the view that the press must be left free to publish news, whatever the source, without censorship, injunctions, or prior restraints.

---

[1] In introducing the Bill of Rights in the House of Representatives, Madison said: "[B]ut I believe that the great mass of the people who opposed [the Constitution,], disliked it because it did not contain effectual provisions against the encroachments on particular rights. . . ." 1 Annals of Congress 433 (1834). Congressman Goodhue added: "[I]t is the wish of many of our constituents, that something should be added to the Constitution, to secure in a stronger manner their liberties from the inroads of power." Id., at 426.

In the First Amendment the Founding Fathers gave the free press the protection it must have to fulfill its essential role in our democracy. The press was to serve the governed, not the governors. The Governments power to censor the press was abolished so that the press would remain forever free to censure the Government. The press was protected so that it could bare the secrets of government and inform the people. Only a free and unrestrained press can effectively expose deception in government. And paramount among the responsibilities of a free press is the duty to prevent any part of the government from deceiving the people and sending them off to distant lands to die of foreign fevers and foreign shot and shell. In my view, far from deserving condemnation for their courageous reporting, the New York Times, the Washington Post, and other newspapers should be commended for serving the purpose that the Founding Fathers saw so clearly. In revealing the workings of government that led to the Viet Nam war, the newspapers nobly did precisely that which the Founders hoped and trusted they would do.

The Government's case here is based on premises entirely different from those that guided the Framers of the First Amendment. The Solicitor General has carefully and emphatically stated:

> "Now, Mr. Justice [BLACK], your construction of . . . [the First Amendment] is well known, and I certainly respect it. You say that no law means no law, and that should be obvious. I can only say, Mr. Justice that to me it is equally obvious that 'no law' does not mean 'no law', and I would seek to persuade the Court that that is true. . . . [T]here are other parts of the Constitution that grant power and responsibilities to the Executive and . . . the First Amendment was not intended to make it impossible for the Executive to function or to protect the security of the United States."[3]

And the Government argues in its brief that in spite of the First Amendment, "[t]he authority of the Executive Department to protect the nation against publication of information whose disclosure would endanger the national security stems from two interrelated sources: the constitutional power of the President over the conduct of foreign affairs and his authority as Commander-in-Chief."[4]

In other words, we asked to hold that despite the First Amendment's emphatic command, the Executive Branch, the Congress, and the Judiciary can make laws enjoining publication of current news and abridging freedom of the press in the name of "national security." The Government does not even attempt to rely on any act of Congress. Instead it makes the bold and dangerously far-reaching contention that the courts should take it upon themselves to "make" a law abridging freedom of the press in the name of equity, presidential power and national security, even when the representatives of the people in Congress have adhered to the command of the First Amendment and refused to make such a law.[5] See concurring opinion of MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, post, at —. To find that the President has "inherent power" to halt the publication of news by resort to the courts would wipe out the First Amendment and destroy the fundamental liberty and security of the very people the Government hopes to make "secure." No one can read the history of the adoption of the First Amendment without being convinced beyond any doubt that it was injunctions like those sought here that Madison and his collaborators intended to outlaw in this Nation for all time.

---

[2] The other parts were:

"The civil rights of none shall be abridged on account of religious belief or worship, nor shall any national religion be established, nor shall the full and equal rights of conscience be in any manner, or on any pretext, infringed.

"The people shall not be restrained from peaceably assembling and consulting for their common good; nor from applying to the Legislature by petitions, or remonstrances, for redress of their grievances." 1 Annals of Congress 434 (1834). (Emphasis added.)

[3] Transcript of Oral Argument, at 76.

[4] Brief for United States, at 12.

[5] Compare the views of the Solicitor General with those of James Madison, the author of the First Amendment. When speaking of the Bill of Rights in the House of Representatives, Madison said: "If they [the first ten amendments] are incorporated into the Constitu-

The word "security" is a broad, vague generality whose contours should not be invoked to abrogate the fundamental law embodied in the First Amendment. The guarding of military and diplomatic secrets at the expense of informed representative government provides no real security for our Republic. The Framers of the First Amendment, fully aware of both the need to defend a new nation and the abuses of the English and Colonial governments, sought to give this new society strength and security by providing that freedom of speech, press, religion, and assembly should not be abridged. This thought was eloquently expressed in 1937 by Mr. Chief Justice Hughes—great man and great Chief Justice that he was—when the Court held a man could not be punished for attending a meeting run by Communists.

> "The greater the importance of safeguarding the community from incitements to the overthrow of our institutions by force and violence, the more imperative is the need to preserve inviolate the constitutional rights of free speech, free press and free assembly in order to maintain the opportunity for free political discussion, to the end that government may be responsive to the will of the people and that changes, if desired, may be obtained by peaceful means. Therein lies the security of the Republic, the very foundation of constitutional government."[6]

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

(Nos. 1873 and 1885.—October Term, 1970)

(1873)

NEW YORK TIMES COMPANY, PETITIONER, v. UNITED STATES

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit

(1885)

UNITED STATES, PETITIONER, v. THE WASHINGTON POST COMPANY ET AL.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit

[June 30, 1971]

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, with whom MR. JUSTICE BLACK joins, concurring.

While I join the opinion of the Court I believe it necessary to express my views more fully.

It should be noted at the outset that the First Amendment provides that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." That leaves, in my view, no room for governmental restraint on the press.[1]

There is, moreover, no statute barring the publication by the press of the material which the Times and Post seek to use. 18 U.S.C. § 793(e) provides that "who-tion, independent tribunals of justice will consider themselves in a peculiar manner the guardians of those rights; they will be an impenetrable bulwark against every assumption of power in the Legislative or Executive; they will be naturally led to resist every encroachment upon rights expressly stipulated for in the Constitution by the declaration of rights." 1 Annals of Congress 439 (1834).

---

[6] DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 365 (1937).

[1] See Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250, 267 (dissenting opinion of MR. JUSTICE BLACK), 284 (my dissenting opinion); Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 508 (my dissenting opinion which MR. JUSTICE BLACK joined); Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298, 339 (separate opinion of MR. JUSTICE BLACK which I joined); New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 293 (concurring opinion of MR. JUSTICE BLACK which I joined); Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 80 (my concurring opinion which MR. JUSTICE BLACK joined).

ever having unauthorized possession of, access to, or control over any document, writing, . . . or information relating to the national defense which information the possessor has reason to believe could be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of any foreign nation, willfully communicates . . . the same to any person not entitled to receive it . . . shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years or both."

The Government suggests that the word "communicates" is broad enough to encompass publication.

There are eight sections in the chapter on espionage and censorship, §§ 792–799. In three of those eight "publish" is specifically mentioned: § 794(b) provides "Whoever in time of war, with the intent that the same shall be communicated to the enemy, collects records, publishes, or communicates . . . [the disposition of armed forces]."

Section 797 prohibits "reproduces, publishes, sells, or gives away" photos of defense installations.

Section 798 relating to cryptography prohibits: "communicates, furnishes, transmits, or otherwise makes available . . . or publishes."[2]

Thus it is apparent that Congress was capable of and did distinguish between publishing and communication in the various sections of the Espionage Act.

The other evidence that § 793 does not apply to the press is a rejected version of § 793. That version read: "During any national emergency resulting from a war to which the U.S. is a party or from threat of such a war, the President may, by proclamation, prohibit the publishing or communicating of, or the attempting to publish or communicate any information relating to the national defense, which in his judgment is of such character that it is or might be useful to the enemy." During the debates in the Senate the First Amendment was specifically cited and that provision was defeated. 55 Cong. Rec. 2166.

Judge Gurfein's holding in the Times case that this Act does not apply to this case was therefore preeminently sound. Moreover, the Act of September 23, 1950, in amending 18 U.S.C. § 793 states in § 1(b) that:

> "Nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorize, require, or establish military or civilian censorship or in any way to limit or infringe upon freedom of the press or of speech as guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and no regulation shall be promulgated hereunder having that effect." 64 Stat. 987.

Thus Congress has been faithful to the command of the First Amendment in this area.

So any power that the Government possesses must come from its "inherent power."

The power to wage war is "the power to wage war successfully." See Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81, 93. But the war power stems from a declaration of war. The Constitution by Article I, § 8, gives Congress, not the President, power "to declare war." Nowhere are presidential wars authorized. We need not decide therefore what leveling effect the war power of Congress might have.

These disclosures[3] may have a serious impact. But that is no basis for sanctioning a previous restrain on the press. As stated by Chief Justice Hughes in Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 719–720:

> ". . . While reckless assaults upon public men, and efforts to bring obloquy upon those who are endeavoring faithfully to discharge official duties, exert a baleful influence and deserve the severest condemnation in public opinion, it cannot be said that this abuse is greater, and it is believed to be less, than that which characterized the period in which our institutions took shape. Meanwhile, the administration of government has become more complex, the opportunities for malfeasance and corruption have multiplied, crime has grown to most serious proportions, and the danger of its protection by unfaithful officials and of the impairment of the fundamental security of life and property by criminal alliances and official neglect, emphasizes

---

[2] These papers contain data concerning the communications system of the United States, the publication of which is made a crime. But the criminal sanction is not urged by the United States as the basis of equity power.

[3] There are numerous sets of this material in existence and they apparently are not under any controlled custody. Moreover, the President has sent a set to the Congress. We start then with a case where there already is rather wide distribution of the material that is destined for publicity, not secrecy. I have gone over the material listed in the in camera brief of the United States. It is all history, not future events. None of it is more recent than 1968.

> the primary need of a vigilant and courageous press, especially in great cities. The fact that the liberty of the press may be abused by miscreant purveyors of scandal does not make any the less necessary the immunity of the press from previous restraint in dealing with official misconduct."

As we stated only the other day in Organization for a Better Austin v. Keefe, — U.S. —, "any prior restraint on expression comes to this Court with a 'heavy presumption' against its constitutional validity."

The Government says that it has inherent powers to go into court and obtain an injunction to protect that national interest, which in this case is alleged to be national security.

Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, repudiated that expansive doctrine in no uncertain terms.

The dominant purpose of the First Amendment was to prohibit the widespread practice of governmental suppression of embarrassing information. It is common knowledge that the First Amendment was adopted against the widespread use of the common law of seditious libel to punish the dissemination of material that is embarrassing to the powers-that-be. See Emerson, The System of Free Expressions, c. V (1970); Chafee, Free Speech in the United States, c. XIII (1941). The present cases will, I think, go down in history as the most dramatic illustration of that principle. A debate of large proportions goes on in the Nation over our posture in Vietnam. That debate antedated the disclosure of the contents of the present documents. The latter are highly relevant to the debate in progress.

Secrecy in government is fundamentally anti-democratic, perpetuating bureaucratic errors. Open debate and discussion of public issues are vital to our national health. On public questions there should be "open and robust debate." New York Times, Inc. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 269–270.

I would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals in the Post case, vacate the stay of the Court of Appeals in the Times case and direct that it affirm the District Court.

The stays in these cases that have been in effect for more than a week constitute a flouting of the principles of the First Amendment as interpreted in Near v. Minnesota.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

(Nos. 1873 and 1885.—October Term, 1970)

(1873)

NEW YORK TIMES COMPANY, PETITIONER, v. UNITED STATES

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit

—

(1885)

UNITED STATES, PETITIONER, v. THE WASHINGTON POST COMPANY ET AL.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit

[June 30, 1971]

MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN, concurring.

I

I write separately in these cases only to emphasize what should be apparent: that our judgment in the present cases may not be taken to indicate the propriety, in the future, of issuing temporary stays and restraining orders to block the publication of material sought to be suppressed by the Government. So far as I can determine, never before has the United States sought to enjoin a newspaper from publishing information in its possession. The relative novelty of the questions presented, the necessary haste with which decisions were reached, the magnitude of the interests asserted, and the fact that all the parties have concentrated their arguments upon the question whether permanent restraints were proper may have justified at least some of the restraints heretofore imposed in these cases. Certainly it is difficult to fault the several courts below for seeking to assure that the issues here involved were preserved for ultimate review by this Court. But even if it be assumed that some of the interim restraints were proper in the two cases before us, that assumption has no bearing upon the propriety of similar judicial action in the future. To begin with, there has now been ample time for reflection and judgment: whatever values there may be in the preservation of novel questions for appellate review may not support any restraints in the future. More important, the First Amendment stands as an absolute bar to the imposition of judicial restraints in circumstances of the kind presented by these cases.

II

The error which has pervaded these cases from the outset was the granting of any injunctive relief whatsoever, interim or otherwise. The entire thrust of the Government's claim throughout these cases has been that publication of the material sought to be enjoined "could," or "might," or "may" prejudice the national interest in various ways. But the First Amendment tolerates absolutely no prior judicial restraints of the press predicated upon surmise or conjecture that untoward consequences may result.* Our cases, it is true, have indicated that there is a single, extremely narrow class of cases in which the First Amendment's ban on prior judicial restraint may be overriden. Our cases have thus far indicated that such cases may arise only when the Nation "is at war," Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 52 (1919), during which times "no one would question but that a Government might prevent actual obstruction to its recruiting service or the publication of the sailing dates of transports or the number and location of troops." Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 716 (1931). Even if the present world situation were assumed to be tantamount to a time of war, or if the power of presently available armaments would justify even in peacetime the suppression of information that would set in motion a nuclear holocaust, in neither of these actions has the Government presented or even alleged that publication of items from or based upon the material at isue would cause the happening of an event of that nature. "The chief purpose of [the First Amendment's] guarantee [is] to prevent previous restraints upon publication." Near v. Minnesota, supra, at 713. Thus, only governmental allegation and proof that publication must inevitably, directly and immediately cause the occurrence of an event kindred to imperiling the safety of a transport already at sea can support even the issuance of an interim restraining order. In no event may mere conclusions be sufficient: for if the Executive Branch seeks judicial aid in preventing publication, it must inevitably submit the basis upon which that aid is sought to scrutiny by the judiciary. And therefore, every restraint issued in this case, whatever its form, has violated the First Amendment—and none the less so because that restraint was justified as necessary to afford the court an opportunity to examine the claim more thoroughly. Unless and until the Government has clearly made out its case, the First Amendment commands that no injunction may issue.

Freedman* v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51 (1965), and similar cases regarding temporary restraints of allegedly obscene materials are not in point. For those cases rest upon the proposition that "obscenity is not protected by the freedoms of speech and press." Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957). Here there is no question but that the material sought to be suppressed is within the protection of the First Amendment; the only question is whether, notwithstanding that fact, its publication may be enjoined for a time because of the presence of an overwhelming national interest. Similarly, copyright cases have no pertinence here: the Government is not asserting an interest in the particular form of words chosen in the documents, but is seeking to suppress the ideas expressed therein. And the copyright laws, of course, protect only the form of expression and not the ideas expressed.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

(Nos. 1873 and 1885.—October Term, 1970)

(1873)

NEW YORK TIMES COMPANY, PETITIONER, v. UNITED STATES

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit

—

(1885)

UNITED STATES, PETITIONER, v. THE WASHINGTON POST COMPANY ET AL.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit

[June 30, 1971]

MR. JUSTICE STEWART, with whom MR. JUSTICE WHITE joins, concurring.

In the governmental structure created by our Constitution, the Executive is endowed with enormous power in the two related areas of national defense and international relations. This power, largely unchecked by the Legislative[1] and Judicial[2] branches, has been pressed to the very hilt since the advent of the nuclear missile age. For better or for worse, the simple fact is that a President of the United States possesses vastly greater constitutional independence in these two vital areas of power than does, say, a prime minister of a country with a parliamentary form of government.

In the absence of the governmental checks and balances present in other areas of our national life, the only effective restraint upon executive policy and power in the areas of national defense and international affairs may lie in an enlightened citizenry—in an informed and critical public opinion which alone can here protect the values of democratic government. For this reason, it is perhaps here that a press that is alert, aware, and free most vitally serves the basic purpose of the First Amendment. For without an informed and free press there cannot be an enlightened people.

Yet it is elementary that the successful conduct of international diplomacy and the maintenance of an effective national defense require both confidentiality and secrecy. Other nations can hardly deal with this Nation in an atmosphere of mutual trust unless they can be assured that their confidences will be kept. And within our own executive departments, the development of considered and intelligent international policies would be impossible if those charged with their formulation could not communicate with each other freely, frankly, and in confidence. In the area of basic national defense the frequent need for absolute secrecy is, of course, self-evident.

I think there can be but one answer to this dilemma, if dilemma it be. The responsibility must be where the power is.[3] If the Constitution gives the Executive a large degree of unshared power in the conduct of foreign affairs and the maintenance of our national defense, then under the Constitution the Executive must have the largely unshared duty to determine and preserve the degree of internal security necessary to exercise that power successfully. It is an awesome responsibility, requiring judgment and wisdom of a high order. I should suppose that moral, political, and practical considerations would dictate that a very first principle of that wisdom would be an insistence upon avoiding secrecy for its own sake. For when everything is classified, then nothing is classified, and the system becomes one to be disregarded by the cynical or the careless, and to be manipulated by those intent on self-protection or self-promotion. I should suppose, in short, that the hallmark of a truly effective internal security system would be the maximum possible disclosure, recognizing that secrecy can best be preserved only when credibility is truly maintained. But be that as it may, it is clear to me that it is the constitutional duty of the Executive—as a matter of sovereign perogative and not as a matter of law as the courts know law—through the promulgation and enforcement of executive regulations, to protect the confidentiality necessary to carry out its responsibilities in the fields of international relations and national defense.

---

[1] The President's power to make treaties and to appoint ambassadors is of course limited by the requirement of Article II, § 1, of the Constitution that he obtain the advice and consent of the Senate. Article I, § 8, empowers Congress to "raise and support Armies," and "provide and maintain a Navy." And, of course, Congress alone can declare war. This power was last exercised almost 30 years ago at the inception of World War II. Since the end of that war in 1945, the Armed Forces of the United States have suffered approximately half a million casualties in various parts of the world.

[2] See Chicago & Southern Air Lines v. Waterman Steamship Corp., 333 U.S. 103; Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81; United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304; cf. Mora v. McNamara, cert. denied 389 U.S. 934.

[3] "It is quite apparent that if, in the maintenance of our international relations, embarrassment—perhaps serious embarrassment—is to be avoided and success for our aims achieved, congressional legislation which is to be made effective through negotiation and inquiry within the international field must often accord to the President a degree of discretion and freedom from statutory restriction which would not be admissible were domestic affairs alone involved. Moreover, he, not Congress, has the better opportunity of knowing the conditions which prevail in foreign countries, and especially is this true in time of war. He has his confidential sources of information. He has his agents in the form of diplomatic, consular and other officials. Secrecy in respect of information gathered by them may be highly necessary, and the premature disclosure of it productive of harmful results. Indeed, so clearly is this true that the first President refused to accede to a request to lay before the House of Representatives the instructions, correspondence and documents relating to the negotiation of the Jay Treaty—a refusal the wisdom of which was recognized by the House itself and has never since been doubted. . . ." United States v. Curtiss-Wright Corp., 299 U.S. 304, at 320.

This is not to say that Congress and the courts have no role to play. Undoubtedly Congress has the power to enact specific and appropriate criminal laws to protect government property and preserve government secrets. Congress has passed such laws, and several of them are of very colorable relevance to the apparent circumstances of these cases. And if a criminal prosecution is instituted, it will be the responsibility of the courts to decide the applicability of the criminal law under which the charge is brought. Moreover, if Congress should pass a specific law authorozing civil proceedings in this field, the courts would likewise have the duty to decide the constitutionality of such a law as well as its applicability to the facts proved.

But in the cases before us we are asked neither to construe specific regulations nor to apply specific laws. We are asked, instead, to perform a function that the Constitution gave to the Executive, not the Judiciary. We are asked, quite simply, to prevent the publication by two newspapers of material that the Executive Branch insists should not, in the national interest, be published. I am convinced that the Executive is correct with respect to some of the documents involved. But I cannot say that disclosure of any of them will surely result in direct, immediate, and irreparable damage to our Nation or its people. That being so, there can under the First Amendment be but one judicial resolution of the issues before us. I join the judgments of the Court.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

(Nos. 1873 and 1885.—October Term, 1970)

(1873)

New York Times Company, Petitioner, v. United States

On Writ of Certiorari in the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit

(1885)

—

United States, Petitioner, v. The Washington Post Company et al.

On Writ of Certiorari in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit

[June 30, 1971]

Mr. Justice White, with whom Mr. Justice Stewart joins, concurring.

I concur in today's judgments, but only because of the concededly extraordinary protection against prior restraints enjoyed by the press under our constitutional system. I do not say that in no circumstances would the First Amendment permit an injunction against publishing information about government plans or operations.[1] Nor, after examining the materials the Government characterizes as the most sensitive and destructive, can I deny that revelation of these documents will do substantial damage to public interests. Indeed, I am confident that their disclosure will have that result. But I nevertheless agree that the United States has not satisfied the very heavy burden which it must meet to warrant an injunction against publication in these cases, at least in the absence of express and appropriately limited congressional authorization for prior restraints in circumstances such as these.

The Government's position is simply stated: The responsibility of the Executive for the conduct of the foreign affairs and for the security of the Nation is so basic that the President is entitled to an injunction against publication of a newspaper story whenever he can convince a court that the information to be revealed threatens "grave and irreparable" injury to the public interest;[2] and the injunction should issue whether or not the material to be published is classified, whether or not publication would be lawful under relevant criminal statutes enacted by Congress and regardless of the circumstances by which the newspaper came into possession of the information.

At least in the absence of legislation by Congress, based on its own investigations and findings, I am quite unable to agree that the inherent powers of the Executive and the courts reach so far as to authorize remedies having such sweeping potential for inhibiting publications by the press. Much of the difficulty inheres in the "grave and irreparable danger" standard suggested by the United States. If the United States were to have judgment under such a standard in these cases, our decision would be of little guidance to other courts in other cases, for the material at issue here would not be available from the Court's opinion or from public records, nor would it be published by the press. Indeed, even today where we hold that the United States has not met its burden, the material remains sealed in court records and it is properly not discussed in today's opinions. Moreover, because the material poses substantial dangers to national interests and because of the hazards of criminal sanctions, a responsible press may choose never to publish the more sensitive materials. To sustain the Government in these cases would start the courts down a long and hazardous road that I am not willing to travel as least without congressional guidance and direction.

It is not easy to reject the proposition urged by the United States and to deny relief on its good-faith claims in these cases that publication will work serious damage to the country. But that discomfiture is considerably dispelled by the infrequency of prior restraint cases. Normally, publication will occur and the damage be done before the Government has either opportunity or grounds for suppression. So here, publication has already begun and a substantial part of the threatened damage has already occurred. The fact of a massive breakdown in security is known, access to the documents by many unauthorized people is undeniable and the efficacy of equitable relief against these or other newspapers to avert anticipated damage is doubtful at best.

What is more, terminating the ban on publication of the relatively few sensitive documents the Government now seeks to suppress does not mean that the law either requires or invites newspapers or others to publish them or that they will be immune from criminal action if they do. Prior restraints require an unusually heavy justification under the First Amendment; but failure by the Government to justify prior restraints does not measure its constitutional entitlement to a conviction for criminal publication. That the Government mistakenly chose to proceed by injunction does not mean that it could not successfully proceed in another way.

---

[1] The Congress has authorized a strain of prior restraints against private parties in certain instances. The National Labor Relations Board routinely issues cease-and-desist orders against employers whom it finds have threatened or coerced employees in the exercise of protected rights. See 29 U.S.C. § 160(c). Similarly, the Federal Trade Commission is empowered to impose cease-and-desist orders against unfair methods of competition. 15 U.S.C. § 45(c). Such orders can, and quite often do, restrict what may be spoken or written under certain circumstances. See, e.g., NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 616–620 (1969). Art. I, § 8 of the Constitution authorizes Congress to secure the "exclusive right" of authors to their writings, and no one denies that a newspaper can properly be enjoined from publishing the copyrighted works of another. See Westermann Co. v. Dispatch Co., 249 U.S. 100 (1919). Newspapers do themselves rely from time to time on the copyright as a means of protecting their accounts of important events. However, those enjoined under the statutes relating to the National Labor Relations Board and the Federal Trade Commission are private parties, not the press; and when the press is enjoined under the copyright laws the complainant is a private copyright holder enforcing a private right. These situations are quite distinct from the Government's request for an injunction against publishing information about the affairs of government, a request admittedly not based on any statute.

[2] The "grave and irreparable danger" standard is that asserted by the Government in this Court. In remanding to Judge Gurfein for further hearings in the Times litigation, five members of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit directed him to determine whether disclosure of certain items specified with particularity by the Government would "pose such grave and immediate danger to the security of the United States as to warrant their publication being enjoined."

When the Espionage Act was under consideration in 1917, Congress eliminated from the bill a provision that would have given the President broad powers in time of war to proscribe, under threat of criminal penalty, the publication of various categories of information related to the national defense.[3] Congress at that time was unwilling to clothe the President with such far-reaching powers to monitor the press, and those opposed to this part of the legislation assumed that a necessary concomitant of such power was the power to "filter out the news to the people through some man." 55 Cong. Rec. 2008 (1917) (remarks of Senator Ashurst). However, these same members of Congress appeared to have little doubt that newspapers would be subject to criminal prosecution if they insisted on publishing information of the type Congress had itself determined should not be revealed. Senator Ashurst, for example, was quite sure that the editor of such a newspaper "should be punished if he did publish information as to the movements of the fleet, the troops, the aircraft, the location of powder factories, the location of defense works, and all that sort of thing." 55 Cong. Rec. 2009 (1917).[4]

The criminal code contains numerous provisions potentially relevant to these cases. Section 797[5] makes it a crime to publish certain photographs or drawings of military installations. Section 798,[6] also in precise language, proscribes knowing and willful publication of any classified information concerning the cryptographic systems or communication intelligence activities of the United States as well as any information obtained from communication intelligence operations.[7] If any of the material here at issue is of this nature, the newspapers are presumably now on full notice of the position of the United States and must face the consequences if they publish. I would have no difficulty in sustaining convictions under these sections on facts that would not justify the intervention of equity and the imposition of a prior restraint.

---

[3] "Whoever, in time of war, in violation of reasonable regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall publish any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense calculated to be useful to the enemy, shall be punished by a fine . . . or by imprisonment. . . ." 55 Cong. Rec. 2100 (1917).

[4] Senator Ashurst also urged that ". . . 'freedom of the press' means freedom from the restraints of a censor, means the absolute liberty and right to publish whatever you wish; but you take your chances of punishment in the courts of your country for the violation of the laws of libel, slander and treason." 55 Cong. Rec. 2105 (1917).

[5] Section 797, 18 U.S.C., provides:

"On and after thirty days from the date upon which the President defines any vital military or naval installation or equipment as being within the category contemplated under section 795 of this title, whoever reproduces, publishes, sells, or gives away any photograph, sketch, picture, drawing, map, or graphical representation of the vital military or naval installations or equipment so defined, without first obtaining permission of the commanding officer of the military or naval post, camp, or station concerned, or higher authority, unless such photograph, sketch, picture, drawing, map, or graphical representation has clearly indicated thereon that it has been censored by the proper military or naval authority, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both."

[6] In relevant part 18 U.S.C. § 798 provides:

"(a) Whoever knowingly and willfully communicates, furnishes transmits, or otherwise makes available to an unauthorized person, or publishes, or uses in any manner prejudicial to the safety or interest of the United States or for the benefit of any foreign government to the detriment of the United States any classified information—

"(1) concerning the nature, preparation, or use of any code, cipher, or cryptographic system of the United States or any foreign government; or

"(2) concerning the design, construction, use, maintenance, or repair of any device, apparatus, or appliance used or prepared or planned for use by the United States or any foreign government for cryptographic or communication intelligence purposes; or

"(3) concerning the communication intelligence activities of the United States or any foreign government; or

"(4) obtained by the processes of communication intelligence from the communications of any foreign government, knowing the same to have been obtained by such processes—

"Shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both."

[7] The purport of 18 U.S.C. § 798 is clear. Both the House and Senate Reports on the bill, in identical terms, speak of furthering the security of the United States by preventing disclosure of information concerning the cryptographic systems and the communication intelligence systems of the United States, and explaining that "[t]his bill makes it a crime to reveal the methods, techniques, and matériel used in the transmission by this Nation of enciphered or coded messages. . . . Further, it makes it a crime to reveal methods used by this Nation in breaking the secret codes of a foreign nation. It also prohibits under certain

The same would be true under those sections of the criminal code casting a wider net to protect the national defense. Section 793(e)[8] makes it a criminal act for any unauthorized possessor of a document "relating to national defense" either (1) willfully to communicate or cause to be communicated that document to any person not entitled to receive it or (2) willfully to retain the document and fail to deliver it to an officer of the United States entitled to receive it. The subsection was added in 1950 because pre-existing law provided no penalty for the unauthorized possessor unless demand for the documents was made.[9] "The penalties the divulging of any information which may have come into this Government's hands as a result of such a code-breaking." H.R. Rep. No. 1895, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., 1 (1950). The narrow reach of the statute was explained as covering "only a small category of classified matter, a category which is both vital and vulnerable to an almost unique degree." Id., at 2. Existing legislation wa deemed inadequate.

---

"At present two other acts protect this information, but only in a limited way. These are the Espionage Act of 1917 (40 Stat. 217) and the act of June 10, 1933 (48 Stat. 122). Under the first, unauthorized revelation of information of this kind can be penalized only if it can be proved that the person making the revelation did so with an intent to injure the United States. Under the second, only diplomatic codes and messages transmitted in diplomatic codes are protected. The present bill is designed to protect against knowing and willful publication or any other revelation of all important information affecting the United States communication intelligence operations and all direct information about all United States codes and ciphers." Ibid.

Section 798 obviously was intended to cover publications by nonemployees of the Government and to ease the Government's burden in obtaining convictions. See H.R. Rep. No. 1895, supra, at 2–5. The identical Senate Report, not cited in parallel in the next of this footnote, is S. Rep. No. 111, 81st Cong., 1st Sess. (1949).

[8] Section 793(e) of 18 U.S.C. provides that:

"(e) Whoever having unauthorized possession of, access, to or control over any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blueprint, plan, map, model, instrument, appliance, or note relating to the national defense, or information relating to the national defense which information the possessor has reason to believe could be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of any foreign nation, willfully communicates, delivers, transmits or causes to be communicated, delivered, or transmitted, or attempts to communicate, deliver, transmit or cause to be communicated, delivered, or transmitted the same to any person not entitled to receive it, or willfully retains the same and fails to deliver it to the officer or employee of the United States entitled to receive it;"

is guilty of an offense punishable by 10 years in prison, a $10,000 fine, or both. It should also be noted that 18 U.S.C. § 793(g), added in 1950, see 64 Stat. 1004–1005 (1950); S. Rep. No. 2369, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., 9 (1950), provides that "[i]f two or more persons conspire to violate any of the foregoing provisions of this section, and one or more of such persons do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, each of the parties to such conspiracy shall be subject to the punishment provided for the offense which is the object of such conspiracy."

[9] The amendment of § 793 that added subsection (e) was part of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950, which was in turn Title I of the Internal Security Act of 1950. See 64 Stat. 987 (1950). The report of the Senate Judiciary Committee best explains the purposes of the amendment:

"Section 18 of the bill amends section 793 of title 18 of the United States Code (espionage statute). The several paragraphs of section 793 of title 18 are designated as subsections (a) through (g) for purposes of convenient reference. The significant changes which would be made in section 793 of title 18 are as follows:

"(1) Amends the fourth paragraph of section 793, title 18 (subsec. (d)), to cover the unlawful dissemination of 'information relating to the national defense which information the possessor has reason to believe could be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of any foreign nation.' The phrase 'which information the possessor has reason to believe could be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of any foreign nation' would modify only 'information relating to the national defense' and not the other items enumerated in the subsection. The fourth paragraph of section 793 is also amended to provide that only those with lawful possession of the items relating to national defense enumerated therein may retain them subject to demand therefor. Those who have unauthorized possession of such items are treated in a separate subsection.

"(2) Amends section 793, title 18 (subsec. (e)), to provide that unauthorized possessors of items enumerated in paragraph 4 of section 793 must surrender possession thereof to the proper authorities without demand. Existing law provides no penalty for the unauthorized possession of such items unless a demand for them is made by the person entitled to receive them. The dangers surrounding the unauthorized possession of such items are self-evident, and it is deemed advisable to require their surrender in such a case, regardless of demand, especially since their unauthorized possession may be unknown to the authorities who would otherwise make the demand. The only difference between subsection (d) and subsection (e) of section 793 is that a demand by the person entitled to receive the items would be a necessary element of an offense under subsection (d) where the possession is lawful, whereas such a demand would not be a necessary element of an offense under subsection (e) where the possession is unauthorized." S. Rep. No. 2369, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., 8–9 (1950) (emphasis added).

It seems clear from the foregoing, contrary to the intimations of the District Court for the Southern District of New York in this case, that in prosecuting for communicating or withholding a "document" as contrasted with similar action with respect to "information" dangers surrounding the unauthorized possession of such items are self-evident, and it is deemed advisable to require their surrender in such a case, regardless of demand, especially since their unauthorized possession may be unknown to the authorities who would otherwise make the demand." S. Rep. No. 2369, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., 9 (1950). Of course, in the cases before us, the unpublished documents have been demanded by the United States and their import has been made known at least to counsel for the newspapers involved. In Gorin v. United States, 312 U.S. 19, 28 (1941), the words "national defense" as used in a predecessor of § 793 were held by a unanimous court to have "a well understood connotation"—a "generic concept of broad connotations, referring to the military and naval establishments and the related activities of national preparedness"—and to be "sufficiently definite to apprise the public of prohibited activities" and to be consonant with due process. 312 U.S., at 28. Also, as construed by the Court in Gorin, information "connected with the national defense" is obviously not limited to that threatening "grave and irreparable" injury to the United States.[10]

It is thus clear that Congress has addressed itself to the problems of protecting the security of the country and the national defense from unauthorized disclosure of potentially damaging information. Cf. Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 585–586 (1952); see also id., at 593–628 (Frankfurter, J., concurring). It has not, however, authorized the injunctive remedy against threatened publication. It has apparently been satisfied to rely on criminal sanctions and their deterrent effect on the responsible as well as the irresponsible press. I am not, of course, saying that either of these newspapers has yet committed a crime or that either would commit a crime if they published all the material now in their possession. That matter must await resolution in the context of a criminal proceeding if one is instituted by the United States. In that event, the issue of guilt or innocence would be determined by procedures and standards quite different from those that have purported to govern these injunctive proceedings.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

(Nos. 1873 and 1885.—October term, 1970)

(1873)

New York Times Company, Petitioner, v. United States

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit

—

(1885)

United States, Petitioner, v. The Washington Post Company et al.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit

[June 30, 1971]

Mr. Justice Marshall, concurring.

The Government contends that the only issue in this case is whether in a suit by the United States, "the First Amendment bars a court from prohibiting a the Government need not prove an intent to injure the United States or to benefit a foreign nation but only willful and knowing conduct. The District Court relied on Gorin v. United States, 312 U.S. 19 (1941). But that case arose under other parts of the predecessor to § 793, see 312 U.S., at 21–22—parts that imposed different intent standards not repeated in § 793(d) or § 793(e). Cf. 18 U.S.C. §§ 793(a), (b), and (c). Also, from the face of subsection (e) and from the context of the act of which it was a part, it seems undeniable that a newspaper, as well as others unconnected with the Government, are vulnerable to prosecution under § 793(e) if they communicate or withhold the materials covered by that section. The District Court ruled that "communication" did not reach publication by a newspaper of documents relating to the national defense. I intimate no views on the correctness of that conclusion. But neither communication nor publication is necessary to violate the subsection.

---

[10] Also relevant is 18 U.S.C. § 794. Subsection (b) thereof forbids in time of war the collection or publication, with intent that it shall be communicated to the enemy, any informanewspaper from publishing material whose disclosure would pose a grave and immediate danger to the security of the United States." Brief of the Government, at 6. With all due respect, I believe the ultimate issue in this case is even more basic than the one posed by the Solicitor General. The issue is whether this Court or the Congress has the power to make law.

In this case there is no problem concerning the President's power to classify information as "secret" or "top secret." Congress has specifically recognized Presidential authority, which has been formally exercised in Executive Order 10501, to classify documents and information. See, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 798; 50 U.S.C. § 783.[1] Nor is there any issue here regarding the President's power as Chief Executive and Commander-in-Chief to protect national security by disciplining employees who disclose information and by taking precautions to prevent leaks.

The problem here is whether in this particular case the Executive Branch has authority to invoke the equity jurisdiction of the courts to protect what it believes to be the national interest. See In re Debs, 158 U.S. 564, 584 (1895). The Government argues that in addition to the inherent power of any government to protect itself, the President's power to conduct foreign affairs and his position as Commander-in-Chief give him authority to impose censorship on the press to protect his ability to deal effectively with foreign nations and to conduct the military affairs of the country. Of course, it is beyond cavil that the President has broad powers by virtue of his primary responsibility for the conduct of our foreign affairs and his position as Commander-in-Chief. Chicago & Southern Air Lines, Inc. v. Waterman Corp., 333 U.S. 103 (1948); Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81, 93 (1943); United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Co., 299 U.S. 304 (1936).[2] And in some situations it may be that under whatever inherent powers the Government may have, as well as the implicit authority derived from the President's mandate to conduct foreign affairs and to act as Commander-in-Chief there is a basis for the invocation of the equity jurisdiction of this Court as an aid to prevent the publication of material damaging to "national security," however that term may be defined.

It would, however, be utterly inconsistent with the concept of separation of power for this Court to use its power of contempt to prevent behavior that Congress has specifically declined to prohibit. There would be a similar damage to the basic concept of these coequal branches of Government if when the Executive has adequate authority granted by Congress to protect "national security" it can choose instead to invoke the contempt power of a court to enjoin the threatened conduct. The Constitution provides that Congress shall make laws, the President execute laws, and courts interpret law. Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952). It did not provide for government by injunction in which the courts and the Executive can "make law" without regard to the action of Congress. It may be more convenient for the Executive if it need only convince a judge to prohibit conduct rather than to ask the Congress to pass a law and it may be more convenient to enforce a contempt order than seek a criminal conviction in a jury trial. Moreover, it may be considered politically wise to get a court to share the responsibility for arresting those who the Executive has probable cause to believe are violating the law. But convenience and political considerations of the moment do not justify a basic departure from the principles of our system of government.

In this case we are not faced with a situation where Congress has failed to provide the Executive with broad power to protect the Nation from disclosure of damaging state secrets. Congress has on several occasions given extensive consideration to the problem of protecting the military and strategic secrets of the United States. This consideration has resulted in the enactment of statutes making it a crime to receive, disclose, communicate, withhold, and publish certain documents, photographs, instruments, appliances, and information. The bulk of these statutes are found to chapter 37 of U.S.C., Title 18, entitled Espionage and Censorship.[3] In that chapter, Congress has provided penalties ranging from a $10,000 fine to death for violating the various statutes.

---

tion with respect to the movements of military forces, "or with respect to the plans or conduct . . . of any naval or military operations . . . or any other information relating to the public defense, which might be useful to the enemy. . . ."

[1] See n. 3, infra.

[2] But see Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116 (1958); Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952).

[3] There are several other statutory provisions prohibiting and punishing the dissemination of information, the disclosure of which Congress thought sufficiently imperiled national security to warrant that result. These include 42 U.S.C. §§ 2161 through 2166 relating to the authority of the Atomic Energy Commission to classify and declassify "Restricted

Thus it would seem that in order for this Court to issue an injunction it would require a showing that such an injunction would enhance the already existing power of the Government to act. See Bennett v. Laman, 277 N.Y. 368, 14 N. E. 2d 439 (1938). It is a traditional axiom of equity that a court of equity will not do a useless thing just as it is a traditional axiom that equity will not enjoin the commission of a crime. See Z. Chaffe & E. Re, Equity 935–954 (5th ed. 1967) ; 1 H. Joyce, Injunctions §§ 58–60a (1909). Here there has been no attempt to make such a showing. The Solicitor General does not even mentionin his brief whether the Government considers there to be probable cause to believe a crime has been committed or whether there is a conspiracy to commit future crimes.

If the Government had attempted to show that there was no effective remedy under traditional criminal law, it would have had to show that there is no arguably applicable statute. Of course, at this stage this Court could not and cannot determine whether there has been a violation of a particular statute nor decide the constitutionality of any statute. Whether a good-faith prosecution could have been instituted under any statute could, however, be determined.

At least one of the many statutes in this area seems relevant to this case. Congress has provided in 18 U.S.C. § 793(e) that whoever "having unauthorized possession of, access to, or control over any document, writing, code book, signal book . . . or note relating to the national defense, or information relating to the national defense which information the possessor has reason to believe could be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of any foreign nation, willfully communicates, delivers, transmits . . . the same to any person not entitled to receive it, or willfully retains the same and fails to deliver it to the officer or employee of the United States entitled to receive it . . . shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both." 18 U.S.C. § 793(e). Congress has also made it a crime to conspire to commit any of the offenses listed in 18 U.S.C. § 793(e).

It is true that Judge Gurfein found that Congress had not made it a crime to publish the items and material specified in § 793(e) : He found that the words "communicates, delivers, transmits . . ." did not refer to publication of newspaper stories. And that view has some support in the legislative history and conforms with the past practice of using the statute only to prosecute those charged with ordinary espionage. But see 103 Cong. Rec. 10449 (remarks of Sen. Humphrey). Judge Gurfein's view of the statute is not, however, the only plausible construction that could be given. See my Brother WHITE's concurring opinion.

Even if it is determined that the Government could not in good faith bring criminal prosecutions against the New York Times and the Washington Post, it is clear that Congress has specifically rejected passing legislation that would have clearly given the President the power he seeks here and made the current activity of the newspapers unlawful. When Congress specifically declines to make conduct unlawful it is not for this Court to redecide those issues—to overrule Congress. See Youngstown Sheet & Tube v. Sawyer, 345 U.S. 579 (1952).

On at least two occasions Congress has refused to enact legislation that would have made the conduct engaged in here unlawful and given the President the power that he seeks in this case. In 1917 during the debate over the original Espionage Act, still the basic provisions of § 793, Congress rejected a proposal to give the President in time of war or threat of war authority to directly prohibit by proclamation the publication of information relating to national defense that might be useful to the enemy. The proposal provided that:

Data" ["Restricted Data" is a term of art employed uniquely by the Atomic Energy Act]. Specifically, 42 U.S.C. § 2162 authorizes the Atomic Energy Commission to classify certain information. 42 U.S.C. § 2274, subsection (a) provides penalties for a person who "communicates, transmits, or discloses . . . with intent to injure the United States or an intent to secure an advantage to any foreign nation. . . ." "Restricted Data." Subsection (b) of § 2274 provides lesser penalties for one who "communicates, transmits, or discloses" such information "with reason to believe such data will be utilized to injure the United States or to secure an advantage to any foreign nation. . . ." Other sections of Title 42 of the U.S.C. dealing with atomic energy prohibit and punish acquisition, removal, concealment, tampering with, alteration, mutilation, or destruction of documents incorporating "Restricted Data" and provide penalties for employees and former employees of the Atomic Energy Commission, the armed services, contractors and licensees of the Atomic Energy Commission. 42 U.S.C. §§ 2276, 2277. Title 50 U.S.C. Appendix § 781 (part of the National Defense Act of 1941, as amended, 55 Stat. 236) prohibits the making of any sketch or other representation of military installations or any military equipment located on any military installation, as specified; and indeed Congress in the National Defense Act conferred jurisdiction on federal district courts over civil actions "to enjoin any violation" thereof. 50 U.S.C. App. § 1152. 50 U.S.C. § 783(b) makes it unlawful for any officers or employees of the United States or any corporation which is owned by the United States to communicate material which has been "classified" by the President to any person whom that governmental employee knows or has reason to believe is an agent or representative of any foreign government or any Communist organization.

> "During any national emergency resulting from a war to which the United States is a party, or from threat of such a war, the President my, by proclamation, prohibit the publishing or communicating of, or the attempting to publish or communicate any information relating to the national defense which, in his judgment, is of such character that it is or might be useful to the enemy. Whoever violates any such prohibition shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives or the publication of the same." 55 Cong. Rec. 1763.

Congress rejected this proposal after war against Germany had been declared even though many believed that there was a grave national emergency and that the threat of security leaks and espionage were serious. The Executive has not gone to Congress and requested that the decision to provide such power be reconsidered. Instead, the Executive comes to this Court and asks that it be granted the power Congress refused to give.

In 1957 the United States Commission on Government Security found that "[a]airplane journals, scientific periodicals, and even the daily newspaper have featured articles containing information and other data which should have been deleted in whole or in part for security reasons." In response to this problem the Commission, which was chaired by Senator Cotton, proposed that "Congress enact legislation making it a crime for any person willfully to disclose without proper authorization, for any purpose whatever, information classified 'secret' or 'top secret,' knowing, or having reasonable grounds to believe, such information to have been so classified." Report of Commission on Government Security 619–620 (1957). After substantial floor discussion on the proposal, it was rejected. See 103 Cong. Rec. 10447–10450. If the proposal that Senator Cotton championed on the floor had been enacted, the publication of the documents involved here would certainly have been a crime. Congress refused, however, to make it a crime. The Government is here asking this Court to remake that decision. This Court has no such power.

Either the Government has the power under statutory grant to use traditional crimnal law to protect the country or, if there is no basis for arguing that Congress has made the activity a crime, it is plain that Congress has specifically refused to grant the authority the Government seeks from this Court. In either case this Court does not have authority to grant the requested relief. It is not for this Court to fling itself into every breach perceived by some Government official nor is it for this Court to take on itself the burden of enacting law, especially law that Congress has refused to pass.

I believe that the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia should be affirmed and the judgement of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit should be reversed insofar as it remands the case for further hearings.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

(Nos. 1873 and 1885.—October Term, 1970)

(1873)

NEW YORK TIMES COMPANY, PETITIONER, v. UNITED STATES

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit

—

(1885)

UNITED STATES, PETITIONER, v. THE WASHINGTON POST COMPANY ET AL.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit

[June 30, 1971]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER, dissenting.

So clear are the constitutional limitations on prior restraint against expression, that from the time of Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931), until recently in Organization for a Better Austin v. Keefe, —— U.S. —— (1971), we have had little occasion to be concerned with cases involving prior restraints against news reporting on matters of public interest. There is, therefore, little variation among the members of the Court in terms of resistance to prior restraints against publication. Adherence to this basic constitutional principle, however, does not make this case a simple one. In this case, the imperative of a free and unfettered press comes into collision with another imperative, the effective functioning of a complex modern government and specifically the effective exercise of certain constitutional powers of the Executive. Only those who view the First Amendment as an absolute in all circumstances—a view I respect, but reject—can find such a case as this to be simple or easy.

This case is not simple for another and more immediate reason. We do not know the facts of the case. No District Judge knew all the facts. No Court of Appeals judge knew all the facts. No member of this Court knows all the facts.

Why are we in this posture, in which only those judges to whom the First Amendment is absolute and permits of no restraint in any circumstances or for any reason, are really in a position to act?

I suggest we are in this posture because these cases have been conducted in unseemly haste. Mr. JUSTICE HARLAN covers the chronology of events demonstrating the hectic pressures under which these cases have been processed and I need not restate them. The prompt setting of these cases reflects our universal abhorrence of prior restraint. But prompt judicial action does not mean unjudicial haste.

Here, moreover, the frenetic haste is due in large part to the manner in which the Times proceeded from the date it obtained the purloined documents. It seems reasonably clear now that the haste precluded reasonable and deliberate judicial treatment of these cases and was not warranted. The precipitous action of this Court aborting a trial not yet completed is not the kind of judicial conduct which ought to attend the disposition of a great issue.

The newspapers make a derivative claim under the First Amendment; they denominate this right as the public right-to-know; by implication, the Times asserts a sole trusteeship of that right by virtue of its journalist "scoop." The right is asserted as an absolute. Of course, the First Amendment right itself is not an absolute, as Justice Holmes so long ago pointed out in his aphorism concerning the right to shout of fire in a crowded theater. There are other exceptions, some of which Chief Justice Hughes mentioned by way of example in Near v. Minnesota. There are no doubt other exceptions no one has had occasion to describe or discuss. Conceivably such exceptions may be lurking in these cases and would have been flushed had they been properly considered in the trial courts, free from unwarranted deadlines and frenetic pressures. A great issue of this kind should be tried in a judicial atmosphere conducive to thoughtful, reflective deliberation, especially when haste, in terms of hours, is unwarranted in light of the long period the Times, by its own choice, deferred publication.

It is not disputed that the Times has had unauthorized possession of the documents for three to four months, during which it has had its expert analysts studying them, presumably digesting them and preparing the material for publication. During all of this time, the Times, presumably in its capacity as trustee of the public's "right to know," has held up publication for purposes it considered proper and thus public knowledge was delayed. No doubt this was for a good reason: the analysis of 7,000 pages of complex material drawn from a vastly greater volume of material would inevitably take time and the writing of good news stories takes time. But why should the United States Government, from whom this information was illegally acquired by someone, along with all the counsel, trial judges, and appellate judges be placed under needless pressure? After these months of deferral, the alleged right-to-know has somehow and suddenly become a right that must be vindicated instanter.

Would it have been unreasonable, since the newspaper could anticipate the government's objections to release of secret material, to give the government an opportunity to review the entire collection and determine whether agreement could be reached on publication? Stolen or not, if security was not in fact jeopardized, much of the material could no doubt have been declassified, since it spans a period ending in 1968. With such an approach—one that great newspapers have in the past practiced and stated editorially to be the duty of an honorable press—the newspapers and government might well have narrowed the area of disagreement as to what was and was not publishable, leaving the remainder to be resolved in orderly litigation if necessary. To me it is hardly believable that a newspaper long regarded as a great institution in American life would fail to perform one of the basic and simple duties of every citizen with respect to the discovery or possession of stolen property or secret government documents. That duty, I had thought—perhaps naively—was to report forthwith, to responsible public officers. This duty rests on taxi drivers, Justices and the New York Times. The course followed by the Times, whether so calculated or not, removed any possibility of orderly litigation of the issues. If the action of the judges up to now has been correct, that result is sheer happenstance.[1]

Our grant of the writ before final judgment in the Times case aborted the trial in the District Court before it had made a complete record pursuant to the mandate of the Court of Appeals, Second Circuit.

The consequence of all this melancholy series of events is that we literally do not know what we are acting on. As I see it we have been forced to deal with litigation concerning rights of great magnitude without an adequate record, and surely without time for adequate treatment either in the prior proceedings or in this Court. It is interesting to note that counsel in oral argument before this Court were frequently unable to respond to questions on factual points. Not surprisingly they pointed out that they had been working literally "around the clock" and simply were unable to review the documents that give rise to these cases and were not familiar with them. This Court is no better posture. I agree with MR. JUSTICE HARLAN and MR. JUSTICE BLACKMUN but I am not prepared to reach the merits.[2]

I would affirm the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit and allow the District Court to complete the trial aborted by our grant of certiorari meanwhile preserving the status quo in the Post case. I would direct that the District Court on remand give priority to the Times case to the exclusion of all other business of that court but I would not set arbitrary deadlines.

I should add that I am in general agreement with much of what MR. JUSTICE WHITE has expressed with respect to penal sanctions concerning communication or retention of documents or information relating to the national defense.

We all crave speedier judicial processes but when judges are pressured as in these cases the result is a parody of the judicial process.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

(Nos. 1873 and 1885.—October Term, 1970)

(1873)

NEW YORK TIMES COMPANY PETITIONER, v. UNITED STATES

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit

(1885)

UNITED STATES, PETITIONER v. THE WASHINGTON POST COMPANY ET AL.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit

[June 30, 1971]

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE and MR. JUSTICE BLACKMUN join, dissenting.

These cases forcefully call to mind the wise admonition of Mr. Justice Holmes, dissenting in Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 193 U.S. 197, 400–401 (1904):

---

[1] Interestingly the Times explained its refusal to allow the government to examine its own purloined documents by saying in substance this might compromise their sources and informants! The Times thus asserts a right to guard the secrecy of its sources while denying that the Government of the United States has that power.

[2] With respect to the question of inherent power of the Executive to classify papers, records and documents as secret, or otherwise unavailable for public exposure, and to secure aid of the courts for enforcement, there may be an analogy with respect to this Court. No statute gives this Court express power to establish and enforce the utmost security measures for the secrecy of our deliberations and records. Yet I have little doubt as to the inherent power of the Court to protect the confidentiality of its internal operations by whatever judicial measures may be required.

> "Great cases like hard cases made bad law. For great cases are called great, not by reason of their real importance in shaping the law of the future, but because of some accident of immediate overwhelming interest which appeals to the feelings and distorts the judgment. These immediate interests exercise a kind of hydraulic pressure which makes what previously was clear seem doubtful, and before which even well settled principles of law will bend."

With all respect, I consider that the Court has been almost irresponsibly feverish in dealing with these cases.

Both the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit and the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit rendered judgment on June 23. The New York Times' petition for certiorari, its motion for accelerated consideration thereof, and its application for interim relief were filed in this Court on June 24 at about 11 a.m. The application of the United States for interim relief in the Post case was also filed here on June 24, at about 7:15 p.m. This Court's order setting a hearing before us on June 26 at 11 a.m., a course which I joined only to avoid the possibility of even more peremptory action by the Court, was issued less than 24 hours before. The record in the Post case was filed with the Clerk shortly before 1 p.m. on June 25; the record in the Times case did not arrive until 7 or 8 o'clock that same night. The briefs of the parties were received less than two hours before argument on June 26.

This frenzied train of events took place in the name of the presumption against prior restraints created by the First Amendment. Due regard for the extraordinarily important and difficult questions involved in these litigations should have led the Court to shun such a precipitate timetable. In order to decide the merits of these cases properly, some or all of the following questions should have been faced:

1. Whether the Attorney General is authorized to bring these suits in the name of the United States. Compare In re Debs, 158 U.S. 564 (1895), with Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952). This question involves as well the construction and validity of a singularly opaque statute—the Espionage Act, 18 U.S.C. § 793(e).
2. Whether the First Amendment permits the federal courts to enjoin publication of stories which would present a serious threat to national security. See Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 716 (1931) (dictum).
3. Whether the threat to publish highly secret documents is of itself a sufficient implication of national security to justify an injunction on the theory that regardless of the contents of the documents harm enough results simply from the demonstration of such a breach of secrecy.
4. Whether the unauthorized disclosure of any of these particular documents would seriously impair the national security.
5. What weight should be given to the opinion of high officers in the Executive Branch of the Government with respect to questions 3 and 4.
6. Whether the newspapers are entitled to retain and use the documents notwithstanding the seemingly uncontested facts that the documents, or the originals of which they are duplicates, were purloined from the Government's possession and that the newspapers received them with knowledge that they had been feloniously acquired. Cf. Liberty Lobby, Inc. v. Pearson, 390 F. 2d 489 (CADC 1968).
7. Whether the threatened harm to the national security or the Government's possessory interest in the documents justifies the issuance of an injunction against publication in light of—
   - a. The strong First Amendment policy against prior restraints on publication;
   - b. The doctrine against enjoining conduct in violation of criminal statutes; and
   - c. The extent to which the materials at issue have apparently already been otherwise disseminated.

These are difficult questions of fact, of law, and of judgment; the potential consequences of erroneous decision are enormous. The time which has been available to us, to the lower courts,* and to the parties has been wholly inadequate

---

*The hearing in the Post case before Judge Gesell began at 8 a.m. on June 21, and his decision was rendered, under the hammer of a deadline imposed by the Court of Appeals, shortly before 5 p.m. on the same day. The hearing in the Times case before Judge Gurfein was held on June 18 and his decision was rendered on June 19. The Government's appeals in the two cases were heard by the Courts of Appeals for the District of Columbia and Second Circuits, each court sitting en banc, on June 22. Each court rendered its decision on the following afternoon.

or giving these cases the kind of consideration they deserve. It is a reflection on he stability of the judicial process that these great issues—as important as any hat have arisen during my time on the Court—should have been decided under he pressures engendered by the torrent of publicity that has attended these litiations from their inception.

Forced as I am to reach the merits of these cases, I dissent from the opinion nd judgments of the Court. Within the severe limitations imposed by the time onstraints under which I have been required to operate, I can only state my easons in telescoped form, even though in different circumstances I would have elt constrained to deal with the cases in the fuller sweep indicated above.

It is a sufficient basis for affirming the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit the Times litigation to observe that its order must rest on the conclusion that ecause of the time elements the Government had not been given an adequate pportunity to present its case to the District Court. At least this conclusion was ot an abuse of discretion.

In the Post litigation the Government had more time to prepare; this was pparently the basis for the refusal of the Court of Appeals for the District of olumbia Circuit on rehearing to conform its judgment to that of the Second ircuit. But I think there is another and more fundamental reason why this dgment cannot stand—a reason which also furnishes an additional ground for t reinstating the judgment of the District Court in the Times litigation, set ide by the Court of Appeals. It is plain to me that the scope of the judicial nction in passing upon the activities of the Executive Branch of the Government in the field of foreign affairs is very narrowly restricted. This view is, I ink, dictated by the concept of separation of powers upon which our constitunal system rests.

In a speech on the floor of the House of Representatives, Chief Justice John arshall, then a member of that body, stated:

> "The President is the sole organ of the nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations." Annals, 6th Cong., col. 613 (1800).

om that time, shortly after the founding of the Nation, to this, there has been substantial challenge to this description of the scope of executive power. See ited States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 319–321 (1936), llecting authorities.

From this constitutional primacy in the field of foreign affairs, it seems to me at certain conclusions necessarily follow. Some of these were stated concisely President Washington, declining the request of the House of Repesentaes for the papers leading up to the negotiation of the Jay Treaty:

> "The nature of foreign negotiations requires caution, and their success must often depend on secrecy; and even when brought to a conclusion a full disclosure of all the measures, demands, or eventual concessions which may have been proposed or contemplated would be extremely impolite; for this might have a pernicious influence on future negotiations, or produce immediate inconveniences, perhaps danger and mischief, in relation to other powers." 1 J Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents 194–195 (1899).

The power to evaluate the "pernicious influence" of premature disclosure is however, lodged in the Executive alone. I agree that, in performance of its y to protect the values of the First Amendment against political pressures, judiciary must review the initial Executive determination to the point of isfying itself that the subject matter of the dispute does lie within the proper pass of the President's foreign relations power. Constitutional considerations bid "a complete abandonment of judicial control." Cf. United States v. nolds, 345 U.S. 1, 8 (1953). Moreover, the judiciary may properly insist that determination that disclosure of the subject matter would irreparably impair national security be made by the head of the Executive Department conned—here the Secretary of State or the Secretary of Defense—after actual sonal consideration by that officer. This safeguard is required in the analogous of executive claims of privilege for secrets of state. See United States v. nolds, supra at 8 and n. 20; Duncan v. Cammell, Laird & Co., [1942] A. C. 638 (House of Lords).

at in my judgment the judiciary may not properly go beyond these two iries and redetermine for itself the probable impact of disclosure on the onal security.

"[T]he very nature of executive decisions as to foreign policy is political, not judicial. Such decisions are wholly confided by our Constitution to the > political departments of the government, Executive and Legislative. They are delicate, complex, and involve large elements of prophecy. They are and should be undertaken only by those directly responsible to the people whose welfare they advance or imperil. They are decisions of a kind for which the Judiciary has neither aptitude, facilities nor responsibility and which has long been held to belong in the domain of political power not subject to judicial instrusion or inquiry." Chicago & Southern Air Lines v. Waterman Steamship Corp., 333 U.S. 103, 111 (1948) (Jackson, J.).

Even if there is some room for the judiciary to override the executive determination, it is plain that the scope of review must be exceedingly narrow. It can see no indication in the opinions of either the District Court or the Court of Appeals in the Post litigation that the conclusions of the Executive were given even the deference owing to an administrative agency, much less that owing to a co-equal branch of the Government operating within the field of its constitutional prerogative.

Accordingly, I would vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on this ground and remand the case for further proceedings in the District Court. Before the commencement of such further proceedings, due opportunity should be afforded the Government for procuring from the Secretary of State or the Secretary of Defense or both an expression of their views on the issue of national security. The ensuing review by the District Court should be in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion. And for the reasons stated above I would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

Pending further hearings in each case conducted under the appropriate ground rules, I would continue the restraints on publication. I cannot believe that the doctrine prohibiting prior restraints reaches to the point of preventing courts from maintaining the status quo long enough to act responsibly in matters of such national importance as those involved here.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

(Nos. 1873 and 1885.—October Term, 1970)

(1873)

New York Times Company, Petitioners, v. United States

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit

(1885)

United States, petitioner, v. The Washington Post Company et al.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit

[June 30, 1971]

Mr. Justice Blackmun.

I join Mr. Justice Harlan in his dissent. I also am in substantial accord with much that Mr. Justice White says, by way of admonition, in the latter part of his opinion.

At this point the focus is on only the comparatively few documents specified by the Government as critical. So far as the other material—vast in amount—is concerned, let it be published and published forthwith if the newspapers, once the strain is gone and the sensationalism is eased, still feel the urge so to do.

But we are concerned here with the few documents specified from the 47 volumes. Almost 70 years ago Mr. Justice Holmes, dissenting in a celebrated case observed:

> "Great cases like hard cases make bad law. For great cases are called great not by reason of their real importance in shaping the law of the future, but because of some accident of immediate overwhelming interest which appeals to the feelings and distorts the judgment. These immediate interests exercise > a kind of hydraulic pressure . . . ." Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 193 U.S. 197, 400–401 (1904).

The present cases, if not great, are at least unusual in their posture and implications, and the Holmes observation certainly has pertinent application.

The New York Times clandestinely devoted a period of three months examining the 47 volumes that came into its unauthorized possession. Once it had begun publication of material from those volumes, the New York case now before us emerged. It immediately assumed, and ever since has maintained, a frenetic pace and character. Seemingly, once publication started, the material could not be made public fast enough. Seemingly, from then on, every deferral or delay, by restraint or otherwise, was abhorrent and was to be deemed violative of the First Amendment and of the public's "right immediately to know." Yet that newspaper stood before us at oral argument and professed criticism of the Government for not lodging its protest earlier than by a Monday telegram following the initial Sunday publication.

The District of Columbia case is much the same.

Two federal district courts, two United States courts of appeals, and this Court—within a period of less than three weeks from inception until today—have been pressed into hurried decision of profound constitutional issues on inadequately developed and largely assumed facts without the careful deliberation that, hopefully, should characterize the American judicial process. There has been much writing about the law and little knowledge and less digestion of the facts. In the New York case the judges, both trial and appellate, had not yet examined the basic material when the case was brought here. In the District of Columbia case, little more was done, and what was accomplished in this respect was only on required remand, with the Washington Post, on the excuse that it was trying to protect its source of information initially refusing to reveal what material it actually possessed, and with the district court forced to make assumptions as to that possession.

With such respect as may be due to the contrary view, this, in my opinion, is not the way to try a law suit of this magnitude and asserted importance. It is not the way for federal courts to adjudicate, and to be required to adjudicate, issues that allegedly concern the Nation's vital welfare. The country would be none the worse off were the cases tried quickly, to be sure, but in the customary and properly deliberative manner. The most recent of the material, it is said, dates no later than 1968, already about three years ago, and the Times itself took three months to formulate its plan of procedure and, thus, deprived the public for that period.

The First Amendment, after all, is only one part of an entire Constitution. Article II of the great document vests in the Executive Branch primary power over the conduct of foreign affairs and places in that branch the responsibility for the Nation's safety. Each provision of the Constitution is important, and I cannot subscribe to a doctrine of unlimited absolutism for the First Amendment at the cost of downgrading other provisions. First Amendment absolutism has never commanded a majority of this Court. See, for example, Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 708 (1931), and Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 52 (1919). What is needed here is a weighing, upon properly developed standards, of the broad right of the press to print and of the very narrow right of the Government to prevent. Such standards are not yet developed. The parties here are in disagreement as to what those standards should be. But even the newspapers concede that there are situations where restraint is in order and constitutional. Mr. Justice Holmes gave us a suggestion when he said in Schenck,

> "It is a question of proximity and degree. When a nation is at war many things that might be said in time of peace are such a hindrance to its effort that their utterance will not be endured so long as men fight and that no Court could regard them as protected by any constitutional right." 249 U.S., at 52.

I therefore would remand these cases to be developed expeditiously, of course, but on a schedule permitting the orderly presentation of evidence from both sides, with the use of discovery, if necessary, as authorized by the rules, and with the preparation of briefs, oral argument and court opinions of a quality better than has been seen to this point. In making this last statement, I criticize no lawyer or judge. I know from past personal experience the agony of time pressure in the preparation of litigation. But these cases and the issues involved and the courts, including this one, deserve better than has been produced thus far.

It may well be that if these cases were allowed to develop as they should be developed, and to be tried as lawyers should try them and as courts should hear them, free of pressure and panic and sensationalism, other light would be shed on the situation and contrary considerations, for me, might prevail. But that is not the present posture of the litigation.

The Court, however, decides the cases today the other way. I therefore add one final comment.

I strongly urge, and sincerely hope, that these two newspapers will be fully aware of their ultimate responsibilities to the United States of America. Judge Wilkey, dissenting in the District of Columbia case, after a review of only the affidavits before his court (the basic papers had not then been made available by either party), concluded that there were a number of examples of documents that, if in the possession of the Post, and if published, "could clearly result in great harm to the nation," and he defined "harm" to mean "the death of soldiers, the destruction of alliances, the greatly increased difficulty of negotiation with our enemies, the inability of our diplomats to negotiate. . . ." I, for one, have now been able to give at least some cursory study not only to the affidavits, but to the material itself. I regret to say that from this examination I fear that Judge Wilkey's statements have possible foundation. I therefore share his concern. I hope that damage already has not been done. If, however, damage has been done, and if, with the Court's action today, these newspapers proceed to publish the critical documents and there results therefrom "the death of soldiers, the destruction of alliances, the greatly increased difficulty of negotiation with our enemies, the inability of our diplomats to negotiate," to which list I might add the factors of prolongation of the war and of further delay in the freeing of United States prisoners, then the Nation's people will know where the responsibility for these sad consequences rests.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

SYLLABUS

BRANZBURG v. HAYES ET AL., JUDGES

Certiorari to the Court of Appeals of Kentucky

No. 70–85 Argued February 23, 1972—Decided June 29, 1972*

The First Amendment does not relieve a newspaper reporter of the obligation that all citizens have to respond to a grand jury subpoena and answer questions relevant to a criminal investigation, and therefore the Amendment does not afford him a constitutional testimonial privilege for an agreement he makes to conceal facts relevant to a grand jury's investigation of a crime or to conceal the criminal conduct of his source or evidence thereof. Pp. 13–43. No. 70–85, 461 S.W. 2d 34 and No. 70–94, —— Mass. ——, 266 N.E. 2d 297, affirmed; No. 70–57, 434 F. 2 1081, reversed.

White, J., wrote the opinion of the Court, in which Burger, C. J., and Blackmun, Powell, and Rehnquist, J. J., joined. Powell, J., filed a concurring opinion. Douglas, J., filed a dissenting opinion. Stewart, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which Brennan and Marshall, JJ., joined.

---

*Together with No. 70–94, In re Pappas, on certiorari to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, and No. 70–57, United States v. Caldwell, on certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

(Nos. 70–85, 70–94, and 70–57)

70–85

PAUL M. BRANZBURG v. JOHN P. HAYES, JUDGE, ETC., ET AL.

—

70–94

On Writ of Certiorari to the Court of Appeals of Kentucky

IN THE MATTER OF PAUL PAPPAS, PETITIONER

On Writ of Certiorari to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts

—

70–57

UNITED STATES, PETITIONER, v. EARL CALDWELL

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit

[June 29, 1972]

Opinion of the Court by MR. JUSTICE WHITE, announced by THE CHIEF JUSTICE.

The issue in these cases is whether requiring newsmen to appear and testify before State or federal grand juries abridges the freedom of speech and press guaranteed by the First Amendment. We hold that it does not.

I

The writ of certiorari in No. 70–85, Branzburg v. Hayes and Branzburg v. Meigs, brings before us two judgments of the Kentucky Court of Appeals, both involving petitioner Branzburg, a staff reporter for the Courier-Journal, a daily newspaper published in Louisville, Jefferson County, Kentucky.

On November 15, 1969, the Courier-Journal carried a story under petitioner's by-line describing in detail his observations of two young residents of Jefferson County synthesizing hashish from marihuana, an activity which, they asserted, earned them about $5,000 in three weeks. The article included a photograph of a pair of hands working above a laboratory table on which was a substance identified by the caption as hashish. The article stated that petitioner had promised not to reveal the identity of the two hashish makers.[1] Petitioner was shortly subpoenaed by the Jefferson County grand jury; he appeared, but refused to identify the individuals he had seen possessing marihuana or the persons he had seen making hashish from marihuana.[2] A state trial court judge[3] ordered petitioner to answer these questions and rejected his contention that the Kentucky reporters' privilege statute, Ky. Rev. Stat. 421.100,[4] the First Amendment of the United States Constitution of §§ 1, 2, and 8 of the Kentucky Constitution authorized his refusal to answer. Petitioner then sought prohibiion and mandamus in the Kentucky Court of Appeals on the same grounds, but the Court of Appeals denied the petition. Branzburg v. Pound, 461 S. W. 2d 345 (1970), modified on denial of rehearing, id., (1971). It held that petitioner had abandoned his First Amendment argument in a supplemental memorandum he had filed and tacitly rejected his argument based on the Kentucky Constitution. It also construed Ky. Rev. Stat. 421.100 as affording a newsman the privilege of refusing to divulge the identity of an informant who supplied him with information but held that the statute did not permit a reporter to refuse to testify about events he had observed personally, including the identities of those persons he had observed.

---

[1] The article contained the following paragraph: "'I don't know why I'm letting you do his story,' [one informant] said quietly. 'To make the narcs (narcotics detectives) mad, guess. That's the main reason.' However, Larry and his partner asked for and received a promise that their names would be changed." R., at 3–4.

[2] The Foreman of the grand jury reported that petitioner Branzburg had refused to anwer the following two questions: "#1. On November 12, or 13, 1969, who was the person r persons you observed in possession of Marijuana, about which you wrote an article in the Courier-Journal on November 15, 1969? #2. On November 12, or 13, 1969, who was the erson or persons you observed compounding Marijuana, producing same to a compound nown as Hashish?" R., at 6.

[3] Judge J. Miles Pound. The present respondent in this case, Hon. John P. Hayes, is the uccessor of Judge Pound.

[4] Ky. Rev. Stat. 421.100 provides:

No person shall be compelled to disclose in any legal proceeding or trial before any court, r before any grand or petit jury, or before the presiding officer of any tribunal, or his agent r agents, or before the General Assembly, or any committee thereof, or before any city or ounty legislative body, or any committee thereof, or elsewhere, the source of any information procured or obtained by him, and published in a newspaper or by a radio or television roadcasting station by which he is engaged or employed, or with which he is connected."

The second case involving petitioner Branzburg arose out of his later story published on January 10, 1971, which described in detail the use of drugs in Frankfort, Franklin County, Kentucky. The article reported that in order to provide a comprehensive survey of the "drug scene" in Frankfort, petitioner had "spent two weeks interviewing several dozen drug users in the capital city" and had seen some of them smoking marihuana. A number of conversations with and observations of several unnamed drug users were recounted. Subpoenaed to appear before a Franklin County grand jury "to testify in the matter of violation of statutes concerning use and sale of drugs," petitioner Branzburg moved to quash the summons;[5] the motion was denied although an order was issued protecting Brazburg from revealing "confidential associations, sources of information" but requiring that he "answer any questions which concern or pertain to any criminal act, the commission of which was actually observed by [him]." Prior to the time he was slated to appear before the grand jury, petitioner sought mandamus and prohibition from the Kentucky Court of Appeals, arguing that if he were forced to go before the grand jury or to answer questions regarding the identity of informants or disclose information given to him in confidence, his effectiveness as a reporter would be greatly damaged. The Court of Appeals once again denied the requested writs, reaffirming its construction of Ky. Rev. Stat. 421.100, and rejecting petitioner's claim of a First Amendment privilege. It distinguished Caldwell v. United States, 434 F. 2d 1081 (CA9 1970), and it also announced its "misgivings" about that decision, asserting that it represented "a drastic departure from the generally recognized rule that the sources of information of a newspaper reporter are not privileged under the First Amendment." It characterized petitioner's fear that his ability to obtain news would be destroyed as "so tenuous that it does not, in the opinion of this court, present an abridgement of freedom of the press within the meaning of that term as used in the Constitution of the United States."

Petitioner sought a writ of certiorari to review both judgments of the Kentucky Court of Appeals, and we granted the writ.[6] 402 U.S. 942 (1971).

---

[5] Petitioner's Motion to Quash argued:

"If Mr. Branzburg were required to disclose these confidences to the Grand Jury, or any other person, he would thereby destroy the relationship of trust which he presently enjoys with those in the drug culture. They would refuse to speak to him; they would become even more reluctant than they are now to speak to any newsman; and the news media would thereby be vitally hampered in their ability to cover the views and activities of those involved in the drug culture. The inevitable effect of the subpoena issued to Mr. Branzburg, if it not be quashed by this Court, will be to suppress vital First Amendment freedoms of Mr. Branzburg, of the Courier-Journal, of the news media, and of those involved in the drug culture by driving a wedge of distrust and silence between the news media and the drug culture. This Court should not sanction a use of its process entailing so drastic an incursion upon First Amendment freedoms in the absence of compelling Commonwealth interest in requiring Mr. Branzburg's appearance before the Grand Jury. It is insufficient merely to protect Mr. Branzburg's right to silence after he appears before the Grand Jury This Court should totally excuse Mr. Branzburg from responding to the subpoena and even entering the Grand Jury room. Once Mr. Branzburg is required to go behind the closed doors of the Grand Jury room, his effectiveness as a reporter in these areas is totally destroyed. The secrecy that surrounds Grand Jury testimony necessarily introduces uncertainties in the minds of those who fear a betrayal of their confidences." R., at 43–44.

[6] After the Kentucky Court of Appeals' decision in Branzburg v. Meigs was announced petitioner filed a rehearing motion in Branzburg v. Pound suggesting that the Court had not passed upon his First Amendment argument and calling to the Court's attention the recent Ninth Circuit decision in Caldwell v. United States. On Jan. 22, 1971, the Court denied petitioner's motion and filed an amended opinion in the case, adding a footnote, 461 S.W. 2d, at 346 n. 1, to indicate that petitioner had abandoned his First Amendment argument and elected to rely wholly on Ky. Rev. Stat. 421.100 when he filed a Supplemental Memorandum before oral argument. In his Petition for Prohibition and Mandamus, petitioner had clearly relied on the First Amendment, and he had filed his Supplemental Memorandum in response to the State's Memorandum in Opposition to the granting of the writs. As its title indicates, this Memorandum was complementary to petitioner's earlier Petition and it dealt primarily with the State's construction of the phrase "source of information"

In the Matter of Paul Pappas, No. 70–94, originated when petitioner Pappas, a television newsman-photographer working out of the Providence, Rhode Island, office of a New Bedford, Massachusetts, television station, was called to New Bedford on July 30, 1970, to report on civil disorders there which involved fires and other turmoil. He intended to cover a Black Panther news conference at that group's headquarters in a boarded-up store. Petitioner found the streets around the store barricaded, but he ultimately gained entrance to the area and recorded and photographed a prepared statement read by one of the Black Panther leaders at about 3:00 p.m.[7] He then asked for and received permission to re-enter the area. Returning at about 9:00 p.m. that evening, he was allowed to enter and remain inside Panther headquarters. As a condition of entry, Pappas agreed not to disclose anything he saw or heard inside the store except an anticipated police raid which Pappas, "on his own," was free to photograph and report as he wished. Pappas stayed inside the headquarters for about three hours, but there was no police raid, and petitioner wrote no story and did not otherwise reveal what had transpired in the store while he was there. Two months later, petitioner was summoned before the Bristol County Grand Jury and appeared, answered questions as to his name, address, employment, and what he had seen and heard outside Panther headquarters, but refused to answer any questions about what had taken place inside headquarters while he was there, claiming that the First Amendment afforded him a privilege to protect confidential informants and their information. A second summons was then served upon him, again directing him to appear before the Grand Jury and "to give such evidence as he knows relating to any matters which may be inquired of on behalf of the commonwealth before . . . the Grand Jury." His motion to quash on First Amendment and other grounds was denied by the trial judge who, noting the absence of a statutory newsman's privilege in Massachusetts, ruled that petitioner had no constitutional privilege to refuse to divulge to the Grand Jury what he had seen and heard, including the identity of persons he had observed. The case was reported for decision to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.[8] The record there did not include a transcript of the hearing on the motion to quash nor did it reveal the specific questions petitioner had refused to answer, the expected nature of his testimony, the nature of the grand jury investigation, or the likelihood of the grand jury securing the information it sought from petitioner by other means.[9] The Supreme Judicial Court, however, took "judicial notice that in July, 1970, there were serious civil disorders in New Bedford, which involved street barricades, exclusion of the public from certain streets, fires, and similar turmoil. We were told at the arguments that there was gunfire in certain streets. We assume that the grand jury investigation was an appropriate effort to discover and indict those responsible for criminal acts."— Mass. —, 266 N.E. 2d, at 299. The Court then reaffirmed prior Massachusetts holdings that testimonial privileges were "exceptional" and "limited," stating in Ky. Rev. Stat. 421.100. The passage which the Kentucky Court of Appeals cited to indicate abandonment of petitioner's First Amendment claim is as follows:

---

> "Thus, the controversy continues as to whether a newsman's source of information should be privileged. However, that question is not before the Court in this case. The Legislature of Kentucky has settled the issue, having decided that a newsman's source of information is to be privileged. Because of this there is no point in citing Professor Wigmore and other authorities who speak against the grant of such a privilege. The question has been many times debated, and the Legislature has spoken. The only question before the Court is the construction of the term 'source of information' as it was intended by the Legislature."

Though the passage itself is somewhat unclear, the surrounding discussion indicates that petitioner was asserting here that the question of whether a common law privilege should be recognized was irrelevant since the legislature had already enacted a statute. In his earlier discussion, petitioner had analyzed certain cases in which the First Amendment argument was made but indicated that it was not necessary to reach this question if the statutory phrase "source of information" were interpreted expansively. We do not interpret this discussion as indicating that petitioner was abandoning his First Amendment claim if the Court of Appeals did not agree with his statutory interpretation argument, and we hold that the constitutional question in Branzburg v. Pound was properly preserved for review.

[7] Petitioner's news films of this event were made available to the Bristol County District Attorney. R., at 4.

[8] The case was reported by the superior court directly to the Supreme Judicial Court for an interlocutory ruling under Mass. Gen. Law, c. 287, § 30A and Mass. Gen. Law, c. 231, § 111. The Supreme Judicial Court's decision appears at —— Mass. ——, 266 N.E. 2d 297 (1971).

[9] "We do not have before us the text of any specific questions which Pappas has refused to answer before the grand jury, or any petition to hold him for contempt for his refusal. We have only general statements concerning (a) the inquiries of the grand jury, and (b) the materiality of the testimony sought from Pappas. The record does not show the expected nature of his testimony or what likelihood there is of being able to obtain that testimony from persons other than news gatherers." —— Mass. ——, 226 N.E. 2d, at 299 (footnote omitted).

that "[t]he principle that the public 'has a right to every man's evidence'" had usually been preferred, in the Commonwealth, to countervailing interests. Ibid. The Court rejected the holding of the Ninth Circuit in Caldwell v. United States, supra, and "adhere[d] to the view that there exists no constitutional newsman's privilege, either qualified or absolute, to refuse to appear and testify before a court or grand jury.[10] — Mass. —, 266 N.E. 2d, at 302–303. Any adverse effect upon the free dissemination of news by virtue of petitioner's being called to testify was deemed to be only "indirect, theoretical, and uncertain." — Mass. —, 266 N.E. 2d, at 302. The court concluded that "The obligation of newsmen . . . is that of every citizen, . . . to appear when summoned, with relevant written or other material when required, and to answer relevant and reasonable inquiries." — Mass. —, 266 N.E. 2d, at 303. The court nevertheless noted that grand juries were subject to supervision by the presiding judge, who had the duty "to prevent oppressive, unnecessary, irrelevant, and other improper inquiry and investigation," to insure that a witness' Fifth Amendment rights were not infringed, and to assess the propriety, necessity, and pertinence of the probable testimony to the investigation in progress.[11] Ibid. The burden was deemed to be on the witness to establish the impropriety of the summons or the questions asked. The denial of the motion to quash was affirmed and we granted a writ of certiorari to petitioner Pappas. 402 U.S. 942 (1971).

United States v. Caldwell, No. 70–57, arose from subpoenas issued by a federal grand jury in the Northern District of California to respondent Earl Caldwell, a reporter for the New York Times assigned to cover the Black Panther Party and other black militant groups. A subpoena duces tecum was served on respondent on February 2, 1970, ordering him to appear before the grand jury to testify and to bring with him notes and tape recordings of interviews given him for publication by officers and spokesmen of the Black Panther Party concerning the aims, purposes, and activities of that organization.[12] Respondent objected to the scope of this subpoena, and an agreement between his counsel and the government attorneys resulted in a continuance. A second subpoena was served on March 16, which omitted the documentary requirement and simply ordered Caldwell "to appear . . . to testify before the Grand Jury." Respondent and his employer, the New York Times,[13] moved to quash on the ground that the unlimited breadth of the subpoenas and the fact that Caldwell would have to appear in secret before the grand jury would destroy his working relationship with the Black Panther Party and "suppress vital First Amendment freedoms . . . by driving a wedge of distrust and silence between the news media and the militants." R., at 7. Respondent argued that "so drastic an incursion upon First Amendment freedoms" should not be permitted "in the absence of a compelling governmental interest—not shown here—in requiring Mr. Caldwell's appearance before the grand jury." Ibid. The motion was supported by amicus curiae memoranda from other publishing concerns and by affidavits from newsmen asserting the unfavorable impact on news sources of requiring reporters to appear before grand juries. The Government filed three memoranda in opposition to the motion to quash, each supported by affidavits. These documents stated that the grand jury was investigating, among other things, possible violations of a number of criminal statutes, including 18 U.S.C. § 871 (threats against the President), 18 U.S.C. § 1751 (assassination, attempts to assassinate, conspiracy to assassinate the President), 18 U.S.C. § 231 (Civil disorders), (18 U.S.C. § 2101 (interstate travel to incite a riot), and 18 U.S.C. § 1341 (mail frauds and swindles). It was

---

[10] The Court expressly declined to consider, however, appearances of newsmen before legislative or administrative bodies. —— Mass. ——, 266 N.E. 2d, at 303 n. 10.

[11] The Court noted that "a presiding judge may consider in his discretion" the argument that the use of newsmen as witnesses is likely to result in unnecessary or burdensome use of their work product, —— Mass. ——, 266 N.E. 2d, at 304 n. 13, and cautioned that "We do not suggest that a general investigation of mere political or group association of persons, without substantial relation to criminal events, may not be viewed by a judge in a somewhat different manner from an investigation of particular criminal events concerning which a newsman may have knowledge." —— Mass. ——, 266 N.E. 2d, at 304 n. 14.

[12] The subpoena ordered production of "Notes and tape recordings of interviews covering the period from January 1, 1969, to date, reflecting statements made for publication by officers and spokesmen for the Black Panther Party concerning the aims and purposes of said organization and the activities of said organization, its officers, staff, personnel and members, including specifically but not limited to interviews given by David Hilliard and Raymond 'Masai' Hewitt." R., at 20.

[13] The New York Times was granted standing to intervene as a party on the motion to quash the subpoenas. Application of Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358, 359 (N.D. Cal. 1970). It did not file an appeal from the District Court's contempt citation, and it did not seek certiorari here. It has filed an amicus curiae brief, however.

ecited that on November 15, 1969, an officer of the Black Panther Party made a ublicly televised speech in which he had declared that "We will kill Richard ixon" and that this threat had been repeated in three subsequent issues of the arty newspaper. R., at 66, 77. Also referred to were various writings by Caldwell bout the Black Panther Party, including an article published in the New York imes on December 14, 1969, stating that "[i]n their role as the vanguard in a evolutionary struggle the Panthers have picked up guns" and quoting the Chief f Staff of the Party as declaring that "We advocate the very direct overthrow f the Government by way of force and violence. By picking up guns and moving gainst it because we recognize it as being oppressive and in recognizing that we now that the only solution to it is armed struggle [sic]." R., at 62. The Governient also stated that the Chief of Staff of the Party had been indicted by the rand jury on December 3, 1969, for uttering threats against the life of the Presi-ent in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 871 and that various efforts had been made to se-ure evidence of crimes under investigation through the immunization of persons llegedly associated with the Black Panther Party.

On April 6, the District Court denied the motion to quash, Application of aldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358 (ND Cal. 1970), on the ground that "every person ithin the jurisdiction of the government" is bound to testify upon being properly ummoned. Id., at 360 (emphasis in original). Nevertheless, the court accepted espondent's First Amendment arguments to the extent of issuing a protective rder providing that although respondent must divulge whatever information ad been given to him for publication, he "shall not be required to reveal condential associations, sources or information received, developed or maintained y him as a professional journalist in the course of his efforts to gather news r dissemination to the public through the press or other news media." The urt held that the First Amendment afforded respondent a privilege to refuse isclosure of such confidential information until that had been "a showing by e Government of a compelling and overriding national interest in requiring
r. Caldwell's testimony which cannot be served by any alternative means." 311
. Supp., at 362.

Subsequently,[14] the term of the grand jury expired, a new grand jury was nvened, and a new subpoena ad testificandum was issued and served on May 22, 70. A new motion to quash by respondent and memorandum in opposition by e Government were filed, and by stipulation of the party, the motion was sub-itted on the prior record. The court denied the motion to quash, repeating the otective provisions in its prior order but this time directing Caldwell to ap-ar before the grand jury pursuant to the May 22 subpoena. Respondent refused appear before the grand jury, and the court issued an order to show cause hy he should not be held in contempt. Upon his further refusal to go before e grand jury, respondent was ordered committed for contempt until such time he complied with the court's order or until the expiration of the term of the and jury.

Respondent Caldwell appealed the contempt order,[15] and the Court of Appeals versed. Caldwell v. United States, 434 F. 2d 1081 (CA9 1970). Viewing the ue before it as whether Caldwell was required to appear before the grand ry at all, rather than the scope of permissible interrogation, the court first termined that the First Amendment provided a qualified testimonial privilege newsmen; in its view, requiring a reporter like Caldwell to testify would ter his informants from communicating with him in the future and would use him to censor his writing in an effort to avoid being subpoenaed. Absent mpelling reasons for requiring his testimony, he was held privileged to with-ld it. The court also held, for similar First Amendment reasons, that absent me special showing of necessity by the Government, attendance by Caldwell a secret meeting of the grand jury was something he was privileged to refuse cause of the potential impact of such an appearance on the flow of news to e public. We granted the United States' petition[16] for certiorari. 402 U.S.
2 (1971).

---

[14] Respondent appealed from the District Court's April 6 denial of his motion to quash on ril 17, 1970, and the Government moved to dismiss that appeal on the ground that the ler was interlocutory. On May 12, 1970, the Ninth Circuit dismissed the appeal without nion.

[15] The Government did not file a cross-appeal and did not challenge the validity of the trict Court protective order in the Court of Appeals.

[16] The petition presented a single question: "Whether a newspaper reporter who has blished articles about an organization can, under the First Amendment, properly refuse appear before a grand jury investigating possible crim[illegible] of that organization o have been quoted in the published articles."

I

Petitioners Branzburg and Pappas and respondent Caldwell press First Amendment claims that may be simply put; that to gather news it is often necessary to agree either not to identify the source of information published or to publish only part of the facts revealed, or both; that if the reporter is nevertheless forced to reveal these confidences to a grand jury, the source so identified and other confidential sources of other reporters will be measurably deterred from furnishing publishable information, all to the detriment of the free flow of information protected by the First Amendment. Although petitioners do not claim an absolute privilege against official interrogation in all circumstances, they assert that the reporter should not be forced either to appear or to testify before a grand jury or at trial until and unless sufficient grounds are shown for believing that the reporter possesses information relevant to a crime the grand jury is investigating, that the information the reporter has is unavailable from other sources, and that the need for the information is sufficiently compelling to override the claimed invasion of First Amendment interests occasioned by the disclosure. Principally relied upon are prior cases emphasizing the importance of the First Amendment guarantees to individual development and to our system of representative government,[17] decisions requiring that official action with adverse impact on First Amendment rights be justified by a public interest that is "compelling" or "paramount," [18] and those precedents establishing the principle that justifiable governmental goals may not be achieved by unduly broad means having an unnecessary impact on protected rights of speech, press, or association.[19] The heart of the claim is that the burden on news gathering resulting from compelling reporters to disclose confidential information outweighs any public interest in obtaining the information.[20]

We do not question the significance of free speech, press or assembly to the country's welfare. Nor is it suggested that news gathering does not qualify for First Amendment protection; without some protection for seeking out the news freedom of the press could be eviscerated. But this case involves no intrusions upon speech or assembly, no prior restraint or restriction on what the press may publish, and no express or implied command that the press publish what it prefers to withhold. No exaction or tax for the privilege of publishing, and no penalty, civil or criminal, related to the content of published material is at issue here. The use of confidential sources by the press is not forbidden or restricted; reporters remain free to seek news from any source by means within the law. No attempt is made to require the press to publish its sources of information or indiscriminately to disclose them on request.

The sole issue before us is the obligation of reporters to respond to grand jury subpoenas as other citizens do and to answer questions relevant to an investigation into the commission of crime. Citizens generally are not constitutionally immune from grand jury subpoenas; and neither the First Amendment nor other constitutional provision protects the average citizen from disclosing to a grand jury information that he has received in confidence.[21] The claim is however, that reporters are exempt from these obligations because if forced to respond to subpoenas and identify their sources or disclose other confidences, their informants will refuse or be reluctant to furnish newsworthy information in the future. This asserted burden on news gathering is said to make compelled testimony from newsmen constitutionally suspect and to require a privileged position for them.

---

[17] Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 145 (1967) (opinion of Harlan, J.); Ne York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270 (1964); Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 6 64–65 (1960); Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252, 263 (1941); Grosjean v. America Press Co., Inc., 297 U.S. 233, 250 (1936); Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 722 (1931).

[18] NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 439 (1963); Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 5 (1945); DeGregory v. Attorney General of New Hampshire, 383 U.S. 825, 829 (1966 Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 524 (1960); Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147, 1 (1939); NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 464 (1958).

[19] Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51, 56 (1965); NAACP v. Alabama, 377 U.S. 288, 3 (1964); Martin v. City of Struthers, 319 U.S. 141, 147 (1943); Elfbrandt v. Russell, 3 U.S. 11, 18 (1966).

[20] There has been a great deal of writing in recent years on the existence of a newsman constitutional right of nondisclosure of confidential information. See, e.g., Beaver, Th Newsman's Code, The Claim of Privilege, and Everyman's Right to Evidence, 47 Ore. Rev. 243 (1968); Guest & Stanzler, The Constitutional Argument for Newsmen Concealin Their Sources, 64 Nw. U.L. Rev. 18 (1969): Note, Reporters and Their Sources: The Co stitutional Right to a Confidential Relationship, 80 Yale L.J. 317 (1970); Note, The Ne man's Privilege: Government Investigations, Criminal Prosecutions and Private Liti tion, 58 Calif. L. Rev. 1198 (1970); Note, The Right of the Press to Gather Informatio 71 Col. L. Rev. 838 (1971); Nelson, The Newsmen's Privilege Against Disclosure of Co fidential Sources of Information, 24 Vand. L. Rev. 667 (1971).

[21] "In general, then, the mere fact that a communication was made in express confidenc or in the implied confidence of a confidential relation, does not create a privilege. . . . N pledge of privacy nor oath of secrecy can avail against demand for the truth in a court justice." 8 J. Wigmore, Evidence § 2286 (McNaughton rev. 1961). This was not always th rule at common law, however. In 17th century England, the obligations of honor amon

It is clear that the First Amendment does not invalidate every incidental burdening of the press that may result from the enforcement of civil or criminal statutes of general applicability. Under prior cases, otherwise valid laws serving substantial interests may be enforced against the press as againt others, despite the possible burden that may be imposed. The Court has emphasized that "[t]he publisher of a newspaper has no special immunity from the application of general laws. He has no special privilege to invade the rights and liberties of others. Associated Press v. NLRB, 301 U.S. 103, 132–133 (1937). It was there held that the Associated Press, a news-gathering and disseminating organization, was not exempt from the requirements of the National Labor Relations Act. The holding was reaffirmed in Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. v. Walling, 327 U.S. 186, 192–193 (1946), where the Court rejected the claim that applying the Fair Labor Standards Act to a newspaper publishing business would abridge the freedom of press guaranteed by the First Amendment. See also Mabee v. White Plains Publishing Co., 327 U.S. 178 (1946). Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1 (1945), similarly overruled assertions that the First Amenement precluded application of the Sherman Act to a news gathering and disseminating organization. Cf. Indiana Farmer's Guide Publishing Co. v. Prairie Farmer's Publishing Co., 293 U.S. 268, 276 ,1934); Citizen Publishing Co. v. United States, 394 U.S. 131, 139 (1969); Lorain Journal Co. v. United States, 342 U.S. 143, 155–156 (1951). Likewise, a newspaper may be subjected to nondiscriminatory forms of general taxation, Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 250 (1936); Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 112 (1943).

The prevailing view is that the press is not free with impunity to publish everything and anything it desires to publish. Although it may deter or regulate what is said or published, the press may not circulate knowing or reckless falsehoods damaging to private reputation without subjecting itself to liability for damages, including punitive damages, or even criminal prosecution. See New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 279–280 (1964); Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 74 (1964); Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 147 (1967) (opinion of Harlan, J.,); Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, 401 U.S. 265, 277 (1971). A newspaper or a journalist may also be punished for contempt of court, in appropriate circumstances. Craig v. Harney, 331 U.S. 367, 377–278 (1947).

It has generally been held that the First Amendment does not guarantee the press a constitutional right of special access to information not available to the public generally. Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1, 16–17 (1965); New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713, 728–730 (1971), (STEWART, J., concurring); Tribune Review Publishing Co. v. Thomas, 254 F. 2d 883, 885 (CA 1958); In the Matter of United Press Anns. v. Valente, 308 U.Y. 71, 77, 123 N. E. 2d 777, 778 (1954). In Zemel v. Rusk, supra, for example, the Court sustained the Government's refusal to validate passports to Cuba even though that restriction "rendered less than wholly free the flow of information concerning that country." Id., at 16. The ban on travel was held constitutional, for "[t]he right to speak and publish does not carry with it the unrestrained right to gather information." Id., at 17.[22]

Despite the fact that news gathering may be hampered, the press is regularly excluded from grand jury proceedings, our own conferences, the meetings of other official bodies gathered in executive session, and the meetings of private organizations. Newsmen have no constitutional right of access to the scenes of crime or disaster when the general public is excluded, and they may be prohibited from attending or publishing information about trials if such restrictions are necessary to assure a defendant a fair trial before an impartial tribunal. In Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U. S. 333 (1966), for example, the Court reversed gentlemen were occasionally recognized as privileging from compulsory disclosure information obtained in exchange for a promise of confifidence. See Bulstrod v. Letchmere, 22 Eng. Rep. 1019 (1676); Lord Grey's Trial, 9 How. St. Tr. 127 (1682).

---

[22] "There are few restrictions on action which could not be clothed by ingenious argument in the garb of decreased data flow. For example, the prohibition of unauthorized entry into the White House diminishes the citizen's opportunities to gather information he might find relevant to his opinion of the way the country is being run, but that does not make entry into the White House a First Amendment right." 381 U.S., at 16–17.

a state court conviction where the trial court failed to adopt "stricter rules governing the use of the courtroom by newsmen as Sheppard's counsel requested," neglected to insulate witnesses from the press, and made no "effort to control the release of leads, information, and gossip to the press by police officers, witnesses, and the counsel for both sides." Id., at 358, 359. "[T]he trial court might well have proscribed extrajudicial statements by any lawyer, party, witness, or court official which divulged prejudicial matters." Id., at 361. See also Estes v. Texas, 381 U. S. 532, 539–540 (1965) ; Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U. S 723, 726 (1963).

It is thus not surprising that the great weight of authority is that newsmen are not exempt from the normal duty of appearing before a grand jury and answering questions relevant to a criminal investigation. At common law, courts consistently refused to recognize the existence of any privilege authorizing a newsman to refuse to reveal confidential information to a grand jury. See, e. g., Ex parte Lawrence, 116 Cal. 298, 48 P. 124 (1897) ; Plunkett v. Hamilton, 136 Ga. 72, 70 S. E. 781 (1911) ; Clein v. State, 52 So. 2d 117 (Fla. 1950) ; In re Grunow, 84 N. J. L. 235, 85 A. 1011 (1913) ; People ex rel. Mooney v. Sheriff, 269 N. Y. 291, 199 N. E. 415 (1936) ; Joslyn v. People, 67 Col. 297, 184 P. 375 (1919) ; Adams v. Associated Press, 46 F. R. D. 439 (SD Tex. 1969) ; Brewster v. Boston Herald-Traveler Corp., 20 F. R. D. 416 (Mass. 1957). See generally Annot., 7 A. L. R. 3d 591 (1966). In 1958, a newsgatherer asserted for the first time that the First Amendment exempted confidential information from public disclosure pursuant to a subpoena issued in a civil suit, Garland v. Torre, 259 F. 2d 545 (CA2), cert. denied, 358 U. S. 910 (1958), but the claim was denied, and this argument has been almost uniformly rejected since then, although there are occasional dicta that, in circumstances not presented, a newsman might be excused. In re Goodfader, 45 Haw. 317, 367 P. 2d 472 (1961) ; In re Taylor, 412 Pa. 32, 193 A. 2d 181 (1963) ; State v. Buchanan, 250 Ore. 244, 436 P. 2d 729, cert denied, 392 U.S. 905 (1968) ; Murphy v. Colorado (Colo. Supreme Court), cert. denied, 365 U. S. 843 (1961) (unreported, discussed in In re Goodfader, supra, 45 Haw., at 366, 367 P. 2d, at 498 (Mizuha, J., dissenting)). These courts have applied the presumption against the existence of an asserted testimonial privilege, United States v. Bryan, 339 U. S. 323, 331 (1950), and have concluded that the First Amendment interest asserted by the newsman was outweighed by the general obligation of a citizen to appear before a grand jury or at trial, pursuant to a subpoena, and give what information he possesses. The opinions of the state courts in Branzburg and Pappas are typical of the prevailing view, although a few recent cases such as Caldwell, have recognized and given effect to some form of constitutional newsman's privilege. See State v. Knops, 49 Wis. 2d 647, 183 N. W. 2d 93 (1971) (dictum) ; Alioto v. Cowles Communication, Inc., C. A. 52150 (ND Cal. 1969) ; In re Grand Jury Witnesses, 322 F. Supp. 573 (ND Cal. 1970) ; People v. Dohrn, Crim. No. 69–3808 (Cook County, Ill., Cir. Ct. 1970).

The prevailing constitutional view of the newsman's privilege is very much rooted in the ancient role of the grand jury which has the dual function of determing if there is proable cause to believe that a crime has been committed and of protecting citizens against unfounded criminal prosecutions.[23] Grand jury proceedings are constitutionally mandated for the institution of federal criminal prosecutions for capital or other serious crimes, and "its constitutional prerogatives are rooted in long centuries of Anglo-American history." Hannah v. Larche, 363 U.S. 420, 489 (1960) (Frankfurter, J., concurring). The Fifth Amendment provides that "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury."[24] The adoption of the grand jury "in our Constitution as the sole method of preferring charges in serious criminal cases shows the high place it held as an instrument of justice." Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359, 362 (1956). Although state systems of criminal procedure differ greatly among themselves, the grand jury is similarly guaranteed by many state constitutions and plays an important role in fair and effective law enforcement in the overwhelming majority of the States.[25] Because its task is to inquire into the existence of possible criminal conduct and to return only well-founded indictments, its investigative powers are necessarily broad. "It is a grand inquest, a body with powers of investigation and inquisition, the scope of whose inquiries is not to be limited narrowly by questions of propriety or forecasts of the probable result of the investigation, or by doubts whether any particular individual will be found properly subject to an accusation of crime." Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273, 282 (1919). Hence the grand jury's authority to subpoena witnesses is not only historic, id., at 279–281, but essential to its task. Although the powers of the grand jury are not unlimited and are subject to the supervision of a judge, the long standing principle that "the public has a right to every man's evidence," except for those persons protected by a constitutional common law, or statutory privilege, United States v. Bryan, 339 U.S. 323, 331 (1950); Blackmer v. United States, 284 U.S. 421, 438 (1932); 8 J. Wigmore, Evidence § 2192 (McNaughton rev. 1961), is particularly applicable to grand jury proceedings.[26]

---

[23] "Historically, [the grand jury] has been regarded as a primary security to the innocent against hasty, malicious and oppressive persecution ; it serves the invaluable function in our society of standing between the accuser and the accused . . . to determine whether a charge is founded upon reason or was dictated by an intimidating power or by malice and personal ill will." Wood v. Georgia, 370 U.S. 375, 390 (1962) (footnote omitted).

[24] It has been held that "infamous" punishments include confinement at hard labor, United States v. Moreland, 258 U.S. 433 (1922) ; incarceration in a penitentiary, Mackin v. United States, 117 U.S. 348 (1886) ; and imprisonment for more than a year, Barkman v. Sanford, 162 F. 2d 592 (CA5), cert. denied, 332 U.S. 816 (1947). Fed. Rule Crim. Proc. 7(a) has codified these holdings: "An offense which may be punished by death shall be prosecuted by indictment. An offense which may be punished by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year or at hard labor shall be prosecuted by indictment, or if indictment is waived, it may be prosecuted by information. Any other offense may be prosecuted by indictment or by information."

A number of States have provided newsmen a statutory privilege of varying breadth,[27] but the majority have not done so, and none has been provided by federal statute.[28] Until now the only testimonial privilege for unofficial witnesses that is rooted in the Federal Constitution is the First Amendment privilege against compelled self-incrimination. We are asked to create another by interpreting the First Amendment to grant newsmen a testimonial privilege that other citizens do not enjoy. This we decline to do.[29] Fair and effective law enforcement

---

[25] Although indictment by grand jury is not part of the due process of law guaranteed to State criminal defendants by the Fourteenth Amendment, Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884), a recent study reveals that 32 States require that certain kinds of criminal prosecutions be initiated by indictment. Spain, The Grand Jury, Past and Present: A Survey, 1 Am. Crim. L.Q. 119, 126–142 (1964). In the 18 States in which the prosecutor may proceed by information, the grand jury is retained as an alternative means of invoking the criminal process and as an investigative tool. Ibid.

[26] Jeremy Bentham vividly illustrated this maxim:

"Are men of the first rank and consideration, are men high in office, men whose time is not less valuable to the public than to themselves—are such men to be forced to quit their business, their functions, and what is more than all, their pleasure, at the beck of every idle or malicious adversary, to dance attendance upon every petty cause? Yes, as far as it is necessary—they and everybody! . . . Were the Prince of Wales, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Lord High Chancellor, to be passing by in the same coach while a chimney-sweeper and a barrow-woman were in dispute about a halfpennyworth of apples, and the chimney-sweeper or the barrow-woman were to think proper to call upon them for their evidence, could they refuse it? No, most certainly." 4 The Works of Jeremy Bentham 320 (Bowring ed. 1843).

In United States v. Burr, 25 F. Cas. 30, 34 (Cir. Ct. D. Va. 1807) (No. 14,692d), Chief Justice Marshall, sitting on Circuit, opined that in proper circumstances a subpoena could be issued to the President of the United States.

[27] Thus far, 17 States have provided some type of statutory protection to a newsman's confidential sources:

Ala. Code Recompiled Tit. 7, § 370 (1960); Alaska Stat. § 09.25.150 (1967, 1970 Cum. Supp.); Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 12–2237 (1969 Supp.); Ark. Stat. Ann. § 43–917 (1964); Cal. Evid. Code Ann. § 1070 (West 1966); Ind. Ann. Stat. § 2–1733 (1968); Ky. Rev. Stat. § 421.100 (1969); La. Rev. Stat. § 45:1451–54 (1970 Cum. Supp.); Md. Ann. Code Art. 35, § 2 (1971); Mich. Stat. Ann. § 28.945(1) (1954); Mont. Rev. Codes Ann. Tit. 93, ch. 601–2 (1964); Nev. Rev. Stat. § 48.087 (1969); N.J. Stat. Ann. Tit. 2A ch. 84A, §§ 21, 29 (Supp. 1969); N.M. Stat. Ann. § 20–1–12.1 (1953, 1967 Rev.); N.Y. Civ. Rights Law § 79–h (McKinney 1970); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 2739.12 (1953); Pa. Stat. Ann. Tit. 28, § 330 (1959, 1970 Cum. Supp.).

[28] Such legislation has been introduced, however. See, e.g., S. 1311, S. 3552, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. (1970); H.R. 16328, H.R. 16704, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. (1970); S. 1851, 88th Cong., 1st Sess. (1963); H.R. 8519, H.R. 7787, 88th Cong., 1st Sess. (1963); S. 965, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. (1959); H.R. 355, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. (1959). For a general analysis of proposed congressional legislation, see Staff of Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 89th Cong., 2d Sess., The Newsman's Privilege (Comm. Print 1966).

[29] The creation of new testimonial privileges has been met with disfavor by commentators since such privileges obstruct the search for truth. Wigmore condemns such privileges as "so many derogations from a positive general rule [that everyone is obligated to testify when properly summoned]" and as "obstacle[s] to the administration of justice." 8 Wigmore, On Evidence, § 2192 (McNaughton rev. 1961). His criticism that "all privileges of exemption from this general duty are exceptional and are therefore to be discountenanced," id., at § 2192, p. 73 (emphasis in original) has been frequently echoed. Morgan, "Foreward," Model Code of Evidence 22–30 (1942); Chafee, Government and Mass Communications 496–497 (1947); ABA Committee on Improvements in the Law of Evidence, Report, 63 A.B.A. Reports 595 (1938); McCormick. On Evidence 159 (1972); Chafee, "Privileged Communications: Is Justice Served or Obstructed by Closing the Doctor's Mouth on the Witness Stand?," 52 Yale L.J. 607 (1943; Ladd, "Privileges," 1969 Law and the Social Order 555, 556 (1969); 58 Am. Jur., Witnesses § 546 (1948); 97 C.J.S., Witnesses § 259 a state court conviction where the trial court failed to adopt "stricter governing the use of the courtroom by newsmen as Sheppard's counsel quested." neglected to insulate witnesses from the press, and made no "effo control the release of leads, information, and gossip to the press by police offi witnesses, and the counsel for both sides." Id., at 358, 359. "[T]he trial c might well have proscribed extrajudicial statements by any lawyer, party, ness, or court official which divulged prejudicial matters." Id., at 361. See Estes v. Texas, 381 U. S. 532, 539–540 (1965); Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.

723, 726 (1963).

It is thus not surprising that the great weight of authority is that newsm are not exempt from the normal duty of appearing before a grand jury answering questions relevant to a criminal investigation. At common law, co consistently refused to recognize the existence of any privilege authorizing newsman to refuse to reveal confidential information to a grand jury. See, e.
Ex parte Lawrence, 116 Cal. 298, 48 P. 124 (1897); Plunkett v. Hamilton, 136 G
72, 70 S. E. 781 (1911); Clein v. State, 52 So. 2d 117 (Fla. 1950); In re Gran
84 N. J. L. 235, 85 A. 1011 (1913); People ex rel. Mooney v. Sheriff, 269 N. Y. 2
199 N. E. 415 (1936); Joslyn v. People, 67 Col. 297, 184 P. 375 (1919); Adams
Associated Press, 46 F. R. D. 439 (SD Tex. 1969); Brewster v. Boston Hera
Traveler Corp., 20 F. R. D. 416 (Mass. 1957). See generally Annot., 7 A. L. R.
591 (1966). In 1958, a newsgatherer asserted for the first time that the Fi Amendment exempted confidential information from public disclosure pursua to a subpoena issued in a civil suit. Garland v. Torre, 259 F. 2d 545 (CA2), cert denied, 358 U. S. 910 (1958), but the claim was denied, and this argument ha been almost uniformly rejected since then, although there are occasional dict that, in circumstances not presented, a newsman might be excused. In re Good fader, 45 Haw. 317, 367 P. 2d 472 (1961); In re Taylor, 412 Pa. 32, 193 A. 2d 181
(1963); State v. Buchanan, 250 Ore. 244, 436 P. 2d 729, cert denied, 392 U.S. 905
(1968); Murphy v. Colorado (Colo. Supreme Court), cert. denied, 365 U.S. 843
(1961) (unreported, discussed in In re Goodfader, supra, 45 Haw., at 366, 367
P. 2d, at 498 (Mizuha, J., dissenting)). These courts have applied the presumption against the existence of an asserted testimonial privilege, United States v.
Bryan, 339 U. S. 323, 331 (1950), and have concluded that the First Amendment interest asserted by the newsman was outweighed by the general obligation of a citizen to appear before a grand jury or at trial, pursuant to a subpoena, and give what information he possesses. The opinions of the state courts in Branz- burg and Pappas are typical of the prevailing view, although a few recent cases such as Caldwell, have recognized and given effect to some form of constitutional newsman's privilege. See State v. Knops, 49 Wis. 2d 647, 183 N. W. 2d 93 (1971)
(dictum); Alioto v. Cowles Communication, Inc., C. A. 52150 (ND Cal. 1969);
In re Grand Jury Witnesses, 322 F. Supp. 573 (ND Cal. 1970); People v. Dohrn, Crim. No. 69-3808 (Cook County, Ill. Cir. Ct. 1970).

The prevailing constitutional view of the newsman's privilege is very much rooted in the ancient role of the grand jury which has the dual function of determining if there is proable cause to believe that a crime has been committed and of protecting citizens against unfounded criminal prosecutions.[23] Grand jury proceedings are constitutionally mandated for the institution of federal criminal prosecutions for capital or other serious crimes, and "its constitutional prerogatives are rooted in long centuries of Anglo-American history." Hannah v. Larche, 363 U.S. 420, 489 (1960) (Frankfurter, J., concurring). The Fifth Amendment provides that "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury."[24] The adoption of the grand jury "in our Constitution as the sole method of preferring charges in serious criminal cases shows the high place it h

[illegible]

[illegible] the First Amendment [illegible] newsmen a testimonial privilege that other citizens do not enjoy. This we decline to do.[illegible] aimed at providing security for the person and property of the individual is a fundamental function of government, and the grand jury plays an important, constitutionally mandated role in this process. On the records now before us, we perceive no basis for holding that the public interest in law enforcement and in ensuring effective grand jury proceedings is insufficient to override the consequential, but uncertain, burden on news gathering which is said to result from insisting that reporters, like other citizens, respond to relevant questions put to them in the course of a valid grand jury investigation or criminal trial.

[illegible]

This conclusion itself involves no restraint on what newspapers may publish or on the type of quality of information reporters may seek to acquire, nor does it threaten the vast bulk of confidential relationships between reporters and their sources. Grand juries address themselves to the issues of whether crimes have been committed and who committed them. nly where news sources themselves are implicated in crime or possess information relevant to the grand jury's task need they or the reporter be concerned about grand jury subpoenas. Nothing before us indicates that a large number or percentage of all confidential news sources fall into either category and would in any way be deterred by our holding that the Constitution does not, as it never has, exempt the newsman from performing the citizen's normal duty of appearing and furnishing information relevant to the grand jury's task.

The preference for anonymity of those confidential informants involved in actual criminal conduct is presumably a product of their desire to escape criminal prosecution, and this preference, while understandable, is hardly deserving of constitutional protection. It would be frivolous to assert—and no one does in these cases—that the First Amendment, in the interest of securing news or otherwise, confers a license on either the reporter or his news sources to violate otherwise valid criminal laws. Although stealing documents or private wiretapping could provide newsworthy information, neither reporter nor source is immune from conviction for such conduct, whatever the impact on the flow of news. Neither is immune, on First Amendment grounds, from testifying against the other, before the grand jury or at a criminal trial. The Amendment does not reach so far as to override the interest of the public in ensuring that neither reporter nor source is invading the rights of other citizens though reprehensible conduct forbidden to all other persons. To assert the contrary proposition

> "is to answer it, since it involves in its very statement the contention that the freedom of the press is a freedom to do wrong with impunity, and implies the right to frustrate and defeat the discharge of those governmental duties upon the performance of which the freedom of all, including that of the press, depends. . . . It suffices to say that, however complete is the right of the press to state public things and discuss them, that right, as every other right enjoyed in human society, is subject to the restraints which separate right from wrong-doing." Toledo Newspaper Co. v. United States, 247 U.S. 402, 419–420 (1918).[30]

Thus, we cannot seriously entertain the notion that the First Amendment protects a newsman's agreement to conceal the criminal conduct of his source, or evidence thereof, on the theory that it is better to write about crime than to do something about it. Insofar as any reporter in these cases undertook not to reveal or testify about the crime he witnessed, his claim of privilege under the First Amendment presents no substantial question. The crimes of news sources are no less reprehensible and threatening to the public interest when witnessed by a reporter than when they are not.

There remain those situations where a source is not engaged in criminal conduct but has information suggesting illegal conduct by others. Newsmen frequently receive information from such sources pursuant to a tacit or express agreement to withhold the source's name and suppress any information that

---

(1957); McMann v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 87 F. 2d 377, 378 (CA2 1938) (L. Hand, J.). Neither the ALI's Model Code of Evidence (1942), the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws' Uniform Rules of Evidence (1953), nor the Proposed Rules of Evidence for the United States Courts and Magistrates (rev. ed. 1971) have included a newsman's privilege.

[30] The holding in this case involved a construction of the Contempt Act of 1831, 4 Stat. 487, which permitted summary trial of contempts "so near [to the court] as to obstruct the administration of justice." The Court held that the Act required only that the conduct have a "direct tendency to prevent and obstruct the discharge of judicial duty." 247 U.S., at 419. This view was overruled and the Act given a much narrower reading in Nye v. United States, 813 U.S. 33, 47–52 (1941). See Bloom v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 194, 205–206 (1968).

the source wishes not published. Such informants presumably desire anonymity in order to avoid being entangled as a witness in a criminal trial or grand jury investigation. They may fear that disclosure will threaten their job security or personal safety or that it will simply result in dishonor or embarrassment.

The argument that the flow of news will be diminished by compelling reporters to aid the grand jury in a criminal investigation is not irrational, nor are the records before us silent on the matter. But we remain unclear how often and to what extent informers are actually deterred from furnishing information when newsmen are forced to testify before a grand jury. The available data indicates that some newsmen rely a great deal on confidential sources and that some informants are particularly sensitive to the threat of exposure and may be silenced if it is held by this Court that, ordinarily, newsmen must testify pursuant to subpoenas,[31] but the evidence fails to demonstrate that there would be a significant constriction of the flow of news to the public if this Court reaffirms the prior common law and constitutional rule regarding the testimonial obligations of newsmen. Estimates of the inhibiting effect of such subpoenas on the willingness of informants to make disclosures to newsmen are widely divergent and to a great extent speculative.[32] It would be difficult to canvass the views of the informants themselves; surveys of reporters on this topic are chiefly opinions of predicted informant behavior and must be viewed in the light of the professional self-interest of the interviewees.[33] Reliance by the press on confidential informants does not mean that all such sources will in fact dry up because of the later possible appearance of the newsman before a grand jury. The reporter may never be called and if he objects to testifying, the prosecution may not insist. Also, the relationship of many informants to the press is a symbiotic one which is unlikely to be greatly inhibited by the threat of subpoena: quite often, such informants are members of a minority political or cultural group which relies heavily on the media to propagate its views, publicize its aims, and magnify its exposure to the public. Moreover, grand juries characteristically conduct secret proceedings, and law enforcement officers are themselves experienced in dealing with informers and have their own methods for protecting them without interference with the effective administration of justice. There is little before us indicating that informants whose interest in avoiding exposure is that it may threaten job security, personal safety, or peace of mind, would in fact, be in a worse position, or would think they would be, if they risked placing their trust in public officials as well as reporters. We doubt if the informer who prefers anonymity but is sincerely interested in furnishing evidence of crime will always or very often be deterred by the prospect of dealing with those public authorities characteristically charged with the duty to protect the public interest as well as his.

Accepting the fact, however, that an undetermined number of informants not themselves implicated in crime will nevertheless, for whatever reason, refuse to talk to newsmen if they fear identification by a reporter in an official investigation, we cannot accept the argument that the public interest in possible future news about crime from undisclosed, unverified sources must take precedence over the public interest in pursuing and prosecuting those crimes reported to the press by informants and in thus deterring the commission of such crimes in the future.

---

[31] Respondent Caldwell attached a number of affidavits from prominent newsmen to his initial motion to quash which detail the experiences of such journalists after they have been subpoenaed. R., at 22–61.

[32] Cf., e.g., the results of a study conducted by Guest & Stanzler, which appears as an appendix to their article, "The Constitutional Argument for Newsmen Concealing their Sources," 64 Nw. U. L. Rev. 18, 57 (1969). A number of editors of daily newspapers of varying circulation were asked the question, "Excluding one- or two-sentence gossip items, on the average how many stories based on information received in confidence are published in your paper each year? Very rough estimate." Answers varied significantly e.g., "Virtually innumerable," Tucson Daily Citizen (41,969 daily circ.), "Too many to remember," Los Angeles Herald-Examiner (718,221 daily circ.), "Occasionally," Denver Post (252,084 daily circ.), "Rarely" Cleveland Plain Dealer (370,499 daily circ.), "Very rare, some politics," Oregon Journal (146,403 daily circ.). This study did not purport to measure the extent of deterrence of informants caused by subpoenas to the press.

[33] In his Press Subpoenas: An Empirical and Legal Analysis 6–12 (1971), Prof. Blasi discusses these methodological problems. Prof. Blasi's survey found that slightly more than half of the 975 reporters questioned said that they relied on regular confidential sources for at least 10% of their stories. Id., at 21. Of this group of reporters, only 8% were able to say with some certainty that their professional functioning had been adversely affected by the threat of subpoena; another 11% were not certain whether or not they had been adversely affected. Id., at 53.

We note first that the privilege claimed is that of the reporter, not the informant, and that if the authorities independently identify the informant, neither his own reluctance to testify nor the objection of the newsman would shield him from grand jury inquiry, whatever the impact on the flow of news or on his future usefulness as a secret source of information. More important, it is obvious that agreements to conceal information relevant to commission of crime have very little to recommend them from the standpoint of public policy. Historically, the common law recognized a duty to raise the "hue and cry" and report felonies to the authorities.[34] Misprision of a felony—that is, the concealment of a felony "which a man knows but never assented to . . . [so as to become] either principal or accessory," 4 Blackstone, Commentaries, c. 9, *121 (Lewis ed. 1902), was often said to be a common law crime.[35] The first Congress passed a statute, 1 Stat. 113, as amended, 35 Stat. 1114, 62 Stat. 684, which is still in effect, defining a federal crime of misprison:

> "Whoever, having knowledge of the actual commission of a felony cognizable by a court of the United States, conceals and does not as soon as possible make known the same to some judge or other person in civil or military authority under the United States shall be [guilty of misprison]." 18 U.S.C. § 4.[36]

It is apparent from this statute, as well as from our history and that of England, that concealment of crime and agreements to do so are not looked upon with favor. Such conduct deserves no encomium, and we decline now to afford it First Amendment protection by denigating the duty of a citizen whether reporter or informer, to respond to grand jury subpoena and answer relevant questions put to him.

Of course, the press has the right to abide by its agreement not to publish all the information it has, but the right to withhold news is not equivalent to a First Amendment exemption from the ordinary duty of all other citizens to furnish relevant information to a grand jury performing an important public function. Private restraints on the flow of information are not so favored by the First Amendment that they override all other public interests. As Justice Black declared in another context, "Freedom of the Press from governmental interference under the First Amendment does not sanction repression of that freedom by private interests." Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 20 (1945).

Neither are we now convinced that a virtually impenetrable constitutional shield, beyond legislative or judicial control, should be forged to protect a private system of informers operated by the press to report on criminal conduct, a system that would be unaccountable to the public, would pose a threat to the citizen's justifiable expectations of privacy, and would equally protect well-intentioned informants and those who for pay or otherwise betray their trust to their employer or associates. The public through its elected and appointed law enforcement officers regularly utilizes informers, and in proper circumstances may assert a privilege against disclosing the identity of these informers. But:—

> "The purpose of the privilege is the furtherance and protection of the public interest in effective law enforcement. The privilege recognizes the obligation of citizens to communicate their knowledge of the commission of crimes to law-enforcement officials and, by preserving their anonymity, encourages them to perform that obligation." Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53, 59 (1957).

Such informers enjoy no constitutional protection. Their testimony is available to the public when desired by grand juries or at criminal trials; their identity cannot be concealed from the defendant when it is critical to his case. Roviaro v. United States, supra, at 60–61, 62; McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. 300, 310 (1967); Smith v. Illinois, 390 U.S. 129, 131 (1968); Alford v. United States,

---

[34] See Statute of Westminister the First, 3 Edw. I, c. IX, at 43 (1275); Statute of Winchester, 13 Edw. I, c. VI, at 114–115 (1285); Sheriffs Act of 1887, 50 & 51 Vict., c. 55, § 8(1); 4 Blackstone, Commentaries, c. 21, *293–*295 (Lewis ed. 1902); 2 Holdsworth, History of English Law 80–81, 101–102 (3d ed. 1927); 4 ibid., at 521–522.

[35] See, e.g., Scrope's Case, 3 Co. Inst. 36 (1415); Rex v. Couper, 87 Eng. Rep. 611 (1696); Proceedings under a Special Commission for the County of York, 31 Stat. Tr. 969 (1913); Sykes v. Director of Public Prosecutions, 3 W. L. R. 371 (1961). But see Glazebrook, Misprison of Felony—Shadow or Phantom?, 8 Am. J. Legal Hist. 189 (1964). See also Act 5 and 6 Edw. VI, c. 11 (1512).

[36] This statute has been construed, however, to require both knowledge of a crime and some affirmative act of concealment or participation. Bratton v. United States, 73 F. 2d 795 (CA10 1934); United States v. Farrar, 38 F. 2d 515, 516 (Mass. 1930), aff'd on other grounds, 281 U.S. 613 (1930); United States v. Norman, 391 F. 2d 212 (CA6 1968), cert. denied, 390 U.S. 1014 (1968); Lancey v. United States, 356 F. 2d 407 (CA9), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 922 (1966). Cf. Marbury v. Brooks, 7 Wheat. 556, 575 (1822) (Marshall, C. J.).

282 U.S. 687, 693 (1931). Clearly, this system is not impervious to control by the judiciary and the decision whether to unmask an informer or to continue to profit by his anonymity is in public, not private, hands. We think that it should remain there and that public authorities should retain the options of either insisting on the informer's testimony relevant to the prosecution of crime or of seeking the benefit of further information that his exposure might prevent.

We are admonished that refusal to provide a First Amendment reporter's privilege will undermine the freedom of the press to collect and disseminate news. But this it not the lesson history teaches us. As noted previously, the common law recognized no such privilege, and the constitutional argument was not even asserted until 1958. From the beginning of our country the press has operated without constitutional protection for press informants, and the press has flourished. The existing constitutional rules have not been a serious obstacle to either the development or retention of confidential news sources by the press.[37]

It is said that currently press subpoenas have multiplied,[38] that mutual distrust and tension between press and officialdom have increased, that reporting styles have changed, and that there is now more need for confidential sources, particularly where the press seeks news about minority cultural and political groups or dissident organizations suspicious of the law and public officials. These developments, even if true, are treacherous grounds for a far-reaching interpretation of the First Amendment fastening a nationwide rule on courts, grand juries, and prosecuting officials everywhere. The obligation to testify in response to grand jury subpoenas will not threaten these sources not involved with criminal conduct and without information relevant to grand jury investigations, and we cannot hold that the Constitution places the sources in these two categories either above the law or beyond its reach.

The argument for such a constitutional privilege rests heavily on those cases holding that the infringement of protected First Amendment rights must be no broader than necessary to achieve a permissible governmental purpose, see cases cited at n. 19. We do not deal, however, with a governmental institution that has abused its proper function, as a legislative committee does when it "expose[s] for the sake of exposure." Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 200 (1957). Nothing in the record indicates that these grand juries were "prob[ing] at will and without relation to existing need." DeGregory v. Attorney General of New Hampshire, 383 U.S. 825, 829 (1966). Also, there is no attempt here by the grand juries to invade protected First Amendment rights by forcing wholesale disclosure of names and organizational affiliations for a purpose which is not germane to the determination of whether crime has been committed, cf. NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (1958); NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415 (1963); Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516 (1960), and the characteristic secrecy of grand jury proceedings is a further protection against the undue invasion of such rights. See Fed. Rule Crim. Proc. 6(e). The investigative power of the grand jury is necessarily broad if its public responsibility is to be adequately discharged. Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359, 364 (1956).

The requirements of those cases, see n. 18, supra, which hold that a State's interest must be "compelling" or "paramount" to justify even an indirect burden on First Amendment rights, are also met here. As we have indicated, the investigation of crime by the grand jury implements a fundamental governmental role of securing the safety of the person and property of the citizen, and it appears to us that calling reporters to give testimony in the manner and for the reasons that other citizens are called "bears a reasonable relationship to the achievement of the governmental purpose asserted as its justification." Bates v. Little Rock, supra, at 525. If the test is that the Government "convincingly show a substantial relation between the information sought and a subject of overriding and compelling state interest," Gibson v. Florida Investigation Committee, 372 U.S. 539, 546 (1963), it is quite apparent (1) that the State has the necessary interest in extirpating the traffic in illegal drugs, in forestalling assassination attempts on the President, and in preventing the community from being disrupted by violent [37] Though the constitutional argument for a newsman's privilege has been put forward very recently, newsmen have contended for a number of years that such a privilege was desirable. See, e.g., Siebert & Ryniker, Editor and Publisher 36–37 (Sept. 1, 1934); Bird & Mervin, The Newspaper and Society 567 (1942). The first newsman's privilege statute was enacted by Maryland in 1896, and currently is codified as Md. Ann. Code Art. 35, § 2 (1971).

---

[38] A list of recent subpoenas to the news media is contained in the appendix to the brief of amicus New York Times in No. 70–57.

disorders endangering both persons and property; and (2) that, based on the stories Branzburg and Caldwell wrote and Pappas' admitted conduct, the grand jury called these reporters as they would others—because it was likely that they could supply information to help the Government determine whether illegal conduct had occurred and, if it had, whether there was sufficient evidence to return an indictment.

Similar considerations dispose of the reporters' claims that preliminary to requiring their grand jury appearance, the State must show that a crime has been committed and that they possess relevant information not available from other sources, for only the grand jury itself can make this determination. The role of the grand jury as an important instrument of effective law enforcement necessarily includes an investigatory function with respect to determining whether a crime has been committed and who committed it. To this end it must call witnesses, in the manner best suited to perform its task. "When the grand jury is performing its investigatory function into a general problem area, . . . society's interest is best served by a thorough and extensive investigation." Wood v. Georgia, 370 U.S. 375, 392 (1962). A grand jury investigation "is not fully carried out until every available clue has been run down and all witnesses examined in every proper way to find if a crime has been committed." United States v. Stone, 429 F. 2d 138, 140 (CA2 1970). Such an investigation may be triggered by tips, rumors, evidence proferred by the prosecutor, or the personal knowledge of the grand jurors. Costello v. United States, supra, at 362. It is only after the grand jury has examined the evidence that a determination of whether the proceeding will result in an indictment can be made:

> "It is impossible to conceive that in such cases the examination of witnesses must be stopped until a basis is laid by an indictment formally preferred, when the very object of the examination is to ascertain who will be indicted." Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 65 (1906).

See also Hendricks v. United States, 223 U.S. 178 (1912); Blair v. United States, supra, at 282–283. We see no reason to hold that these reporters, any more than other citizens, should be excused from furnishing information that may help the grand jury in arriving at its initial determinations.

The privilege claimed here is conditional, not absolute; given the suggested preliminary showings and compelling need, the reporter would be required to testify. Presumably, such a rule would reduce the instances in which reporters could be required to appear, but predicting in advance when and in what circumstances they could be compelled to do so would be difficult. Such a rule would also have implications for the issuance of compulsory process to reporters at civil and criminal trials and at legislative hearings. If newsmen's confidential sources are as sensitive as they are claimed to be, the prospect of being unmasked whenever a judge determines the situation justifies it is hardly a satisfactory solution to the problem.[39] For them, it would appear that only an absolute privilege would suffice.

---

[39] "Under the case-by-case method of developing rules, it will be difficult for potential informants and reporters to predict whether testimony will be compelled since the decision will turn on the judge's ad hoc assessment in different fact settings of 'importance' or 'relevance' in relation to the free press interest. A 'general' deterrent effect is likely to result. This type of effect stems from the vagueness of the tests and from the uncertainty attending their application. For example, if a reporter's information goes to the 'heart of the matter' in Situation X, another reporter and informant who subsequently are in Situation Y will not know if 'heart of the matter rule X' will be extended to them, and deterrence will thereby result. Leaving substantial discretion with judges to delineate those 'situations' in which rules of 'relevance' or 'importance' apply would therefore seem to undermine significantly the effectiveness of a reporter-informer privilege." Note, Reporters and Their Sources: The Constitutional Right to a Confidential Relationship, 80 Yale L. J. 317, 341 (1970).

In re Grand Jury Witnesses, 322 F. Supp. 573 (N.D. Cal. 1970), illustrates the impact of this ad hoc approach. Here, the grand jury was as in Caldwell, investigating the Black Panther Party, and was "inquiring into matters which involve possible violations of Congressional acts passed to protect the person of the President (18 U.S.C. § 1751), to free him from threats (18 U.S.C. § 871), to protect our armed forces from unlawful interference (18 U.S.C. § 2387), conspiracy to commit the foregoing offenses (18 U.S.C. § 371), and related statutes prohibiting acts directed against the security of the government." Id., at 577. The two witnesses, reporters for a Black Panther Party newspaper, were subpoenaed and given Fifth Amendment immunity against criminal prosecution, and they claimed a First Amendment journalists' privilege. The District Court order entered a protective order, allowing them to refuse to divulge confidential information until the Government demonstrated "a compelling and overriding national interest in requiring the testimony of [the witnesses] which cannot be served by any alternative means." Id., at 574. The Government claimed that it had information that the witnesses had associated with persons who had conspired to perform some of the criminal acts which the grand jury was investigating. The court held the Government had met its burden and ordered the witnesses to testify: "The whole point of the investigation is to identify persons known to the [witnesses] who

We are unwilling to embark the judiciary on a long and difficult journey to such an uncertain destination. The administration of a constitutional newsman's privilege would present practical and conceptual difficulties of a high order. Sooner or later, it would be necessary to define those categories of newsmen who qualified for the privilege, a questionable procedure in light of the traditional doctrine that liberty of the press is the right of the lonely pamphleteer who uses carbon paper or a mimeograph just as much as of the large metropolitan publisher who utilizes the latest photocomposition methods. Cf. In re Grand Jury Witnesses, 322 F. Supp. 573, 574 (ND Cal. 1970). Freedom of the press is a "fundamental personal right" which "is not confined to newspapers and periodicals. It necessarily embraces pamphlets and leaflets . . . . The press in its historic connotation comprehends every sort of publication which affords a vehicle of information and opinion." Lovell v. City of Griffin, 303 U.S. 444, 450, 452 (1938). See also Mills v. Alabama, 384 U.S. 214, 219 (1966); Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 111 (1943). The informative function asserted by representatives of the organized press in the present cases is also performed by lecturers, political pollsters, novelists, academic researchers, and dramatists. Almost any author may quite accurately assert that he is contributing to the flow of information to the public, that he relies on confidential sources of information, and that these sources will be silenced if he is forced to make disclosures before a grand jury.[40]

In each instance where a reporter is subpoenaed to testify, the courts would also be embroiled in preliminary factual and legal determinations with respect to whether the proper predicate had been laid for the reporters' appearance: Is there probable cause to believe a crime has been committed? Is it likely that the reporter has useful information gained in confidence? Could the grand jury obtain the information elsewhere? Is the official interest sufficient to outweigh the claimed privilege?

Thus, in the end, by considering whether enforcement of a particular law served a "compelling" governmental interest, the courts would be inextricably involved in distinguishing between the value of enforcing different criminal laws. By requiring testimony from a reporter in investigations involving some crimes but not in others, they would be making a value judgment which a legislature had declined to make, since in each case the criminal law involved would represent a considered legislative judgment, not constitutionally suspect, of what conduct is liable to criminal prosecution. The task of judges, like other officials outside the legislative branch is not to make the law but to uphold it in accordance with their oaths.

At the federal level, Congress has freedom to determine whether a statutory newsman's privilege is necessary and desirable and to fashion standards and rules as narrow or broad as deemed necessary to address the evil discerned and, equally important, to re-fashhion those rules as experience from time to time may dictate. There is also merit in leaving state legislatures free, within First may have engaged in activities violative of the above indicated statutes, and also to ascertain the details of their alleged activities. All questions directed to such objectives of the investigation are unquestionably relevant, and any other evaluation thereof by the Court, without knowledge of the facts before the Grand Jury would clearly constitute 'undue interference of the Court.'" Id., at 577.

---

Another illustration is provided by State v. Knops, 49 Wis. 2d 647, 183 N.W. 2d 93 (1971), in which a grand jury was investigating the August 24, 1970, bombing of Sterling Hall on the University of Wisconsin Madison campus. On August 26, 1970, an "underground" newspaper, the Madison Kaleidoscope, printed a front-page story entitled "The Bombers Tell Why and What Next—Exclusive to the Kaleidoscope." An editor of the Kaleidoscope was subpoenaed, appeared, asserted his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, was given immunity, and then pleaded that he had a First Amendment privilege against disclosing his confidential informants. The Wisconsin Supreme Court rejected his claim and upheld his contempt sentence: "[Appellant] faces five very narrow and specific questions, all of which are founded on information which he himself has already volunteered. The purpose of these questions is very clear. The need for answers to them is 'overriding,' to say the least. The need for these answers is nothing short of the public's need (and right) to protect itself from physical attack by apprehending the perpetrators of such attacks." 49 Wis. 2d, at 658, 183 N.W. 2d., at 98–99.

[40] Such a privilege might be claimed by groups that set up newspapers in order to engage in criminal activity and to therefore be insulated from grand jury inquiry, regardless of Fifth Amendment grants of immunity. It might appear that such "sham" newspapers would be easily distinguishable, yet the First Amendment ordinarily prohibits courts from inquiring into the content of expression, except in cases of obscenity or libel, and protects speech and publications regardless of their motivation, orthodoxy, truthfulness, timeliness, or taste. New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 269–270 (1964); Kingsley Pictures Corp. v. Regents, 360 U.S. 684, 689 (1959); Winters v. New York, 333 U.S. 507, 510 (1948); Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 537 (1945). By affording a privilege to some organs of communication but not to others, courts would inevitably be discriminating on the basis of content.

Amendment limits, to fashion their own standards in light of the conditions and problems with respect to the relations between law enforcement officials and press in their own areas. It goes without saying, of course, that we are powerless to erect any bar to state courts responding in their own way and construing their own constitutions so as to recognize a newsman's privilege, either qualified or absolute.

In addition, there is much force in the pragmatic view that the press has at its disposal powerful mechanisms of communication and is far from helpless to protect itself from harassment or substantial harm. Furthermore, if what the newsmen urged in these cases is true—that law enforcement cannot hope to gain and may suffer from subpoenaing newsmen before grand juries—prosecutors will be loath to risk so much for so little. Thus, at the federal level the Attorney General has already fashioned a set of rules for federal officials in connection with subpoenaing members of the press to testify before grand juries or at criminal trials.[41] These rules are a major step in the direction petitioners desire to move. They may prove wholly sufficient to resolve the bulk of disagreements and controversies between press and federal officials.

Finally, as we have earlier indicated, news gathering is not without its First Amendment protections, and grand jury investigations if instituted or conducted other than in good faith, would pose wholly different issues for resolution under the First Amendment.[42] Official harassment of the press undertaken not for purposes of law enforcement but to disrupt a reporter's relationship with his news sources would have no justification. Grand juries are subject to judicial control and subpoenas to motions to quash. We do not expect courts will forget that grand juries must operate within the limits of the First Amendment as well as the Fifth.

III

We turn, therefore, to the disposition of the cases before us. From what we have said, it necessarily follows that the decision in United States v. Caldwell, No. 70–57, must be reversed. If there is no First Amendment privilege to refuse to answer the relevant and material questions asked during a good-faith grand jury investigation, then it is a fortiori true that there is no privilege to refuse to appear before such a grand jury until the Government demonstrates some "compelling need" for a newsman's testimony. Other issues were urged upon us, but since they were not passed upon by the Court of Appeals, we decline to address them in the first instance.

The decisions in No. 70–85, Branzburg v. Hayes and Branzburg v. Meigs must be affirmed. Here, petitioner refused to answer questions that directly related to criminal conduct which he had observed and written about. The Kentucky Court of Appeals noted that marihuana is defined as a narcotic drug by statute. Ky. Rev. Stat. § 218.010(14), and that unlicensed possession or compounding of it is a felony punishable by both fine and imprisonment. Ky. Rev. Stat. § 218.210. It held that petitioner "saw the commission of the statutory felonies of unlawful possession of marijuana and the unlawful conversion of it into hashish," in Branzburg v. Pound, 461 S. W. 2d, at 346. Petitioner may be presumed to have observed similar violations of the state narcotics laws during the research he did for the story which forms the basis of the subpoena in Branzburg v. Meigs. In both cases, if what petitioner wrote was true, he had direct information to provide the grand jury concerning the commission of serious crimes.

---

[41] The "Guidelines for Subpoenas to the News Media" were first announced in a speech by the Attorney General on August 10, 1970, and then were expressed in Department of Justice Memo No. 692 (September 2, 1970), which was sent to all United States attorneys by the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division. The Guidelines state that "The Department of Justice recognizes that compulsory process in some circumstances may have a limiting effect on the exercise of First Amendment rights. In determining whether to request issuance of a subpoena to the press, the approach in every case must be to weight that limiting effect against the public interest to be served in the fair administration of justice" and that "The Department of Justice does not consider the press 'an investigative arm of the government.' Therefore, all reasonable attempts should be made to obtain information from non-press sources before there is any consideration of subpoenaing the press." The Guidelines provide for negotiations with the press and require the express authorizing of the Attorney General for such subpoenas. The principles to be applied in authorizing such subpoenas are stated to be whether there is "sufficient reason to believe that the information sought [from the journalist] is essential to a successful investigation," and whether the Government has unsuccessfully attempted to obtain the information from alternative non-press sources. The Guidelines provide, however, that in "emergencies and other unusual situations," subpoenas may be issued which do not exactly conform to the Guidelines.

[42] Cf. Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37, 49, 43–54 (1971).

The only question presented at the present time in In the Matter of Paul Pappas, No. 70–94, is whether petitioner Pappas must appear before the grand jury to testify pursuant to subpoena. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court characterized the record in this case as "meager," and it is not clear what petitioner will be asked by the grand jury. It is not even clear that he will be asked to divulge information received in confidence. We affirm the decision of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court and hold that petitioner must appear before the grand jury to answer the questions put to him, subject, of course, to the supervision of the presiding judge as to "the propriety, purposes, and scope of the grand jury inquiry and the pertinence of the probably testimony." ——— Mass. ———, 266 N. E. 2d, at 303–304.

So ordered.

Mr. Justice Douglas would reverse the judgments in Branzburg v. Hayes and In the Matter of Pappas for the reasons stated in his dissent in United States v. Caldwell, post ——.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Nos. 70–85, 70–94, and 70–57

(70–85)

Paul M. Branzburg, petitioner, v. John P. Hayes, Judge, etc., et al.

On Writ of Certiorari to the Court of Appeals of Kentucky

(70–94)

In the Matter of Paul Pappas, petitioner

On Writ of Certiorari to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts

(70–57)

United States, petitioner v. Earl Caldwell

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit

[June 29, 1972]

Mr. Justice Stewart, with whom Mr. Justice Brennan and Mr. Justice Marshall join, dissenting.

The Court's crabbed view of the First Amendment reflects a disturbing insensitivity to the critical role of an independent press in our society. The question whether a reporter has a constitutional right to a confidential relationship with his source is of first impression here, but the principles which should guide our decision are as basic as any to be found in the Constitution. While Mr. Justice Powell's enigmatic concurring opinion gives some hope of a more flexible view in the future, the Court in these cases holds that a newsman has no First Amendment right to protect his sources when called before a grand jury. The Court thus invites state and federal authorities to undermine the historic independence of the press by attempting to annex the journalistic profession as an investigative arm of government. Not only will this decision impair performance of the press' constitutionally protected functions, but it will, I am convinced, in the long run, harm rather than help the administration of justice.

I respectfully dissent.

I

The reporter's constitutional right to a confidential relationship with his source stems from the broad societal interest in a full and free flow of informa- historic independence of the press by attempting to annex the journalistic protection of a free press, Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 250; New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 269,[1] because the guarantee is "not for the benefit of the press so much as for the benefit of us all." Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 389.[2]

Enlightened choice by an informed citizenry is the basic ideal upon which an open society is premised,[3] and a free press is thus indispensable to a free society. Not only does the press enhance personal self-fulfillment by providing the people with the widest possible range of fact and opinion, but it also is an incontestable precondition of self-government. The press "has been a mighty catalyst in awakening interest in governmental affairs, exposing corruption among public officers and employees and generally informing the citizenry of public events and occurrences. . . ." Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532, 539; Mills v. Alabama, 384 U.S. 214, 219; Grosjean, supra, at 250. As private and public aggregations of power burgeon in size and the pressures for conformity necessarily mount, there is obviously a continuing need for an independent press to disseminate a robust variety of information and opinion through reportage, investigation and criticism, if we are to preserve our constitutional tradition of maximizing freedom of choice by encouraging diversity of expression.

A

In keeping with this tradition, we have held that the right to publish is central to the First Amendment and basic to the existence of constituional democracy. Grosjean, supra, at 250; New York Times, supra, at 270.

A corollary of the right to publish must be the right to gather news. The full flow of information to the public protected by the free press guarantee would be severely curtailed if no protection whatever were afforded to the process by which news is assembled and disseminated. We have, therefore, recognized that there is a right to publish without prior governmental approval, Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697; New York Times v. United States, 403 U.S. 713, a right to distribute information, see, e.g., Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444, 452; Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501; Martin v. City of Struthers, 319 U.S. 141; Grosjean, supra, and a right to receive printed matter, Lamont v. Postmaster General, 381 U.S. 301.

No less important to the news dissemination process is the gathering of information. News must not be unnecessarily cut off at its source, for without freedom to acquire information the right to publish would be impermissibly compromised. Accordingly, a right to gather news, of some dimensions, must exist. Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1.[4] Note, The Right of the Press to Gather Information, 71 Col. L. Rev. 838 (1971). As Madison wrote: "A popular government without popular information or the means of acquiring it is but a prologue to a farce or tragedy or perhaps both." 6 Writings of James Madison 398 (Hunt ed. 1906).

B

The right to gather news implies, in turn, a right to a confidential relationship between a reporter and his source. This proposition follows as a matter of simple logic once three factual predicates are recognized: (1) newsmen require informants to gather news; (2) confidentiality—the promise or understanding that names or certain aspects of communications will be kept off-the-record—is essential to the creation and maintenance of a news-gathering relationship with informants; and (3) the existence of an unbridled subpoena power—the absence of a constitutional right protecting, in any way, a confidential relationship from compulsory process—will either deter sources from divulging information or deter reporters from gathering and publishing information.

---

[1] We have often described the process of informing the public as the core purpose of the constitutional guarantee of free speech and a free press. See, e.g., Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359, 369; De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 365; Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147, 153.

[2] As I see it, a reporter's right to protect his source is bottomed on the constitutional guarantee of a full flow of information to the public. A newsman's personal First Amendment rights or the associational rights of the newsman and the source are subsumed under that broad societal interest protected by the First Amendment. Obviously, we are not here concerned with the parochial personal concerns of particular newsmen or informants.

"The newsman-informer relationship is different from . . . other relationships whose confidentiality is protected by statute, as the attorney-client and physician-patient relationships. In the case of other statutory privileges, the right of nondisclosure is granted to the person making the communication in order that he will be encouraged by strong assurances of confidentiality to seek such relationships which contribute to his personal well-being. The judgment is made that the interests of society will be served when individuals consult physicians and lawyers; the public interest is thus advanced by creating a zone of privacy that the individual can control. However, in the case of the reporter-informer relationship, society's interest is not in the welfare of the informant per see, but rather in creating conditions in which information possessed by news sources can reach public attention." Note, 80 Yale L. J. 317, 343 (1970) (footnotes omitted) (hereinafter "Yale Note").

[3] See generally Z. Chafee, Free Speech in the United States (1941). A. Meikeljohn, Free Speech and Its Relation to Self-Government (1948); T. Emerson, Toward a General Theory of the First Amendment (1963).

[4] In Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1, we held that the Secretary of State's denial of a passport for travel to Cuba did not violate a citizen's First Amendment rights. The rule was justified by the "weightiest considerations of national security" and we concluded that the "right to speak and publish does not carry with it the unrestrained right to gather information." Id., at 16–17 (emphasis supplied). The necessary implication is that some right to gather information does exist.

It is obvious that informants are necessary to the news-gathering process as we know it today. If it is to perform its constitutional mission, the press must do far more than merely print public statements or publish prepared handouts. Familiarity with the people and circumstances involved in the myriad background activities that result in the final product called "news" is vital to complete and responsible journalism, unless the press is to be a captive mouthpiece of "newsmakers."[5]

It is equally obvious that the promise of confidentiality may be a necessary prerequisite to a productive relationship between a newsman and his informants. An officeholder may fear his superior; a member of the bureaucracy, his associates; a dissident, the scorn of majority opinion. All may have information valuable to the public discourse, yet each may be willing to relate that information only in confidence to a reporter whom he trusts either because of excessive caution or because of a reasonable fear of reprisals or censure for unorthodox views. The First Amendment concern must not be with the motives of any particular news source, but rather with the conditions in which informants of all shades of the spectrum may make information available through the press to the public. Cf. Talley v. California, 362 U. S. 60, 65; Bates v. City of Little Rock, 361 U. S. 147; NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U. S. 449.[6]

In Caldwell, the District Court found that "confidential relationships . . . are commonly developed and maintained by professional journalists, and are indispensable to their work of gathering, analyzing and publishing news."[7] Commentators and individual reporters have repeatedly noted the importance of confidentiality.[8] And surveys among reporters and editors indicate that the promise of nondisclosure is necessary for many types of news-gathering.[9]

Finally, and most important, when governmental officials possess an unchecked power to compel newsmen to disclose information received in confidence, sources will clearly be deterred from giving information, and reporters will clearly be deterred from publishing it, because uncertainty about exercise of the power will lead to "self-censorship." Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147, 149–154; New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 279. The uncertainty arises, of course, because the judiciary has traditionally imposed virtually no limitations on the grand jury's broad investigatory powers. See Antell, The Modern Grand Jury: Benighted Supergovernment, 51 A. B. A. J. (1965). See also Part II, infra.

---

[5] In Caldwell v. United States, 434 F. 2d 1081, the Government claimed that Caldwell need not maintain a confidential relationship with members of the Black Panther Party and provide independent reporting of their activities, since the Party and its leaders could issue statements on their own. But as the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit correctly observed:

"It is not enough that Black Panther press releases and public addresses by Panther leaders may continue unabated in the wake of subpoenas such as the one here in question. It is not enough that the public's knowledge of groups such as the Black Panthers should be confined to their deliberate public pronouncements or distant news accounts of their occasional dramatic forays into the public view. The need for an untrammeled press takes on special urgency in times of widespread protest and dissent. In such times the First Amendment protections exist to maintain communication with dissenting groups and to provide the public with a wide range of information about the nature of protest and heterodoxy. See, e.g., Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 20 (1945); Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 102 (1940)." Id., at 1084–1085.

[6] As we observed in Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60, "Anonymous pamphlets, leaflets, brochures and even books have played an important role in the progress of mankind. . . . Before the Revolutionary War colonial patriots frequently had to conceal their authorship or distribution of literature that easily could have brought down on them prosecutions by English-controlled courts. . . . Even the Federalist Papers, written in favor of the adoption of our Constitution, were published under fictitious names. It is plain that anonymity has sometimes been assumed for the most constructive purposes." Id., at 64–65. And in Lamont v. Postmaster General, 381 U.S. 301, we recognized the importance to First Amendment values of the right to receive information anonymously.

[7] Application of Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358, 361.

[8] See, e.g., F. Chalmers, A Gentleman of the Press: The Biography of Colonel John Bayne MacLean 74–75 (1969); H. Klurfield, Behind the Lines: The World of Drew Pearson 50, 52–55 (1968); A. Krock, Memoirs: Sixty Years on the Firing Line 181, 184–185 (1968); E. Larsen, First with the Truth 22–23 (1968); R. Ottley, The Lonely Warrior—The Life and Times of Robert S. Abbott 143–145 (1955); C. L. Sulzberger, A Long Row of Candles, Memoirs and Diaries 24, 241 (1969).

As Walter Cronkite, a network television reporter, said in an affidavit in Caldwell: "In doing my work, I (and those who assist me) depend constantly on information, ideas, leads and opinions received in confidence. Such material is essential in digging out newsworthy facts and equally important in assessing the importance and analyzing the significance of public events."

[9] See Guest & Stanzler, The Constitutional Argument for Newsmen Concealing Their Sources, 64 Nw. L. Rev. 18 (1969); Blasi, Press Subpoenas: An Empirical and Legal Analysis, Study Report of the Reporters' Committee on Freedom of the Press 20–29 (1972) (hereinafter, "Blasi").

After today's decision, the potential informant can never be sure that his identity or off-the-record communications will not subsequently be revealed through the compelled testimony of a newsman. A public spirited person inside government, who is not implicated in any crime, will now be fearful of revealing corruption on other governmental wrong-doing, because he will now know he can subsequently be identified by use of compulsory process. The potential source must, therefore, choose between risking exposure by giving information or avoiding the risks by remaining silent.

The reporter must speculate about whether contact with a controversial source or publication of controversial material will lead to a subpoena. In the event of a subpoena, under today's decision, the newsman will know that he must choose between being punished for contempt if he refuses to testify, or violating his profession's ethics[10] and impairing his resourcefulness as a reporter if he discloses confidential information.[11]

Again, the common sense understanding that such deterrence will occur is buttressed by concrete evidence. The existence of deterrent effects through fear and self-censorship was impressively developed in the District Court in Caldwell.[12] Individual reporters[13] and commentators[14] have noted such effects. Surveys have verified that an unbridled subpoena power will substantially impair the flow of news to the public, especially in sensitive areas involving governmental officials, financial affairs, political figures, dissidents, or minority groups that require in-depth, investigative reporting.[15] And the Jusitce Department has recognized that "compulsory process in some circumstances may have a limiting effect on the exercise of First Amendment rights."[16] No evidence contradicting the existence of such deterrent effects was offered at the trials or in the briefs here by the petitioners in Caldwell or by the respondents in Branzburg and Pappas.

The impairment of the flow of news cannot, of course, be proven with scientific precision, as the Court seems to demand. Obviously, not every news-gathering relationship requires confidentiality. And it is difficult to pinpoint precisely how many relationships do require a promise or understanding of nondisclosure. But we have never before demanded that First Amendment rights rest on elaborate empirical studies demonstrating beyond any conceivable doubt that deterrent effects exist; we have never before required proof of the exact number of people potentially affected by governmental action, who would actually be dissuaded from engaging in First Amendment activity.

Rather, on the basis of common sense and available information, we have asked, often implicitly, (1) whether there was a rational connection between the cause (the governmental action) and the effect (the deterrence or impairment of First Amendment activity) and (2) whether the effect would occur with some regularity, i.e., would not be de minimis. See, e.g., Grosjean, supra, at 244–245; Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 503; Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 248; NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 461–466; Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147, 150–154; Bates v. City of Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 523–524; Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60, 64–65; Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479, 485–486; Cramp v. Board of Public Instruction, 368 U.S. 278; 286; NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 431–438; Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigative Committee, 372 U.S. 539, 555–557; New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 277–278; Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51, 59; DeGregory v. New Hampshire Attorney General, 383 U.S. 825; Elfbrandt v. Russell, 384 U.S. 11, 16–19. And, in making this determination, we have shown a special solicitude towards the "indispensable liberties" protected by the First Amendment. NAACP v. Alabama, 371 U.S., at 461; Bantam Books Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U.S. 58, 66, for "freedoms such as these are protected not only against heavy-handed frontal attack, but also from being stifled by more subtle government interference." Bates, supra, at 523.[17] Once this threshold inquiry has been satisfied, we have then examined the competing interests in determining whether there is an unconstitutional infringement of First Amendment freedoms.

---

[10] The American Newspaper Guild has adopted the following rule as part of the newsman's code of ethics: "Newspaper men shall refuse to reveal confidences or disclose sources of confidential information in court or before other judicial or investigative bodies." G. Bird and F. Mervin. The Newspaper and Society 567 (1942).

[11] Obviously if a newsman does not honor a confidence he will have difficulty establishing other confidential relationships necessary for obtaining information in the future. See Siebert and Ryniker, Editor and Publisher, September 1, 1934, 36–37.

[12] The court found that "compelled disclosure of information received by a journalist within the scope of . . . confidential relationships jeopardizes those relationships and thereby impairs the journalist's ability to gather, analyze and publish news." Application of Caldwell, 311 F. Supp. 358, 361.

[13] See n. 8, supra.

[14] Recent commentary is nearly unanimous in urging either an absolute or qualified newsman's privilege. See, e.g., Goldstein, Newsmen and Their Confidential Sources, New Republic, March 21, 1970, 13–14; Note, 80 Yale L. J. 317 (1970); Note, N. Y. U. L. Rev. 617 (1971); Nelson, The Newsmen's Privilege Against Disclosure of Confidential Sources and Information, 24 Vand. L. Rev. 667 (1971); Note, 71 Col. L. Rev. 838 (1971); Comment, 4 Journal of Law Reform 85 (1971); Comment, 6 Harv. Civ. Rights-Civ. Lib. L. Rev. 119 (1970); Comment, 58 Calif. L. Rev. 1198 (1970). But see the Court's opinion, ante, at 24, n. 29. And see generally articles collected in Yale Note, n. 2.

Recent decisions are in conflict both as to the importance of the deterrent effects and, a fortiori, as to the existence of a constitutional right to a confidential reporter-source relationship. See the Court's opinion, ante, at 20, and cases collected in Yale Note, at 318, n. 6–7.

[15] See Blasi 6–71; Guest and Stanzler, The Constitutional Argument for Newsmen Concealing Their Sources, 64 Nw. L. Rev. 18, 43–50 (1969).

[16] Department of Justice Memo No. 692, September 2, 1970.

For example, in NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, we found that compelled disclosure of the names of those in Alabama who belonged to the NAACP "is likely to affect adversely the ability [of the NAACP] and its members to pursue their beliefs which they admittedly have the right to advocate, in that it may induce members to withdraw from the Association and dissuade others from joining it because of fear of exposure of their beliefs shown through their associations and of the consequences of this exposure." Id., at 463. In Talley, supra, we held invalid a city ordinance which forbade circulation of any handbill that did not have the distributor's name on it, for there was "no doubt that such an identification procedure would tend to restrict freedom to distribute information and thereby freedom of expression." Id., at 64–65. And in Burstyn, supra, we found deterrence of First Amendment activity inherent in a censor's power to exercise unbridled discretion under an overbroad statute. Id., at 503.

Surely the analogous claim of deterrance here is as securely grounded in evidence and common sense as the claims in the cases cited above, although the Court calls the claim "speculative." See ante, at 28. The deterrence may not occur in every confidential relationship between a reporter and his source.[18] But it will certainly occur in certain types of relationships involving sensitive and controversial matters. And such relationships are vital to the free flow of information.

To require any greater burden of proof is to shirk our duty to protect values securely embedded in the Constitution. We cannot await an unequivocal—and therefore unattainable—imprimatur from empirical studies.[19] We can and must accept the evidence developed in the record, and elsewhere, that overwhelmingly supports the premise that deterrence will occur with regularity in important types of news-gathering relationships.[20]

---

[17] Although, as the Court points out, we have held that the press is not free from the requirements of the National Labor Relations Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act, the anti-trust laws or nondiscriminatory taxation, ante, at 17, these decisions were concerned "only with restraints on certain business or commercial practices of the press." Citizen Publishing Co. v. United States, 394 U.S. 131, 139. And due weight was given to First Amendment interests. For example, the "First Amendment far from providing an argument against application of the Sherman Act . . . provides powerful reasons to the contrary." Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 20.

[18] The fact that some informants will not be deterred from giving information by the prospect of the unbridled exercise of the subpoena power only means that there will not always be a conflict between the grand jury's inquiry and the protection of First Amendment activities. But even if the percentage of such informants is relatively large (compared to the total "universe" of potential informants, there will remain a large number of people in "absolute" terms who will be deterred, and the flow of news through mass circulation newspapers and electronic media will inevitably be impaired.

[19] Empirical studies, after all, can only provide facts. It is the duty of courts to give legal significance to facts; and it is the special duty of this Court to understand the constitutional significance of facts. We must often proceed in a state of less than perfect knowledge, either because the facts are murky or the methodology used in obtaining the facts is open to question. It is then that we must look to the Constitution for the values that inform our presumptions. And the importance to our society of the full flow of information to the public has buttressed this Court's historic presumption in favor of First Amendment values.

[20] See, e.g., the uncontradicted evidence presented in affidavits from newsmen in Caldwell, Appendix to No. 70–57, at 22–61 (statements from Gerald Fraser, Thomas Johnson, John Kifner, Timothy Knight, Nicholas Proffitt, Anthony Ripley, Wallace Turner, Gilbert Noble

Thus, we cannot escape the conclusion that when neither the reporter nor his source can rely on the shield of confidentiality against unrestrained use of the grand jury's subpoena power, valuable information will not be published and the public dialogue will inevitably be impoverished.

II

Posed against the First Amendment's protection of the newsman's confidential relationships in these cases is society's interest in the use of the grand jury to administer justice fairly and effectively. The grand jury serves two important functions: "to examine into the commission of crimes" and "to stand between the prosecutor and the accused, and to determine whether the charge was founded upon credible testimony or was dictated by malice or personal ill will." Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 59. And to perform these functions the grand jury must have available to it every man's relevant evidence. See Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273, 281; Blackmer v. United States, 284 U.S. 421, 438.

Yet the longstanding rule making every person's evidence available to the grand jury is not absolute. The rule has been limited by the Fifth Amendment,[21] the Fourth Amendment,[22] and the evidentiary privileges of the common law.[23] So it was that in Blair, supra, after recognizing that the right against compulsory self-incrimination prohibited certain inquiries, the Court noted that "some confidential matters are shielded from considerations of policy, and perhaps in other cases for special reasons a witness may be excused from telling all he knows." Id., at 281 (emphasis supplied). And in United States v. Bryan, 393 U.S. 323, the Court observed that any exemption from the duty to testify before the grand jury "presupposes a very real interest to be protected." Id., at 331-332.

